slave trade, and he would find that measures had repeatedly been taken to bring our proceedings in regard to it more into conformity with the Law of Nations. Had there not been, he would ask, a Commission which had the valuable assistance of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford on the Neutrality Laws? Could not the Foreign Office have found out all about those laws without a Commission? Of, course, they could; but the subject was looked upon as a solemn and a sacred one, and a Commission had been appointed in order that a just conclusion with regard to it might be arrived at. Again, in the case of the Naturalization Law the same course was adopted, and those Commissions and Committees brought about valuable results which might be a blessing to future generations of this country, because they placed things on a sound basis, and did that which was best of all, informed the public mind. Ours was a noble, a humane, and a generous people, and they wished—as from his heart he wished—that slavery could be abolished by a stroke of the pen, or a blow of the hand; but it was well that they should know how many difficulties lay in the way of the accomplishment of that desirable object. It was, then, by means of the evidence taken before Committees and Commissions that they were to be put in possession of the real facts of the case; and when those facts were brought to their knowledge, so far from being led away by the mere impulse of feeling, he believed they would ask themselves whether it was not better to wait than to break through honourable compacts and Treaties, and to pause before making any rash attempt to interfere with laws which affected not only this country, but all the nations of the world. We could not by ourselves deal with International Law. That being so, he felt assured that the English people would be willing to submit to a little delay, in order that they might proceed on sound principles. There was a great man, Lord Stowell, who said—

“To press forward to a great principle by breaking through every other principle that stands in the way of its establishment, to force the way to the liberation of Africa by trampling on the independence of other States in Europe—in short, to procure an eminent moral good by means that are unlawful, is as little consonant to private morality as to public justice. Obtain the concurrence of other nations if you can, by application, by remonstrance, by example, by every peaceable instrument which man can employ to attract the consent of man. But a nation is not justified in assuming rights that do not belong to her merely because she means to employ them to a laudable purpose, nor in setting out on a moral crusade of converting other nations by acts of unlawful force."

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

These appeared to him to be wise words, and they embodied the principles on which Her Majesty's Government were acting. The object of the Government was to increase personal liberty throughout the world, and they were not afraid to be called to account for this Circular, which the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had admitted to be within the law, because they had issued it publicly and on their own responsibility, with a view to increase the liberty of nations; and he appealed to the country to say whether the Government had not faithfully discharged the duty of an English Ministry and of Englishmen.

MR. HERSCHELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 23rd February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES — Resolutions
[February 18] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Drugging of Animals * [85]; Open Spaces (Metropolitan District * [86].

Second Reading—Electoral County Boards (Ireland) [8], put off; Grand Jury Presentments, &c. (Ireland) [22], put off; Wild Fowl Preservation [42], debate adjourned; Industrial and Provident Societies * [68].

ELECTORAL COUNTY BOARDS (IRE- LAND) BILL.—[BILL 8.]

(Captain Nolan, Mr. O'Clery, Mr. Fay.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that it was introduced for the purpose of dealing with a subject which had of late attracted a great deal of attention in England, but which in Ireland was felt to be a crying grievance—he meant the system of county administration. In both countries the principle of the law was the same, and rested on a feudal basis. But there was this great difference in its application to the two countries—that in England the management of county affairs was in the hands of a large number of persons, the county magistrates as well as landlords; while in Ireland it was concentrated in the hands of the few magnates of the land. Again, the evil was much more marked in the latter than in the former country, inasmuch as in England the chief interest was fixed upon the great towns, while in Ireland the agricultural population possessed more relative importance, and consequently attention was chiefly directed to agricultural and rural interests. The grievance was, therefore, felt much more strongly in Ireland than in England. The present measure was brought in to give greater power to the rural population to manage their own affairs. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said last Session that this measure would, if accepted, work a complete revolution in Irish county affairs, and he (Captain Nolan) would have no objection to that expression if it was understood in the sense that a farmer who saw a sheep on its back and put it upon its legs again worked a revolution; but if it removed an evil and brought about a good result, no one would be likely to complain of its revolutionary character. The Bill was not directed against any class—indeed, one of its effects would be to permit of a class—the peers—who had not hitherto had any share in the management of county affairs, exercising in future some influence in their administration. He had reason to believe that the county management in Ireland was different from that of any other country. He had tried to obtain Returns showing exactly in what proportion the rates levied on land in Ireland were paid, but these were refused by the Chief Secretary on the ground that they would give a great deal of trouble in preparation. He believed that the tenants paid the whole of the rates, with a few exceptions—small tenancies, and where the landlord happened to be the occupier himself. He had made inquiry into the law of other countries. In France he found that county administration was divided between two Councils—the Council of the Department and the Council of the Arrondissement—the members of both of which were elected by universal suffrage. In Belgium and Holland the management was in the hands partly of the village commune, elected by those paying taxes corresponding to what would be paid on a rating of £9 a-year in this country, and partly of Provincial Councils, who were elected by those who paid in a rateable value of £7 a-year. In Germany the system was different, the object there being to establish a sort of balance between the urban and rural populations; the administration was, therefore, in the hands of a Board, half of whom were elected by the towns, a quarter by the larger landed proprietors paying on a rateable value of £80 a-year, and a quarter by the smaller landed proprietors and the peasantry together. In Russia, in 1864, a new system was established, and the Councils had been made elective, and whereas before that time 98 per cent of the local rates was paid by the peasantry, and 2 per cent by the proprietors, now 51 per cent was paid by the latter and 49 per cent by the former. In Spain the local management of affairs did not work very well, but the Provincial Councils were elective. Going to Australia he found—at least in Victoria and New South Wales—that the votes were given according to the rateable value of the land held; every man had a vote who was assessed, two if assessed at £25 a-year, and so on in proportion up to £75, which gave four votes—the most that any man could have. In Tasmania the management was more in the hands of the rich men, a vote being given for each £50 up to £500. In America (Massachusetts) there was a system of election of county commissioners for three years, and every one who paid county rates voted. Now in Ireland, where they were supposed to have more liberal institutions than abroad, they did not in their county management of affairs carry out the principles existing in foreign countries, for not a single member either of the Grand Central Board or of the minor Boards was elected. The Sheriff summoned almost at his pleasure all residents in the county he deemed fitted to administer county matters—he took 23 in all. He would not say that the Sheriffs of Ireland were a bad class, or that they wanted to work bad institutions in a bad way; but he would say that the system was open to the greatest abuses. If there were an elective principle in their institutions, the Sheriffs would not be placed in such difficult positions as sometimes now happened, for he did not think that any man could escape from imputations being cast upon him. Every farmer was, as a rule, excluded from the Grand Jury, although practically his class paid the local taxation. He had heard three arguments advanced for the retention of the present state of things. It was said that all rates fell ultimately on the landlords; but there were many cases where that could not be true, as, for instance, where new rates were put on after agreement with the landlord as to the amount of rent: there it was clear that the tenant paid them. Another of the arguments in support of the present system was that the baronial sessions were a counterbalance to the Grand Juries; but they were not a counterbalance. The members of the baronial courts were not elected by the baronies. Also the baronial sessions had comparatively little power, and for that reason frequently members of the baronial courts did not attend the baronial sessions. It might be said that there must be some reason why the Grand Jury system had continued to exist so long. Well, no doubt it was the love of power which induced the grand jurors to adhere to that system. It was originated in dark times, and ought to give place to such a system as that which prevailed all through Europe with reference to the management of local affairs. He thought very probably that many of those who formed the present Grand Juries would be sent to the Elective Boards. It might be said, then, what would be the use of making a change? The answer was, they would be in a different position. The object of the present Grand Juries was to leave matters as they were; that arose out of their love of power and patronage; but it would be for the House of Commons to consider whether they would allow that to prevail over that natural right of the people to have a fair representation in the management of their affairs. His Bill contained three principles—1st, that all members of the Board should be elected; 2nd, that no one elector should have more votes than the others—that was, he considered, a point of the greatest importance—and 3rd, that the qualification of each elector should be the same as that for electing a Member of Parliament. This stood at present at £12. No doubt that amount was rather high for Ireland, but he would be willing to modify or to give it up for a lower qualification. He had adopted it on the ground of expediency and economy, as the machinery for working the elections would be the same as for the Parliamentary representation; which on the whole had worked well. He trusted the House would accept this Bill, which was one of three now on the Paper having for their objects the improvement of the internal administration of Ireland. He would now move the second reading.

Captain Nolan

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Captain Nolan.)

Mr. KAVANAGH, in moving an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, it was admitted that on the whole the present system of county management in Ireland worked well, and he opposed this Bill because it had for its object the abolition of that system. He would first call attention to the Preamble of the Bill, which stated in effect—

"That it was expedient that the control of the money raised for local purposes in Ireland should be under the supervision and direction of those who paid the rates."

That implied that the ratepayers had not now that control. But he (Mr. Kavanagh), while he admitted that theoretically they had not, contended that practically they had. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had painted the picture of the Grand Jury system as he saw it, and he hoped the House would not object to his (Mr. Kavanagh's) painting it as he saw it. He submitted that, though the county cess was in the great majority of cases paid directly by the occupier, yet that it eventually came out of the landlords' pockets, because the rents they received were reduced in proportion to the rates paid by the tenants. No doubt bargains between landlords and tenants were made on averages; but if there were special presentments for malicious damage the tenants had to pay the extra rates. In fact, the expenditure of the county cess was controlled by the associated ratepayers and not by the Grand Jury of the county. He admitted that there were anomalies in the present system, and he was not there to defend those anomalies. They existed not in the manner in which the co-funds were expended, but in the way which, under the present system, the associated cesspayers and the Grand Jury were appointed. The power to appoint was vested in the High Sheriff. He had to call the Grand Jury together; and if he had been rightly informed there was no qualification required for a grand juror. That power in the High Sheriff was an anomaly. But it should be borne in mind that with the Grand Jury rested no power whatsoever of initiating expenditure. On the other hand, though the High Sheriffs had unlimited power, the force of public opinion was sufficient to check them, and to compel them to nominate as Grand Jurors only those who were possessed of property in the county, or agents to represent those proprietors who were unable to attend, or were disqualified from doing so. He was in a position to prove that the practice of packing Grand Juries, as some had believed, had never taken place in Ireland. He had never heard of a single case being substantiated by facts. He had now to deal with the case of the appointment of the associated cesspayers, with whom rested the whole power of initiating expenditure. At first sight it might appear that this appointment lay entirely in the hands of the Grand Jury, but when the real facts were examined, it would be seen that they had no discretion in the matter; they were bound to return the names of the highest cesspayers in each barony, excluding only those who had served the preceding year, and out of the names so returned by them the proper number of associated cesspayers to sit at baronial sessions were afterwards selected by lot, so that virtually in the hands of the Grand Jury there was no power which could be used for jobbing purposes; and this being the case, he maintained that all the arguments used by those who advocated the abolition of the system condemnation of the system. But this condemnation was unheeded, and the grievance still exists. Surely this is a state of things that under no circumstances would be tolerated in England. It is well-known that without the fullest sanction of the ratepayers the smallest amount of public money could not be applied in England; in Ireland, on the other hand, we are still trying, after 40 years of agitation, to induce the Government to allow us some control over the disbursement of more than £1,250,000 annually of our own money. As regards the working of the system, so manifestly designed to exclude all popular control, the case stands thus—The Lord Lieutenant nominally, but in reality his advisers in Dublin Castle, appoints the sheriff for each county. The sheriff appoints 23 gentlemen at his own option, and without reference to any fixed rule, and this body constitutes the Grand Jury for the county, over the rates of which it has absolute control. In the presentment sessions, of which we hear so much, a Grand Juror has practically the right to nominate, and actually does nominate the cesspayers entitled to attend for each particular barony; and it has been stated in this House that the opinions of the cesspayers so chosen on any project about to be submitted to such presentment sessions are well-known beforehand. Thus the system is purely one of selection, and in no case one of election. The Bill now under discussion, which has been prepared with the utmost care, provides machinery to supplant easily the present Grand Juries by County Boards of a strictly representative character, and which would enjoy public confidence. The Bill proposes to give each ratepayer at present holding the Parliamentary franchise a vote in the election of the members of the Boards. It should not be considered strange that men who are deemed eligible to elect Representatives having the power to tax the nation at large should also have a voice in the election of those who manage the local affairs of a county. And that they should be elected by Ballot ought to cause no surprise, seeing that the Ballot is now the law of the land. On the ground of economy this measure would be most advantageous, for it would tend directly to the consolidation of many institutions in the country, and the consequent reduction of the whole staffs of officials now maintained at a great expense. The Irish ratepayers know full well that there is no actual requirement for the prisons, bridewells, and asylums already existing in Ireland. On the whole question, however, I would ask the House to frankly meet the exigency of the case. It has not been submitted to Parliament for the first time, and it has ever been moderately, fairly, and temperately pressed upon your notice. Do not then reject the measure, and so leave the Irish people no alternative but to think that on every case their wishes are to be utterly disregarded. The measure, if passed, will serve to remove a long-standing grievance, and to create a sound public opinion in the country by training the people in the management of local affairs, and, above all, it will materially contribute to prepare them for the great future which I am firmly convinced is in store for Ireland.

Mr. CONOLLY said, he would congratulate the House on the calm and considerate manner in which the subject had been brought before them; but he must point out the remarkable dissimilarity between this Bill and that introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). As between the two, he preferred that of the hon. and learned Member, and he could not but be surprised that the Home Rule Party should not listen on this question to their accepted oracle and leader, who certainly understood the matter much better than the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan). The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery) had addressed his remarks against the whole Grand Jury system of Ireland, and not against this Bill. He (Mr. Conolly) could not admit that the Grand Jury system was universally disapproved in Ireland. Some there were who were opposed to it, but these were not of a high or influential class; while he could assert of the Grand Jury that they were a high-minded and honourable body. He should be glad to assist the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) in his efforts to improve that ancient institution, which—though not blind to its defects—he believed was highly appreciated by the Irish people. Political agitators might sometimes include the Grand Jury system in their denunciations to swell the bundle of Irish grievances; but the people did not really care about the matter, and why should they fish in the troubled waters of political excitement for some chance body without either prudence, sagacity, or knowledge of the business in hand, to supplant one that was well qualified and had been long accustomed to the discharge of its functions? The compact circle opposite desired to dethrone what they called an oligarchy; but if they wanted to destroy the existing body, why did they not boldly strike at the Sheriff, who was its head? They did not directly attack the Sheriff because he represented the Crown; but if they wished to sweep away everything hereditary that they could lay their hands on in favour of something of an elective character, what was that but Republicanism?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman had no right to charge any hon. Members of that House with advocating principles which were opposed to the Constitution. He had no right to charge any hon. Member of the House with advocating Republicanism, and which charge, so far as the Home Rule Party were concerned, was destitute of any foundation whatever.

MR. CONOLLY said, he did not wish to impute to hon. Gentlemen what they repudiated—all that he wished to put forward was that the elective principle, as opposed to the hereditary principle, was capable of that construction. In his own county there were names on the Grand Jury list which had been inscribed on it for 200 years, and he should regret to see an ancient and cherished institution, instead of being improved where that was necessary, ruthlessly destroyed. He believed that the people of Ireland had confidence in the gentry, and he should be glad to help his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) in his efforts to reform and improve the existing system—a system the operation of which he believed was beneficial to the country.

MR. BUTT certainly was not offended with the last speaker for charging him with Republicanism, because he was not prepared to cut off the head of the Sheriff. It was not necessary in that House to deny that to advocate the elective principle was to advocate Republicanism, for that was the very principle upon which that House was itself elected. The vital question now before the House was, would they trust the Irish people to elect those who were to manage their county affairs? The hon. Member for Donegal said the people would have confidence in the gentry—yes, they would if they had the advantage of the elective system. The Grand Jury system was, indeed, a time-honoured institution, but only as a part of the criminal jurisdiction of the country—its sole legitimate function. The practice of also intrusting it in Ireland with the fiscal business of the county was only about a century old, and had sprung up in the time of the Penal Laws. The idea of extending such a system to the financial administration of an English county would not be tolerated for one moment. The hon. Member for Carlow had taken a position between the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway and his (Mr. Butt's) own Bill. It was perfectly immaterial whether they took his hon. and gallant Friend's Bill or his own that day, because they were not now discussing details, but a question of principle—the question whether the anomalous system which now existed should be maintained, or whether the people of Ireland should be trusted with the management of their own affairs—and the two measures were so far alike that they were both based on the elective principle, his own proposal being to enable the magistrates to elect one-third of the Council. Among the associated cesspayers there were often persons wholly unsuited for the duty they had to perform—persons, for instance, who could neither read, nor write, nor speak English. In fact, anomalies of the present system were plain and had long been recognized, and the Irish people, he thought, had good reason to complain of their continuance. In 1842 an able Commission considered this subject, and made recommendations in favour of reforming the existing system of the election of cesspayers, but up to the present time these recommendations had not been carried into effect. He should prefer that cesspayers should be elected in the Boards. The proposal to extend the powers of the Poor Law Guardians was not one which was likely to give satisfaction. For his own part, he had a great objection to throwing on the Poor Law Guardians duties not connected with the poor; and, moreover, the Poor Law Guardians were elected by a system of cumulative votes, in which the people thought property had too much influence. With regard to the ultimate tribunal of the Grand Jury, nobody could pretend to justify the monstrosity of the fiscal business of the counties being managed by such a body. The supporters of the Bill had been referred to as if they were making some revolutionary proposal, but there were there as true Conservatives, upholding the Constitutional principle that there should be no taxation without representation. In 1874 no less than £1,300,000 were raised and disposed of in Ireland at the bidding of the Sheriffs, without a particle of representation, and without any popular control whatever. The system did not work well, it created dissatisfaction among the people of Ireland, and it was their object to put an end to such a monstrous state of things. True, there were no noisy demonstrations in their favour—the Irish people had, perhaps, seen the folly of them; but he made bold to say that there was scarcely a single question connected with Irish administration which touched more fully the thoughts and sentiments of the farming classes than the Grand Jury question. Under that system the whole tax was levied on the farmers and occupiers of land, whilst the whole administration was left in the hands of another class. The Irish gentry would have far more real influence amongst the people if they were obliged to mix amongst them and take their own place at an elective Board. Popular representation had worked successfully in other parts of the kingdom, and yet it was denied to Ireland. Money was paid by farmers and occupiers of the land and administered by an entirely different body. Was that teaching the people self-reliance, the necessity for which had been so much talked about? The case of the Quarter Sessions in England might be cited against him, but it furnished no answer at all to the complaints now made, for the principle of representation in England differed materially from that in Ireland. The one issue before the House was whether the monstrous anomaly of the Grand Jury system should be continued, or whether the people were to be trusted to have a voice in the management of their own affairs. If the Bill was rejected its rejection would produce a feeling which certainly would not tend to attach the people of Ireland to the House of Commons.

Mr. Conolly

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he concurred with the supporters of the Bill in their demand for popular representation. It was a great pleasure to those Irish Members who sat on the Conservative benches to be able to co-operate with those who came from other parts of Ireland, in attempts to improve the administration of the law there. He was not to be frightened by a charge of Republicanism when the charge was founded merely on their desire to elect their representatives. It would not be tolerated for a moment in England that the Grand Jury should both levy taxation and administer it; and there could be no doubt that the effect on the people of having the control of public expenditure would be good. Hon. Members opposite, in dealing with the question, had to a great extent attacked imaginary adversaries, for he did not believe any one was prepared to defend the Grand Jury system in Ireland as it existed. It was admitted by those hon. Members who spoke on the last occasion when the Question was before the House, that there were some anomalies in the present system of the Grand Jury Laws, and a general wish was expressed that they should be remedied when the proper period should arrive. He must confess, however, that these grievances were rather theoretical than practical, for he believed that the opponents of the laws had never been able to show any substantial grievance in the present system. But, still, he agreed that it was time for some action to be taken on the question. It had long been before the public, and in 1868 a Committee had made recommendations on the subject which were certainly free from anything like class or party bias—they recommended the removal of a grievance which was felt to be gross and intolerable, yet Chief Secretary after Chief Secretary had been compelled to postpone from Session to Session the introduction of a remedy. The difference of opinion on this question arose from its being regarded from different points of view. On the one hand, the supporters of the Bill proposed to bring about the desired effect by sweeping away everything connected with the Grand Jury Laws. Gentlemen on his side of the House, on the contrary, in dealing with an institution venerable by its age and associations, and deeply-rooted in the country, thought it better to follow out the recommendations of the Committee of 1868, and improve rather than destroy. What the other side wanted would in his opinion be accomplished by the legislation which his side suggested and preferred. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, that the Board ought to be elected by the cesspayers, and the Bill which his party proposed to bring in, provided that it should be so elected in a mode suggested by several Members opposite when the subject was discussed a year ago, and this was that to avoid the inconvenience and disturbance of a second election, they should utilize the machinery which at present existed for the election of Poor Law Guardians. He thought they might fairly assume that those who would be elected would be of the class which now supplied the Poor Law Guardians, and they from the training they had received would be prepared for the fulfilment of their duties in case this Bill passed. As to the statement with regard to the fiscal duties of the Grand Jury, he understood that the fiscal duties were clearly defined by statute. Those powers were strictly limited to the approval or disapproval of presentments; they had no power of initiative. Assuming that the arguments which had been advanced were all that could be put forward in favour of this Bill, he did not think a case had been made out for the Bill. He believed the object aimed at could be achieved by a much less sweeping measure. There had been no complaint on the part of the people of Ireland as to the manner in which the business had been conducted by the Grand Jury. On the contrary, he believed greater confidence was reposed in the Grand Jury than probably would be reposed in any Board that could be newly constructed. The Grand Jury was not a secret Court; its discussions were held before a very large audience of the cesspayers of the county, and he believed there was much less chance of what he might call a job receiving the sanction of a Grand Jury than of a County Board. The Grand Jury was a Court of Final Appeal, which had the effect of preventing anything being done hastily. He was of opinion, however, that the Grand Jury should be composed of the owners of property, and that they should not be represented by their agents, in order that the body might command confidence from the social status of its members: but he did not think it would be wise to establish an absolute prohibition, because there must be cases where the owners of property could not serve personally on the Grand Jury. There were cases in Ireland where whole baronies were owned by one person, and the owner might be a minor. It was desirable to have on the Grand Jury some one who knew all the circumstances of the locality—some one of experience—and, of course, this could not be the case where the owner was a minor. A great proportion of his own county belonged to a minor, and therefore he thought it would be unwise to exclude the agents of the property from sitting on the Grand Jury. He hoped the House would hesitate before it applied the knife to the institution, and that it would be found the recommendations of the Committee of 1868 could be carried into effect without embodying them in a Bill of this kind.

THE O'CONOR DON said, it was universally admitted that the present mode of conducting the fiscal business of the counties of Ireland was unsatisfactory, and he hoped the discussion would have the effect of still further pressing the subject on the attention of the Government, because it was hopeless, in his opinion, to think that any private Member could settle the question. Although the subject had been before them for a great length of time, nothing had yet been done, and he thought the reason nothing had been done was that hitherto they had been trying to do everything at once, and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had begun at the wrong end, and was attempting to make an organic charge so sweeping that the practical result would be that nothing would be done. He denied that the powers possessed by the Grand Jury were so great as was represented. Any English Member who knew nothing save what he had heard in the discussion would imagine that the Grand Jury had the exclusive power to regulate what the taxation should be; but they had no such powers. The Grand Jury had the same control over the expenditure that the House of Lords had over Money Bills—they could only pass or reject presentments which had been made to them by the presentment sessions—they could not pass a single county presentment with the exception of those matters covered by special powers, like those given under the Coercion Act: they had no power to originate expenditure, and they had no power to alter a presentment. The public appointments at the disposal of the Grand Jury were very few, and were not lucrative; but he should like a different system than the present with regard to appointments to prevail. He denied that the question they were now called upon to vote upon was the placing of county expenditure under the control of elective Boards. That was not what they had to give their votes upon; because the hon. and gallant Member for Galway did not in his Bill place the control of expenditure under an elective Board—it did not attempt to deal with the subject of presentment sessions at all. If they wished to do anything practical they must begin with the bodies that originated the expenditure. He did not know how the House of Commons could be asked off-hand to transfer the powers of a Grand Jury to a new body; and he believed, if he was right in his view of the law, that if this Bill was passed it would lead to unlimited confusion, because the powers of old Acts which had long passed away would be revived. Again, if the Bill passed, it would still leave the Grand Jury in possession of power for voting money to certain institutions. The great object they should aim at should be to convert the baronial sessions into a representative body. On the whole case, he thought they were weakening their chances by endeavouring at once to upset the system which now prevailed, and although the fiscal business was not so old as some thought, yet the system had been in existence for a long time, and it was so complicated in its character that if they wished to deal with it effectually the Government must give up half the Session to the consideration of the question.

Mr. MOORE said, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) spoke of the Grand Jury as a monstrous anomaly and as a grand old institution. How the legal mind could reconcile these conflicting terms it was difficult to imagine. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) proposed to substitute for the Grand Jury a body of men elected by people who were too readily subject to party and religious influences, but before that could be done it would be necessary to adopt a new system of electoral laws, which should exclude all such religious influences, and provide that the interference of any clergyman should void the election as much as bribery did under the present law. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down in most of the observations which had fallen from him, and although he did not seek to maintain that the composition of Grand Juries in Ireland was entirely faultless—indeed, there was no public institution of which that could be said—yet he did not see how the Government could take away from those bodies the powers with which they were at present invested in compliance with the wishes of a party who were pledged to promote new institutions, and who, instead of improving the fine old trunk, would rear up some little shrub of their own growth which would very soon be choked by the discord which would exist around it.

Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, though he admitted that it required many Amendments. He supposed that it was undisputed that the present representatives on the Grand Jury did not really represent the body of the ratepayers; and he took it for granted that the Government were alive to the necessity of having in Ireland presentment sessions which really represented the ratepayers of the country. As to the Grand Juries, which he for one had never charged with corruption, because he believed they performed their duties with great credit to themselves, he would merely suggest, by way of compromise, that each presentment sessions should be allowed to select one from among their own body to sit upon the Grand Jury for the transaction of its fiscal business.

Mr. MACARTNEY, while admitting that the present system of fiscal administration in counties in Ireland required reform, thought the question was one which could be dealt with satisfactorily only by the Government. All Irish Members who had spoken agreed that the cesspayers were not properly represented, and he thought the first step to be taken should be by the reform of the presentment sessions, leaving it to be ascertained by experience whether they would then work well with the present Grand Jury system. If that should turn out not to be the case, then the reforms might be continued, so as to give the cesspayers a real voice in the management of the fiscal business in counties. He saw no reason why Peers should be precluded from serving on Grand Juries.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was in favour of giving the people of Ireland the same popular voice in the control of their local affairs which existed in England; but there was a foreign priesthood exercising influence in Ireland that could not be trusted, and it was to that circumstance that the complicated state of the Grand Jury laws was attributable. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to dilate upon the paramount authority which, according to the Lord Chief Justice, was exercised by the priesthood, when—

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. Member to Order, observing that his remarks were not relevant to the Question before the House.

MR. WHALLEY proceeding in the same line of observation

MR. STACPOOLE rose to Order. He did not think the remarks of the hon. Member had anything to do with this Bill.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was aware that his remarks had nothing to do with the Bill under discussion, but they were quite pertinent to the motives by which his vote would be actuated. In his belief the paramount importance of this foreign authority underlaid the whole of the questions connected with Ireland, which threatened to give rise to interminable discussions during the present Session. In conclusion, he appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say how far, if at all, he recognized the existence and the influence to which he referred.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the question before the House was what kind of body for the purpose of local government and the management of local finance was best adapted for Ireland, and the institutions which other countries had adopted for this purpose had comparatively little bearing upon this question. In dealing with this subject we ought to attempt not only to secure that which in theory all would admit to be right—namely, that the cesspayers should be properly represented; but we ought also to bear in mind how far the present Governing Bodies had proved themselves economical, pure, and efficient in discharging their duties. He thought it could not be said that the County Grand Juries or even the presentment sessions in Ireland had been found wanting in these respects. In the evidence given before the Commissions and Committees which had investigated the subject there was the strongest testimony, even from adverse witnesses, as to the effective and economical working of the present system. We ought not, therefore, rashly and absolutely to sweep away a system which, however objectionable it might be in theory, had proved efficient in practice. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) proposed to abolish Grand Juries as far as their financial powers were concerned, and to transfer those powers to County Boards, elected according to the plan described in his Bill. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to entertain the idea that the Grand Juries had a real control over the whole of the £1,325,000 annually raised by county taxation. This, however, was not the case. The Committee of 1868 reported that practically the Grand Juries formed Courts of Appeal from decisions arrived at in the presentment sessions, and that they had comparatively little power in initiating local taxation, occupying much the same position towards the presentment sessions as the House of Lords did in relation to the House of Commons with regard to Money Bills. The fact was that the representative principle of Irish county government was to be found in the presentment sessions, and to alter the constitution of Grand Juries and make them a representative body while leaving the presentment sessions unreformed, would be much the same as if, in 1831, in order to secure a better representation of the people in Parliament, it had been proposed to make the House of Lords a representative body, leaving the House of Commons in its unreformed character. In the year 1875, out of £1,325,000 levied as Grand Jury cess, more than 50 per cent had, he believed been initiated at the presentment sessions, and had only been brought before the Grand Juries for confirmation and approval. Of this, £639,000 represented the expenditure on bridges and other works. Again, whatever was the constitution of the County Boards, a certain number of imperative presentments would have to be made by them. More than 14 per cent of the expenditure consisted of imperative presentments for the maintenance of lunatic asylums, for the valuation of the county, and the payment of the constabulary and the county officers appointed under statutes. If other items of the same kind were added, it would be found that, in 1874, nearly 25 per cent of the whole expenditure consisted of imperative presentments by the Grand Juries. Then there was an item of 8 per cent for prison expenditure. This was, to a certain extent, subject to the Board of Superintendence appointed by the Grand Juries, and it was still more subject to the law and the Government, so that the proposed County Boards would have no real control over that expenditure. Taking 50 per cent as the amount of taxation initiated by the presentment sessions, and the items he had mentioned as being imperative on the Grand Juries, it appeared that more than 87 per cent of the Grand Jury cess was beyond the control of the Grand Juries themselves. Consequently, it was a strong measure to propose to sweep away, for the sake of the remaining 13 per cent, a system which had taken deep root in Ireland, and which was very far from being as unpopular as the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had represented. Any real reform in the system ought to commence with the presentment sessions, which should be made, as they were intended to be by the law, really representative of the cesspayers. He adhered to the opinion which he had expressed with regard to that subject last year; and, in his judgment, the simplest mode of securing this real representation was that proposed to-day by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh). It was based on the Report of the Commission of 1842, of which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had spoken in terms of deserved respect. It would prevent an unnecessary multiplication of elections, and unnecessary expenditure in making a new register of voters; and while it saved trouble and expense it would secure the services of men who had already proved themselves fit and proper representatives of the people. The body proposed by the hon. Member for Carlow would be almost identical in its constitution with the present Highway Boards in England and Wales. In this way we might secure a system of road management for Ireland properly representative of the cesspayers and as efficient as the existing system. We in England had, he was sorry to say, much to learn from Ireland in the matter of road management, for everyone must admit that whatever might be the anomalies of the present system in Ireland, the Irish roads were good, while the English roads were often bad, though managed at additional expense. The Bill of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) proposed entirely to sweep away the existing financial powers of the Grand Juries. Now that was in direct opposition to the recommendations of the Commissioners of 1842 and 1868. In the hon. and gallant Member's Bill there was no provision for the representation of all the cesspayers. The hon. and gallant Member did not take into consideration cesspayers below £8, and even if the measure were amended so as to include them, a new register would have to be prepared at great trouble and expense. The proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was that each barony in every county should have four representatives, three to be elected by the cesspayers and one by the magistrates. There was also a provision that where there were more than 12 baronies in a county the Lord Lieutenant should have a vague power of reducing them to that number. In his opinion the hon. and learned Member's proposal would lead to such anomalies from the great difference in the size and rateable value of baronies in the same county, that it would be very far from being accepted as a reform by the people of Ireland. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway was to amend the system of county government in Ireland at the wrong end. It had been universally admitted that that system required amendment, in order to secure a better representation of the occupiers, although it should not be forgotten that whatever might be said of the present mode of summoning the Grand Juries, the owners of property had not complained that they were unfairly represented by them. He should approve a scheme resembling that of the hon. Member for Carlow, although of course he did not pledge himself to all the details of his Bill. One point ought to be very carefully considered—namely, as to whether it was for the public interest that agents should be admitted as representing the owners of property. It was on the lines he had indicated that he should wish to see the question approached; and if he were asked why he had not fulfilled the promise he held out to the House at the commencement of the last Session, he might say that he had not anticipated those protracted debates on an Irish measure which had not yet faded from the recollection of hon. Members. He was not without hopes that if the necessity arose he should be able to deal with the question this year on the lines he had indicated; but in the meantime the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlow would have his hearty support, because without sweeping away a system which was old and, as he believed, popular, it dealt with those points which really required reform, and was the most certain way to provide for the cesspayers a fair and proper representation in the management of their local affairs.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he did not wish to take a division on his own Bill, because he thought it more desirable that it should be taken on the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. For that purpose he would withdraw his Motion.

Mr. SPEAKER said, the Motion could not be withdrawn unless the Amendment was previously withdrawn.

Mr. KAVANAGH objected to the withdrawal of the Bill.

Mr. STACPOOLE wished all the Bills to be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. FAY believed that an improvement in the present system of Grand Juries in Ireland was imperatively required, but he did not approve of the proposals of the present Bill. As the Grand Juries were at present constituted, persons professing the Roman Catholic faith were—in the North of Ireland, at all events—excluded from all offices of emolument in connection with the collection of rates, the financial machinery of the counties, and the management of the local gaols and lunatic asylums.

Mr. H. HERBERT denied that the corruption which had been represented existed under the present Grand Jury system. He admitted that some faults existed which ought to be corrected; but he could not support this Bill, because no proof of improper conduct on the part of the Board had been proved before the Committee that had inquired into the matter.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN maintained, in opposition to the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the money of the cesspayers was not economically administered by Grand Juries. On the contrary, jobbery appeared to be the rule. He believed the Bill before the House would remove many evils of the system, and he gladly accorded the second reading his support.

Mr. BERESFORD declared that he had never known an instance in which a Grand Jury had been guilty of jobbery, and he spoke from great experience.

Mr. CALLAN spoke of the sectarian character of Grand Juries in the county of Armagh. There was only one Roman Catholic on it.

Mr. FRENCH thought the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlow might be made a good measure in Committee.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS, &c.
(IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 22.]

(Mr. Ronayne, Mr. Butt, Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Kavanagh.)

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 153; Noes 181: Majority 28.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

WILD FOWL PRESERVATION BILL.

(Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Rodwell.)

[BILL 42.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. BARCLAY rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [February 18] reported.

First Three Resolutions agreed to.

Fourth Resolution (Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department) postponed.

Next Four Resolutions agreed to.

Ninth and Tenth Resolutions (Salaries and Expenses of the Charity and Civil Service Commissions) postponed.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

Postponed Resolutions to be considered upon Friday.

DRUGGING OF ANIMALS BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN ASTLEY, Bill to make the administration of Poisonous Drugs and Compounds to Horses and other Animals a punishable offence, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN ASTLEY, Mr. CHAPLIN, and Mr. ROWNELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 85.]

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WHALLEY, Bill for affording facilities for vesting in the Metropolitan Board of Works Open Spaces, Gardens, and Squares in the Metropolitan District for the exercise and recreation of the public, and to empower owners and joint owners to enter into arrangements with the Metropolitan Board of Works in relation thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Sir GEORGE BOWYER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 86.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 24th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—University of Oxford (16).

NOXIOUS VAPOURS.—PETITION.

LORD WINMARLEIGH presented a Petition from a meeting of Lancashire and Cheshire Associations for controlling the escape of noxious vapours and fluids, and others, praying for amendment of the law respecting Noxious Vapours. The noble Lord said, that in 1863 an Act was passed dealing with noxious vapours evolved in certain manufacturing processes; it was limited in its operation, however, to those chemical works from which there was a large escape of muriatic gas. After that statute was passed the manufacture of chemicals had become a vast industry, and the number of alkali works in certain localities was largely increased. The consequence was that the Act of 1863 had proved insufficient to prevent the evils that it was intended to meet. In consequence, an Amendment Act was passed in 1874, by which the restrictions of the Act of 1863 were extended to other products. This Act, like the former, had, owing to the increase in the number of chemical works, proved insufficient to meet the evils which had since grown up. In the district with which he was himself connected alkali works had greatly increased in number of late years, there being 20 now for one that there was formerly; and an escape of 5 per cent being allowed by law, the whole escape was something very serious, and the consequences to property highly destructive. A meeting composed of persons deeply interested in the industry of Lancashire had consequently been held to consider the subject, and to deliberate on the best course to be adopted. Having represented Lancashire for many years in the other House, he knew what the difficulty was of legislating efficiently on the subject, and that difficulty was recognized at the meeting to which he referred. The Petitioners themselves were for the most part persons interested in the prosperity of manufactures, and consequently had no wish to interfere with these industries; but they felt that science could find a remedy for a state of things which was injuring health and destroying vegetation over large districts—there would therefore be no opposition to further legislation, provided it did not unduly restrict the operations of the different branches of manufacture and industry. At the present moment, however, such legislation had become an absolute necessity. No one could go through the country without being made uncomfortably aware of the presence of those noxious vapours. He had never seen worse destruction than they had caused on the estate of a friend of his in Cheshire. The trees upon it were like a forest of masts even in midsummer; and while formerly there were oaks upon it worth £100 a-piece, it would now be difficult to find one worth as many shillings; and from being in possession of one of the finest spots in the country, he was now seriously thinking of withdrawing from it altogether. The persons by whom the Petition was signed, which he now begged to present, certainly had ground for feeling aggrieved by the manner in which they had been treated. He wished to urge on the Government that they should either appoint a Royal Commission for taking the subject off their hands, or else take it into their own hands and allow science and legislation to apply the appropriate remedy.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND expressed his opinion that an exhaustive examination of the subject would be a national benefit, and gave Notice that he should move for the appointment of a Royal Commission for dealing with the subject.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that his noble Friend (Lord Winmarleigh) had understated rather than overstated the case. He knew the property to which his noble Friend had made particular reference, and could testify that it was in a deplorable state. He could assure their Lordships that the Government felt the importance of the subject. It was already under the notice of the President of the Local Government Board, and if a remedy for the evil could be found no one would be more willing to adopt it than the Government; but, having regard to the number of measures already in hand, he could not promise the production of any Bill to deal with it at a very early period.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose, pursuant to Notice, to draw attention to the Report of the Commission upon the Revenues of the University of Oxford; and to present a Bill on that subject:—and said—My Lords, in fulfilment of a promise given in the Queen's Speech, I have to call attention to the subject of University Education. There are not now many in this House who can remember when the last University Bill was in the House of Lords—probably the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Harrowby) was one of the few; but many of those who were in the House of Commons at the time that Bill was under discussion there, probably retain a lively recollection of the animated controversy which it excited in that House. It may be worth while, therefore, before entering on a consideration of another University Bill to remind your Lordships of the principles embodied in the Act of 1854. And what were they? The Act was introduced under no small amount of excitement, and with considerable expectation on the part of those by whom it was promoted and supported, and considerable apprehension on the part of those who did not approve of it. The second reading was passed without opposition in either House of Parliament, but the details were subjected to serious scrutiny and modification. Both Parties in the State may be regarded as responsible for the measure which was ultimately placed upon the Statute Book. The principal portion of the Act was directed to an entire reconstruction of the government and legislative machinery of the University. With respect to that portion of the Act, I have no proposition to make. On the point of re-arrangement the Act has been evidently a success. It has given a life and vigour to the University, and the changes have been effected with as much peace as was consistent with the excited feelings with which University questions are generally discussed. It is not my intention, therefore, to interfere with that part of the Act which refers to the constitution of the University. Another point which at the time was considered to be of great importance has been also subjected to the test of experience, and it is instructive to note the answer which in this case experience has given to speculation. One of the points on which the Government of the day dwelt most earnestly was that provision in the Act which gave leave to Masters of Arts to set up Halls in the

Lord Winmarleigh

University. This was advocated on the ground that such Halls would afford a good means of providing for a poorer class of undergraduates advantages similar to those enjoyed by them at our own Universities in the Middle Ages, and similar to those which they now enjoy on the Continent. On the other hand, it was argued that the setting up of those Halls would be attended with results injurious to the discipline of the University. This provision was looked upon by the supporters of the Act as of great importance, and by the Opposition of that day with great dread. Well, the provision enabling Masters of Arts to set up those Halls was placed on the Statute Book, and what has been the result? The result is that one Master set up a Hall, and that there are four undergraduates in it. That is the end of all those hopes and all those fears. Some 12 years afterwards the University, taking the matter in its own hands and guided by that wisdom which practical experience alone can give, devised a plan of its own to admit the less wealthy classes to the training of the University. The University sought no Act of Parliament for this purpose. It required none. It devised what is known as the system of unattached students. The result which seven years' experience of this system enables the University to present is very curious—very remarkable. In 1868-9, when it commenced, the entries of undergraduates as unattached students were 53; and from that time they have gone on increasing year by year, so that in 1875 they were 185, which is, I think, a very respectable number. More than that—the Commissioners say that the character of those unattached students, both as to their attention to studies and moral conduct, is as high as could be found with students of the highest class. From that failure and that success I draw one moral—which is that things of this kind are better done by the Universities themselves than by Parliament. Here we are able to compare two experiments made in the same direction—the one by an Act of Parliament, which is barren; the other by the University, which has struck its roots into the soil and given in experience an abundant and a satisfactory result. I need not, however, say that even in such matters it may be well for Parliament to aid the University by the appropriation of larger funds for the object in view, if funds can be made available for the purpose; but the opinion I wish to express is that it is not necessary to interfere with a system which is thriving so well. A third point in the Act of 1854 was the application of the revenues of the colleges. In respect of that, undoubtedly, there has not been the same satisfaction as has been derived from the other points with which the Act dealt. There are constant complaints that the revenues of the University are not spent in as useful a manner as they might be, and that things remain undone which might be done if there were a more judicious outlay of some portion of those revenues. This it was which led to the appointment by the late Government of the Commission presided over by the Duke of Cleveland, and whose inquiry was to be as to the revenues of the colleges as they at present exist, and as they might be expected to exist at a definite time. That Commission reported towards the close of 1874. In one sense it was a most satisfactory Report. It showed that the idea—if the idea ever existed—that the colleges mismanaged their property was wholly without foundation. They say—

“The cost of the management as presented in the synoptical table appears to us very low. On the whole external income it only averages £2 15s. 10d. per cent.”

I think, my Lords, the owners of private estates would consider that a very satisfactory management of their own properties as regards the cost. Again the Commissioners remark—

“The average lettings, the absence of arrears, and the apparently small amount of losses from tenants testify to the care and vigilance of the Bursars.”

I think, therefore, my Lords, that there is nothing in the management of the property of the University to call for the censure or even for the interference of Parliament. But, on the other hand, the Commissioners go on to notice, as one remarkable thing arising out of their inquiry, a point to which it would have been impossible not to direct the attention of Parliament. One point brought prominently out in the result of the inquiry is the great disparity between the property and income of the several colleges and the number of the members. When that number is small the expense of the staff and establishment is large in proportion. And now let me explain why we undertook to legislate on the University at all. It is a work I undertook with great reluctance, and I do not think Her Majesty's Government would have entered upon it at all if they had not felt that there was an absolute necessity for their so doing. It is not desirable, if it can be avoided, that the interference of Parliament should be invoked, because such interference is calculated to disturb the studies of the University and to excite hopes that cannot be realized. But when we came to look at certain figures and the deductions that lay in those figures, we felt it would be idle to think that Parliament could abstain from interfering, or that we could conscientiously recommend Parliament to do so. I will venture to put before your Lordships what I know are hostile figures. I say that the view of those figures I am about to submit is the hostile view, because it is a superficial view; I know that they are capable of very much modification—but this superficial view of those figures will be the one that will be popularly taken, and makes the interference of Parliament inevitable. In the first place, it is calculated that within the next 15 years an addition of no less than £123,000 a-year will be made to the collegiate revenues. It may be said—"If this addition is only expected 15 years hence, why interfere thus early?" But your Lordships know that any changes made in the application of the revenues of the University will only take effect after a lapse of time, inasmuch as existing interests have to be respected; and if 15 years elapse before the income of the University is increased by the sum I have named, that will be about the time at which these changes now proposed will be fully carried out. Again, it is not only the prospective income of the college which is to be regarded—we have an actual income to examine. Taking together the whole corporate income and tuition fees, but deducting money borrowed and money received on behalf of the University, and other necessary deductions, it appears that the average income per undergraduate in all the colleges is £203. But when we come from the colleges as a whole to particular colleges we have very different results. The income per undergraduate in all the colleges is £203; but in Exeter it is only £97, in Trinity £96, and in Baliol £75. If University education were provided in all the colleges as cheaply as at Exeter, there would be at present a saving annually of £165,578; as cheaply as at Trinity, there would be a saving annually of £167,129; or as cheaply as at Baliol, a saving annually of £197,700. In any of these cases there would be a very large saving, and with such figures before us, on the surface of the Report, I hold that it would be impossible to avoid dealing with the question. I do not say that this is otherwise than a partial and hostile statement. I do not say that these figures are not capable of explanation, but under the circumstances as they appear legislation cannot be avoided. Of course, there are exceptional charges which have to be defrayed by some colleges, in connection with additional buildings or the management of estates, or with respect to museums or libraries. There may be other circumstances which will explain the difference between the colleges. I only quote the figures to show that in this case action on the part of Parliament would not be a gratuitous and wanton interference by the State. It may be urged that the colleges individually may come and ask to have the necessary legislative changes. But another and great complaint is that, while the colleges are rich, the University is poor, and you cannot expect that the result of an application by each college would be a scheme which would work economically for the whole. You might as well expect economy and good order to result from the proceedings of 20 different architects building a club-house, each of whom came forward with a plan of one room in the club-house to suit his own views. But where does the money go? The £200,000 is not thrown into the sea. With a great number of different bodies, some large and some small, of course the expense of the small bodies will be out of proportion to that of the large ones. The real gist of the whole question lies in the Fellowships and in the giving men £250 and £300 a-year without any duties attached to the Fellowships in right of which they receive that amount. I do not believe that any one starting fresh in the matter would ever think of establishing rewards of that kind. They are, no, doubt, given for success in certain examinations; but these are not of a remarkably high order, and several of a similar kind are held every year. A sum of £250 or £300 is attached to Fellowships to which no duties are attached, and the man who receives it may, if he chooses, remain in idleness for life. No one would now for the first time suggest such an arrangement. It is not only out of all proportion to the service for which it is a reward, but it is out of all keeping with the course adopted in respect of all other positions in life. If a man succeeds in the Army, you promote him, but give him a more responsible command; in the Church, if a man succeeds, you make him a Bishop, and give him ten times more labour. In the Civil Service, when you give a man increased pay, you call on him to fill an office of higher trust. Only in this case of Fellowships to which no duties are attached do you reward merit by absolute idleness. It is against the whole law of public life. In public life, if a man succeeds, you give him more important work, but not idleness. Throughout the whole of English life the principle of the reward of success is the giving an opportunity for harder work, but not idleness. In the Bill of 1854 the authors of that Bill saw the evil and endeavoured to provide against it. They suggested that there should be work attached to those Fellowships. But there was great opposition. In the end Commissioners were appointed; and the Commissioners, though they wished to make a fundamental alteration, did not care to make an effectual alteration. The plan of "idle Fellowships" was not in accordance with the designs of the Founders, who always attached residence and duties to the Fellowships. I should not have encouraged the Commissioners to interfere with old endowments, but if they did I should have wished them to carry out their own plans thoroughly in the interests of education. I am afraid they adopted a compromise maintaining the appearance of one system while adopting another. But they had to contend against great difficulties. At all events, it is a comfort to know that the University has become thoroughly alive to the evil of this state of things, and from it we shall meet with no opposition in applying such remedy as may be thought necessary. It seems that if all these "idle Fellowships" were to be done away with and no one were to hold a Fellowship without doing educational work, we should save—I will not say that I am speaking very accurately—a sum of £50,000 to £60,000 or £80,000. That, under an improved system, could be applied to University purposes. There are now from 220 to 230 of these Fellowships not filled by any person occupying an educational office. At £250 per Fellow that would give a disposable sum of £55,000 a-year. These are monies we have got in hand. First I will ask, what are the objects to which it is desirable those resources should be applied? My Lords, I should shrink from defining the objects by any answer of a theoretical nature, for a reason which I have already given—that these matters had better be left to the practice and experience of the University itself; but I should suggest that the recommendations of the Committee of the Hebdomadal Council afford a good indication of present requirements. That Committee speaks of a new library, new museums, and new schools, and that for them there would be an immediate demand for £110,000. They also say that additional rooms are required for the Professors and for public lectures, and for unattached students and local examinations. I think I may estimate that a capital sum amounting, on the whole, to £210,000 would be required for those objects. This would represent, according to the usual rate of interest on buildings, £12,000 a-year. Besides that, the Committee of the Hebdomadal Council press strongly the necessity of increased remuneration for those who are engaged in academical education—and no one can for a moment look at the facts without seeing that at Oxford is singularly below that afforded to persons engaged in professional occupations elsewhere. There are Professors at £800, £600, £300, £200, and even at £100. Compare those annual stipends with what is paid in other departments. If a man is a great clergyman, you make him a Bishop and give him £5,000. Your highest classes of Civil Servants have from £1,500 to £2,000, in the India Office the Indian Councillors have £1,200. I need not in this audience say what are the incomes given to successful politicians; but in whatever direction you make the comparison the sums paid to the Professors at Oxford seem miserably low as measured with those paid to men in other professions. And that is in these days, when the competition is not for men to get places, but for places to get men. I do not believe that less than £1,000 a-year, with a fair pension besides, will secure the highest talent for these Professorships. You must remember that the times have changed since all the teachers at Oxford were clergymen and had the endowments of the Church for a reward. The teachers are not clergymen now, and if we want to get the best men we must get them from other sources than that which formerly supplied them. I do not know that what is available from the whole of the "idle" Fellowships will be required for University purposes, and I do not venture to lay down the principle that no Fellowship should exist which would give the holder no educational work and which should last for a few years. It may be wise to maintain a few of them, limiting the holding of them to a certain number of years; but I do venture to lay down that all the University wants in the shape of museums, libraries, lecture-rooms, and the proper payment of teachers should be provided for before the subject of furnishing incomes to men who do nothing can be entertained. My Lords, these being the objects we have in view, it may be well to state what money we hold to be available. In the Report of the Commissioners a distinction is drawn between the general income of the colleges and the money held by them in trust—those which they hold for trusts not yet executed. We propose to interfere very little with trusts. The Commissioners are to make no statute affecting any University or college emolument unless the endowment has taken effect for more than 100 years; and where the trust has existed from before that period, they shall, unless it has ceased to be observed, or has been varied by Act of the Legislature pay regard to the main design of the Founder, while the details by which it is to be carried out may be properly modified to meet altered circumstances. But besides these two classes of trust funds, there would still remain a vast residue of revenue over which they would be able to exercise control and to apply for such purposes as they thought best. There is a large amount of property the trusts of which they cannot, so to speak, "ear-mark," or say that it had descended from the Founder for any particular college—all we can say is that from the first they have been regarded as designed for the general purposes of the University. Where the trusts have not been departed from, the Government propose to adhere to them; but with the other revenues, which had already been made subject to successive changes, the Government consider that it is open to them to deal with as Parliament should think fit. Your Lordships will recollect that the legislation of 1854 was commenced with a Bill containing minute provisions directing how various changes were to be made, what arrangements were to be made, what principles were to be adhered to, and what kind of machinery was to be employed; but as time went on it was found impossible to settle all these details by Act of Parliament, and a Commission was subsequently appointed. We propose now to begin at the point where the Act of 1854 ended. We propose to provide by means of the present Bill that each college in the University shall have an opportunity during some 18 or 20 months after the passing of the Act of drawing up and laying of statutes before the Commissioners to be appointed under the Bill, and on such statutes receiving the approval of the Commissioners they shall become law. After the end of the year 1877, as to such colleges as shall not have pursued the course provided by the Bill, the Commissioners will step into the places of the Universities and the Colleges respectively, and they will have power to promulgate statutes which will be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and if not objected to by either House will become law. Under the Act of 1854 the power given to the Commissioners was checked by a provision which enabled two-thirds of the voting power in any college to reject any proposal which they deemed prejudicial to their own particular college. Under the Bill to which I am now asking the attention of your Lordships, this will be altered by reason of the fact that we are proposing to apply the endowments for the benefit of the University generally. I may say that we propose so to provide for the appointment of the Commissioners as that the wishes of the University generally in reference to questions affecting its revenues shall not be disregarded. With respect to the individual colleges, we propose that before the Commissioners proceed to deal with questions affecting particular colleges such colleges shall have the power to nominate three Members to sit with the Commissioners, in order that while the revenues of such colleges shall be applied to objects calculated to benefit the University as a whole, the interests of single colleges shall not be affected in a manner which could prove unduly injurious. Your Lordships will see that such a scheme as this depends very much upon the Commissioners to be appointed, and I will not, therefore, discuss it further until the names are before your Lordships. I should have preferred that the wisdom of Parliament could have laid down the lines upon which the Commissioners shall act; but as an attempt in that direction failed in 1854, when a strong Government was backed by a fierce enthusiasm for reform, I think it would be a conspicuous and an egregious error to attempt anything of the kind now. All I have to do now is to show what duties the Commissioners will have to perform. We propose that in dealing with the University the Commissioners may make provision from time to time for affording further or better instruction in art or science; for providing endowments for professorships or lectureships; for erecting and endowing professorships or lectureships on arts or sciences not already taught in the University; for providing new or improving existing buildings, libraries and museums, and collections and apparatus. The proposal with regard to the colleges is somewhat similar, and also provides that college revenues may be applied to the maintenance and benefit of persons of known ability and learning, who may be engaged in study or research in the realms of art and science in the University. The only point in this connection to which I wish to call attention is that referring to "research." We are of opinion that the mere duty of communicating knowledge to others does not fulfil all the functions of an University, and that the best Universities in former times have been those in which the instructors, in addition to imparting learning, were engaged in adding new stores to the already acquired accumulation of knowledge. There are new sciences which have gained and others which are pressing for admission to the Universities, and I think no one can doubt that it is for the interest alike of the students and of the nation at large that such sciences should have full encouragement. As instruments for the culture of the human mind the classics will always retain a superior place; but there are many minds on which the influence of the classics falls with little or no effect, and which are so constituted by nature that it is only from the harder and more exact branches they can obtain the development which is necessary for their perfecting. In their interest alone, therefore, it is desirable that the study of the exact sciences and of the sciences which rest upon the investigation of nature should be fully encouraged. I need not say how far such studies are for the benefit of the nation at large. Another consideration which weighs upon me in urging the claims of research to a full recognition is that in recent times it has suffered some detriment from the fact that it has been pursued by men who have not possessed arms sufficiently robust to enable them to fight their way. I have no doubt that when the pursuit of research is encouraged and made a part of the regular and recognized machinery of the University, this state of things will cease — we all know the difference between Office and Opposition. What I am particularly anxious for is that all branches of culture should have equal encouragement, and should be regarded, not as rivals, but as allies in the great and difficult task of cultivating and developing the human mind. There is little else with which I need trouble your Lordships. The Universities have, no doubt, a difficult task in the present age to perform, and they need all the assistance which you can give them. They have, at a time when every branch of human knowledge is progressing at railway speed, to maintain themselves, as it were, at the head of the advancing column, and not to lose their precedence and power. The Universities have hitherto united a singular reverence for what is past with a willingness to admit and recognize the value of those gifts of discovery which the future may have in store for them. They are in some respects analogous to that union of order and freedom which we politically look upon as the only security for the stability of any State. And we feel in the present chaos of opinion, at a time when beliefs of all kinds and on all subjects appear to be loosening their hold, it is of especial value to give every facility to, and to take every opportunity of maintaining in their fullest efficiency, institutions which combine those dispositions of mind on which alone any sound and progressive culture can rest. The noble Marquess concluded by presenting the Bill of which he moved the First Reading.

Bill for making further provision respecting the government of the University of Oxford, and of the Colleges therein. Presented by the Marquess of Salisbury.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1st."

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE observed that the noble Marquess had confined his speech exclusively to the University of Oxford, but his observations had, with some modifications, a general bearing also upon the University of Cambridge. He trusted to hear that it was the intention of the Government to propose legislation in respect of the latter University during the present year. The announcement in Her Majesty's gracious Speech that it was proposed to deal with the subject of the Universities had, he might venture to say, been received with great satisfaction at Cambridge. The colleges already possessed considerable powers, but there were such difficulties in making use of them that without the interference, or rather assistance, of Parliament, it was not probable that anything effectual would be done.

THE EARL OF MORLEY expressed a hope that ample time would be given to their Lordships and to the University to consider the provisions of this important measure. It was most desirable that noble Lords should have full time for communicating with those engaged in academical teaching.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY agreed that it would be quite out of place to discuss at present a measure of which they were only partially in possession. He would observe, however, that the whole excellence of the proposed scheme must depend upon the selection of the Commissioners who were to carry it into effect. He had every confidence that the greatest care would be taken to select men who would command the confidence not only of the Universities, but of the whole country. A short time had passed since the last Commission reported; but of those who sat upon that Commission only two, he believed, were still living—Lord Harrowby and the Dean of Wells. The Universities owed a debt of gratitude to those Commissioners for the work which they performed under very great difficulties, and discouragement. He ventured also to say that the Universities and the country also owed something to the original Commission, of which he had the honour of being a Member, and which, under still greater disadvantages, first originated some of those changes which had borne good fruit in the Universities and produced great benefit to the country. He believed that whatever further benefits would arise from the present proposal would be greatly owing to the labours of those two Commissions. He fully concurred with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that it would be altogether out of place to attempt to carry any reforms which were not approved by the Universities themselves. Those who had practical experience were of course those who would be likely successfully to carry forward reforms in these matters. But, looking to the past, he could not conceal from himself that it was desirable that a little external pressure should be brought to bear upon the Universities, and that it would not do to trust either the Universities or the colleges with the entire management of the reforms, for he believed they were not an exception to the rule which had been found to exist everywhere, that hardly any corporation was capable of entirely reforming itself without external pressure. He desired to call the attention of the noble Marquess to one other point. It was, he gathered, by no means the intention of the Government to absorb all the revenues of which he spoke in such a manner as that no "idle Fellowships," as the noble Marquess called them, should hereafter exist. Those "idle Fellowships" might, he thought, be a little misunderstood. No doubt, men who for years past had done nothing for the University and but little for the community should yet be in the enjoyment of Fellowships was a great evil; but he thought it would also be an evil if in all cases the gaining of a Fellowship were immediately to be followed by a giving up of himself on the part of the Fellow to the profession of teaching, or even to a residence in the University and the carrying on of research. He thought Fellows should be allowed to enjoy their Fellowships for a term of years. They all knew that there was scarcely any profession to which the new Fellow could devote himself in which, during the first few years, he would not have a struggle to maintain himself; and greatly would the value of the prizes of the University be diminished if the young men who obtained them did not feel that they were securing for themselves, at least, for a few years, the means of meeting the difficulties which awaited them, and ultimately of distinguishing themselves in those professions to which they purposed to devote their lives. In conclusion, he trusted that the measure would, as it deserved, receive the full attention of their Lordships and the country, and he could not but hope that the University to which he had the honour to belong would be greatly benefited by the proposals of Her Majesty's Government.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in reply, said he was anxious not to be misunderstood by the most reverend Prelate. He hoped he should not be thought drawing a too minute distinction when he endeavoured to point out the difference between an "idle Fellow" and an "idle Fellowship." An idle Fellowship might be filled by a very busy man. He did not desire to cast any reflection upon those who held those Fellowships—all he desired was that in filling them for the future the educational wants of the University should be first considered before any other claim was entertained. The Government did not propose to do more than indicate the general tendency of their views to the Commissioners, as they should never approve tying them down, say, to allowing of the existence of no Fellowships but such as were associated with University work. With respect to what had fallen from the noble Duke (the Duke of Devonshire) they were but following precedent by dealing with one University at a time. The Oxford Bill was introduced one year (1854), and that affecting Cambridge two years after. They did not, however, mean to follow precedent so far as that—all he meant to say was that it was less confusing to have one Bill at a time before Parliament. Should the present Bill, on examination, meet with the approval of Parliament, a Bill in respect of Cambridge University would then be introduced. The noble Earl who spoke next (the Earl of Morley) had asked that ample time should be given for the consideration of the Bill; but he was sure the noble Earl would not wish to see the measure run upon the sands of July. His view, to which he supposed no Peer would be inclined to offer any opposition, was that it would be better to fix the second reading for a tolerably early day, and so allow more time for the Committee—for he imagined the Committee would take more time than the second reading. He therefore proposed to take the second reading on that day fortnight.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 1st accordingly; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>d</sup> on Thursday the 9th of March next (No. 16).

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 24th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS—Jacob Bright, esquire (made Affirmation), for Manchester; Frederick St. John Newdegate Barne, esquire (sworn), for Suffolk County (Eastern Division).

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—EXCHEQUER BONDS (£4,080,000).

SELECT COMMITTEE—Turnpike Acts Continuance, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading—Colonial Marriages * [87].

Second Reading—Marriages (Saint James, Buxton) * [79]; Wild Fowl Preservation * [42], debate further adjourned.

Third Reading—United Parishes (Scotland) * [62], and passed.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir James Hogg.)

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, on the ground that it contained a clause giving the Home

Secretary power to dispense with the obligation cast upon the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Metropolitan Streets Improvement Act, 1872, to set aside a portion of any lands in the metropolis purchased by them for the erection of dwellings for the labouring classes. He should, however, have no objection to the measure passing, provided the Metropolitan Board of Works would consent to substitute other lands for that purpose, if it were inconvenient to appropriate a portion of the lands immediately in question for the erection of such buildings.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Sidney Waterlow.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JAMES HOGG undertook to insert a clause in Committee in accordance with the hon. Member's suggestion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY BILL.

(By Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, complained of the unusual course taken by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord C. J. Hamilton), a Director of the Great Eastern Railway Company, in moving the rejection of this measure on its second reading. The noble Lord had given Notice to read one portion only of the Bill—which contained many other subjects—that day six months. That portion was an extension of the Metropolitan Railway, supported by the Board of Works, from High Street, Aldgate, to the crossing of the East London Railway on the Bow Road. Yet the whole Bill was to go because the Great Eastern objected to one small part of it. He declined to discuss the merits of the Bill, which the House remitted to Select Committees.

Sir Sidney Waterlow

But he claimed the right to be heard, as a constitutional right for the Petitioners for this Bill. There was nothing in the Bill contrary to precedent, and he hoped the House would not refuse to read it a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, this was an "omnibus" Bill, giving the Metropolitan Railway Company power to make extensions in different parts of the metropolis; but the part to which he wished to draw particular attention was what was called "the Whitechapel extension." On more than one occasion Committees had declined to sanction schemes by this Company for extensions to Whitechapel until they had fulfilled their obligation to complete the Inner Circle; and this proposal was even more objectionable than the plan rejected in 1874, because it related to an isolated single line having no connection with the Metropolitan or any other railway. It would, therefore, be of no advantage to the public. The Great Eastern Railway Company, of which he was a Director, had spent £4,000,000 in making their new Liverpool Street Station and bringing their line on a level with the Metropolitan, and yet if this Bill passed the passengers who came by the Great Eastern from all parts of the North would be unable to go East, and could only travel to the West of London. The object of the Bill was to relieve the Metropolitan Railway Company from obligations imposed on it by Parliament, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Lord Claud Hamilton.)

MR. SAMUDA remarked that the Bill would not contribute to the completion of what was known as the Inner Circle. It was a line which had no beginning and no end, which came to a dead lock at the East End of London, and was in no sense an extension of an existing railway. Moreover, it was a single line. The real object of the promoters was to occupy the ground, and to prevent other persons coming to Parliament hereafter. He should, therefore, vote for the Amendment moved by the noble Lord.

MR. RITCHIE supported the Amendment because his constituents objected to the proposal which the Bill was intended to authorize. He protested against the opponents of any measure of this kind being dragged year after year, at considerable expense, before Parliamentary Committees until their resources were exhausted, and they were compelled to give up their contest with a wealthy Company.

MR. GORDON trusted the House would not throw out the Bill, because a portion of it would be very beneficial to Chelsea and Fulham.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that unless it were shown that this line was absolutely necessary for the good of the public, and that the Bill did not mean an indefinite postponement of the completion of the Inner Circle, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. RAIKES remarked that this was an "omnibus" Bill, and opposition had been offered with respect to one only of four lines which it was proposed to construct. Some opposition was offered as regarded Whitechapel, and it was urged that as there was a deficiency of railway accommodation for East London, the Circle ought in the first instance to be completed. In dealing with such a Bill, however, the interests of Chelsea ought to be considered, as well as those of the Tower Hamlets. It might be desirable to adopt some of these Bills, which might be dealt with according to their individual merits. At the same time there were objections to the Bill besides those mentioned by the noble Lord; one being that the contractor was to be paid by a rent-charge, which was to have precedence over all other rent-charges granted by the Company, except those granted to landowners. Another and a stronger objection was that the Bill would enable the Company to pay interest—that was to say, in his opinion, dividends—out of capital. Weighing the arguments pro and con., if that clause were abandoned, and the House might do well to read the Bill a second time, and if it were sent to a strong Committee, a sound conclusion might be arrived at;

but for himself he would not vote for the Bill until the hon. Member for Hythe gave an assurance that the clause which enabled the Company to pay interest out of capital should be expunged.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he did not think the clause referred to would enable the Company to pay dividends out of capital; it was not intended to do any such thing, and a similar power was given to the Great Eastern Railway in 1872. The rent-charge clause was such as that enacted by Parliament in the Metropolitan District (Hammersmith) Act of 1874. The clause alluded to would be expunged in deference to the opinion of the hon. Member for Chester. There was no precedent for rejecting such a Bill upon the second reading, and the Amendment was avowedly in opposition to only one out of 22 separate objects.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 194: Majority 69.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

MARKET — BUBBLE COMPANIES, FRAUDULENT PRACTICES, &c.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to recent disclosures in the Courts of Law, before a Committee of this House, and otherwise, Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to protect the investing public against the fraudulent practices by which prices in the money market are rigged, protective rules are defeated by fictitious allotments and sales, and Companies are floated and managed by professional promoters through directors having little or no real stake in them?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is to be hoped the investing public will themselves be more careful in future than they have hitherto been. However, I should be glad to see the law made stronger in the direction indicated by the hon. Member, and with that view I have submitted the question to those most competent to advise me. Should their recommendation be favourable, a Bill on the subject will no doubt be introduced.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL gave Notice that he would take the earliest opportunity of proposing the following Resolution, which he hoped would strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the law and the criminal procedure should be adapted to deal adequately with the forms of fraud now prevalent. The failure of great limited companies and the collapse of other financial enterprises, causing loss to large numbers of the public, should be made the subject of judicial inquisition, as in the case of shipwrecks and corrupt elections, and all persons found on such inquiry to have acted fraudulently should be prosecuted by a public authority."

ORDNANCE SURVEY—THE CIVIL ASSISTANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any alterations with reference to the position of the Civil Assistants in the Ordnance Survey Branch of the Office of Works?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that the Civil assistants were divided into two classes. The first, who were entered before the year 1870, were recognized as permanent officers, and were entitled to superannuation. The Government had decided they could make no alteration in the status of those gentlemen. The other class had been entered since 1870. They were never considered as permanent Civil servants. They were not examined before the Civil Service Commission, and were not entitled to superannuation. Recently they had had the opportunity of stating their case before the Commission, presided over by the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), and the Report made was that the nature of their employment did not admit of their being included in any general scheme for the Civil Service.

SUMMARY ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has considered the Memorial of the Annual Trades'

Mr. Assheton Cross

Union Congress presented to him by a deputation on the 11th of November last, praying an inquiry into the appointment and supervision of magistrates and the summary administration of justice; suggesting the right of the accused to trial by jury in cases of assault, and urging the clear separation of civil from criminal matters, and the reconsideration of the whole subject of imprisonment, whether in respect of unpaid costs or fines, or by direct sentences; whether his attention has been called to the imprisonment of 3,232 persons in 1874 for want of sureties; and, whether he intends to propose any inquiry or alteration of the law as prayed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had taken into consideration the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member, and that he was in hopes of being able, in the course of the Session, to propose some legislation on the subject.

THE SUEZ CANAL—MODIFICATION OF THE CANAL DUES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps have signed the final documents relating to the modification of the Suez Canal dues; and, whether that modification has been approved by the Khedive, the Porte, and the Maritime Powers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have already informed the House that communications have been going on between Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps on the subject mentioned. Of course, no modifications of the dues of the Suez Canal that might be agreed upon could be adopted until they had been considered and approved by the Khedive, the Porte, and the Maritime Powers who were parties to the Conference. The proceedings between Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps have made very satisfactory progress; but as Colonel Stokes is expected soon to return to this country, it would be better not to enter more fully into the subject at present.

ARMY—STAFF-SERGEANTS OF MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will take into his consideration the retiring pensions of the Staff Sergeants of Militia, who, after twenty years' service, only receive the same amount as Drummers, viz., five pence a-day, whereas up to the year 1852 Sergeants had one shilling a-day on discharge?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that it was his intention to refer that question to the Committee sitting on Army Pensions, so that they might go into that question also, and he hoped to receive a report on the subject.

SPAIN—TONNAGE DUES. — QUESTION.

MR. SAMUDA asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is a fact that the Spanish Government is levying one-third more Tonnage Dues on Coal arriving in English ships than was levied prior to the 1st day of January 1876; and, if, as stated in reply to protests by the ship masters, that this is done in regard to a new Treaty of Commerce between England and Spain, to ask if any such Treaty exists to justify such demand for additional Tonnage Dues, and if any new Treaty absolves Spain from granting to this Country the most favoured Nation Clause, as it is reported that these additional Tonnage Dues have been demanded only from cargoes in British ships?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, with respect to the last part of the Question, that there was no new Treaty in existence on the subject. There was no claim on the part of Spain to treat England differently to any other country, though no doubt considerable complaint had been made by British ship-owners and others with regard to the measure of the tonnage of coals and other commodities. This had arisen from the Spanish Government having adopted a new style of measurement, which they seemed to be at a loss to carry out in a proper manner, and the consequence was that some ships were measured under one erroneous application of the system, whilst others were measured according to the old Spanish system. These things applied not only to England, but to other Powers also; and the Foreign Office had complained to the Spanish Government, pointing out the great hardship inflicted upon British shipowners, and the same view had been adopted by other Governments. There was every hope that these representations would have their effect upon the Spanish Government.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION — REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Special Committee on Police Superannuation may be expected; and, whether he intends to introduce any measure dealing with the subject during the present Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Committee upon this subject was appointed last Session, but they did not conclude their labours in the course of the Session, and certain information had to be procured before they could make a satisfactory Report. There had been delay in printing the information; but when it was ready the re-appointment of the Committee would be moved, and no doubt they would then make their final Report.

ARMY—MILITIA QUARTER-MASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he had under his consideration the present retiring allowances granted to Militia Quarter-masters; and whether he can hold out any expectation that an improved scale will be adopted?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he was sorry to say he could not hold out any hope that an improved scale would be adopted. The reasons he had to give for that decision were too long to state in answer to a Question; but he should be happy to submit them to the hon. Gentleman.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK CORNER.

QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will state what are the positive objections and defects in the plan proposed by himself last year to amend the traffic in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park Corner; whether the objections to these alterations now prove to be insuperable; and, whether therefore the proposed alterations may be considered to be now finally abandoned; and, if so, whether any other plan for improving the traffic in that locality, which is yearly increasing, appears to him to be feasible?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In answer to the noble Lord, with every desire to give him every information in my power, I fear that the ordinary limits of an Answer to a Parliamentary Question will prevent my stating in detail the objections which led to the abandonment of the Green Park Road scheme. My noble Friend next asks whether these objections were insuperable, and to that I have only to assure him that if I had not believed those objections to be insuperable I should not of my own unbiased judgment have relinquished a scheme which I had myself devised and hoped would add to the convenience of the inhabitants of London. The third paragraph refers to my future action in this matter, and bearing in mind the confessions of failure I have so recently made at this Table, I do hope my noble Friend will not expect or ask me to burden myself with any more pledges respecting it at the present time.

METROPOLIS — REPAVING THE STREETS.—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the honourable and gallant Member for Truro, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works have any voice in the time of year selected for repaving the streets of London; and, consequently, whether it is with their sanction or authority that February and March, the two first months of the Session of Parliament, have been selected for the purpose of taking up and repaving the whole of the important thoroughfare of Piccadilly?

SIR JAMES HOGG: In answer to the Question of the noble Lord, I beg to inform him that the Metropolitan Board of Works has no voice in the time of year selected for repaving the streets of London, and consequently it is not with their sanction or authority that February and March have been selected for repaving a portion of Piccadilly, not the whole, as stated by the noble Lord. The Board has a power of veto as regards the closing of streets, and did object in this particular instance to the entire closing of Piccadilly, unless the works were postponed until the autumn; but the Vestry having elected to close only a portion of the street, leaving open a thoroughfare, the consent of the Board was no longer necessary.

Lord Ernest Bruce

COAL—SALE BY WEIGHT—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is his intention to introduce his promised Bill for compelling dealers in Coal to sell by weight only; and, if so, at what period of the Session?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY demurred to the statement that he had promised to introduce a Bill for compelling the sale by weight of coal. He objected to the Bill of the hon. Member last year, as he changed it two or three times; and he could only say, if he brought in a Bill this Session he would give it his careful consideration as to how far he might be able to support it.

NAVY—NAVAL CADETS.—QUESTION.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any Report has been made to the Board of Admiralty by the Director of Studies at Greenwich upon the state of proficiency of the Naval Cadets of the "Britannia," who were appointed last June under the revived system of pure nomination; and, if so, whether he will lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the Report should be laid on the Table of the House.

MERCANTILE MARINE — TRAINING SHIP SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he intends to exclude from the benefit of his proposed contribution from the Mercantile Marine Fund "to any school ship or other institution for training boys to the sea service," such school ships or other institutions as are certified under the Reformatory Act or the Industrial School Act?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, before he asked Parliament to authorize grants to be made out of the Mercantile Marine Fund to training-ship schools, he should make an explicit statement of the mode in which he proposed such grants should be made; but he might say that his proposal would be the same as that which he made last year. He did not think such grants should be made for the training of boys whose training was paid or contributed for by other public money—that was for any boys committed by magistrates under either the Reformatory or Industrial Schools Acts; but they might be made to Industrial School ships as well as other school ships which took boys into training who had not been committed by magistrates.

LAND TENURE (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the honourable and learned Member for Limerick, If he proposes to take any steps to induce the Government to give, for the Second Reading of the Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill, a day upon which its provisions can be fully discussed, with the natural conclusion of a division upon the main Question?

MR. BUTT, in reply, said, that having been singularly fortunate in the ballot, he had been able to fix the second reading for Wednesday, March 29. He was disposed to answer the Question by asking another. What steps did the hon. Member think he should take? To ask the Prime Minister to give up a Government day was one which ought not to be made without the strongest reason.

POOR LAW EXPENDITURE (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Lord Advocate, If it is true that the expenditure for the relief of the poor in Scotland has risen from £680,000 in 1862 to £794,000 in 1875, although the number of paupers has decreased during that period from 126,000 to 105,000; if the expense of management, which was £85,000 in 1866, was £116,000 in 1875; and, if he has any measure in contemplation for altering the Scotch Poor Law, with a view of preventing its becoming increasingly burdensome to the ratepayers?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, it was true that the Poor Law expenditure in Scotland had risen from £680,000 in 1862 to £794,000 in 1875, and that the number of paupers had decreased in the same period from 126,000 to 105,000. But it was also true that the expenditure, which was £821,000 in 1869, had now fallen to £794,000. Again, the poor rate, which in 1862 was at the rate of £4 13s. per cent of the value of rateable property, was now only £3 19s., the rate per pound having fallen at the same dates from 11d. to 9½d. In regard to the increase in the expense of management, it was strictly true that it had increased from £85,000 in 1866 to £116,000 in 1875, while the number of paupers had diminished between those dates. But any one practically acquainted with the subject must know that if there was any connection between the number of paupers and the expense of management, it was this—that the more complete—and therefore the more costly—the management was, the smaller would be the number of paupers, inasmuch as the probability of detecting cases of spurious poverty was increased where inspection was thorough. It might not be out of place to mention that the percentage of expense of "management" on the total Poor Law expenditure—excluding medical relief and buildings—amounted in Scotland to £16, while in England it rose to £26, and in Ireland to £32. But while he could not admit that the Scotch Poor Law was becoming "increasingly burdensome to the ratepayers," there were some matters connected with its administration which seemed to call for amendment, and it was probable that a Bill for this purpose might be introduced during the present Session if the state of Public Business should permit.

INTESTATES (SCOTLAND) ACT. QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he will introduce a Bill to extend to the estates (not exceeding £150) of deceased persons who have left a will the same privileges as conferred by the Intestates Act of last Session on the estates, of a similar amount, of deceased persons who have left no will?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, the Act of last Session to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman referred was passed for the purpose of extending to Scotland the same privileges as were con-commence the warfare. Both sides had been living in glass-houses, but who had been throwing the stones? He ventured to say that no stone had been thrown from his side of the House, except by way of reply to some charge which had been made on the Ministerial side of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not expect hon. Members opposite to agree with him, or anything that he said; but, on the other hand, he could confidently appeal to the House to call to their recollection the speeches made during the former discussion, whether anything in the nature of an attack on the acts of the Government was made, or whether there was not rather an endeavour to discuss the question of principle involved in the Resolution. They should recollect that on that occasion the remark of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) was not calculated to lead to a calm discussion of the question—when he compared those who sat on the Opposition benches to Satan by saying it was a case of Satan rebuking Sin, at the same time adding there was nothing he deprecated more than political tu quoques. With reference to the second Circular, he did not intend to deal at length with the law of the question, although he had something to say with reference to it. With regard to this matter there were three principles which must be taken into consideration for the guidance of the House—two had been generally admitted, but the third had been subjected to some contest. The first was, that British ships of war were intended in general for the reception on board of those persons only who were in the service of Her Majesty or whose presence was required for the purposes of the enterprizes on which the vessels were engaged. The second was, that a British ship of war, even in foreign waters, was subject to British law alone, and that the foreign local jurisdiction no more prevailed on board such a vessel than it did in the British Isles. The third principle was, that a British ship was not justified, when admitted into the foreign waters of a friendly State, in using her immunity from local jurisdiction for the purpose of inciting, or procuring, or inducing a breach of the local laws of that country, and that the country so offending would, according to the comity of nations, justly be called to account by the injured foreign State.

Mr. Herschell

The first and third of these principles were generally admitted; the second had been to some extent impugned. He could not quite gather whether the Secretary for War disagreed with the second proposition or not; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that it was not in accordance with law. In enforcing his views, the right hon. Gentleman insisted that it was shown not to be so, inasmuch as a British man-of-war was subject to Customs and quarantine regulations. These, however, were things outside the ship, and had nothing to do with the law prevailing on board. The Attorney General had said that if a British ship of war were British soil we must carry out the doctrine to its legal consequences. Admitting this, he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member that we were bound to admit all slaves, deserters, and murderers who chose to come on board. Her Majesty's arsenal at Woolwich was British soil; but, nevertheless, the policemen would exclude many people if they endeavoured to enter. It was not because the right claimed might be unreasonably exercised that the right did not exist. He denied that the comity of nations required, under all circumstances and in every case, that a person breaking the local law should be put off the ship; and Her Majesty's Government, who said the second Circular was good law, admitted it, inasmuch as where life was in peril they justified a defiance of the local law; but by what authority was it to be limited to the single case of danger to human life? He asserted that the danger to human life which justified them in refusing to obey a local law was not the only case in which they were justified in doing so. The second Circular, therefore, leaned more to slavery than it need; it did more than International Law compelled us to do, and so did more than it ought to do. Why were the commanders of Queen's ships to defy the local law in the case of danger to human life? Because the comity of nations never compelled them to enforce a law which would shock the national conscience, and to restore and surrender when the effect of restoration and surrender would be to outrage the feelings of humanity. This was an intelligible principle; and if the Circular, as it did, accepted the principle, ought it to remain in its present form, prohibiting the reception and protection of slaves in cases where under the comity of nations there was no obligation upon us to do so? It was not possible to specify all the cases in which the same principle would require us to interfere; but the matter might safely be left to the discretion of our naval officers in each particular case. Experience did not bear out the statement that they were not to be trusted in such a matter. He did not mean to say that cases of doubt and difficulty had not arisen; but when they considered on the one hand that an officer would have a natural disinclination to encumber his ship with those who were unnecessary to its service, and on the other that he would be keenly sensitive to outrage and wrong, they might safely leave the matter in the hands of their naval officers. But if it was considered necessary to issue instructions, he ventured to say that the proper course would have been to have considered the whole question and reviewed the whole law on the subject. This Circular established a direct difference between the treatment of fugitive slaves and political refugees. If a political refugee came on board one of Her Majesty's ships, the orders were to remove him to a convenient place of safety; but in the case of a fugitive slave they were to send him back, not to a place of safety, but to a place of danger. Where was the principle of International Law which said that the comity of nations compelled them to do the one and to refuse the other? This Circular did not deal with the case in a complete manner, and that was one of the reasons why it should be withdrawn. With regard to the question of International Law, he asserted that its principles had been largely created by the action of England herself, and that she had not been slow, even although there might be danger, in asserting propositions which she believed to be right and just. Was England now to be no longer in the van in procuring the acquiescence of other nations to beneficent principles of International Law? International Law was, to a great extent, transitory in its nature, and principles which might hold when most nations were slaveholders became inapplicable when slavery was skulking in the remoter corners of the earth, and the feelings of mankind were outraged by such a traffic, England had sometimes been accused of a selfish policy in dealing with foreign States; but now when she had no selfish ends to serve, but was acting in the interests of humanity, was she to be more slow to act than she had been heretofore? He agreed that we ought not to bully the weak and truckle to the strong; but, on the other hand, we must not for fear of such a charge, be afraid of doing what was right, and there was not a civilized Power which would not accept the position we might lay down on this question. The Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford put forward the logical proposition that these matters should be left to the discretion of our naval officers; whereas the Government, in place of acceding to that proposal, offered to refer the whole subject to a Royal Commission. If the proper way to deal with this subject were to refer it to a Royal Commission, why, when it was before Her Majesty's Government in November last, did not that course suggest itself to them, and why was that suggestion heard for the first time in the Speech from the Throne? Had the subject been referred to a Royal Commission then, the Commission might have reported by this time, and Her Majesty's Government, instead of having to propose that that course should be taken at this late hour, would have been in a position to announce a policy. What was the Commission to do? It was to inquire into the instructions that had been issued to our naval officers and into our international obligations; but surely these were matters with which they might have made themselves fully acquainted during the three months preceding the meeting of Parliament. The third subject into which the Commission was to inquire was how other nations had acted in reference to their national ships in dealing with this question. He did not want to know how other nations had acted. Supposing other nations had acted as it was desired Her Majesty's Government should act, we should then have the humiliation of finding that we had been waiting for the opinion of others, instead of forming our own on the subject; and if, on the contrary, other nations had acted in a manner in which it was not desirable that Her Majesty's Government should act, were the latter going to follow their bad example? But a far graver objec-ferred on the children of intestates in England by the provisions of an Act passed in 1873. At the time when the Scotch Act was in contemplation, he considered carefully whether it could be extended to the case of small testate successions; but he found that such extension involved considerable practical difficulties, especially in connection with the recording of the will, and accordingly he did not go beyond the terms of the English Act, except to increase the amount from £100 to £150. He should be very glad, if the practical difficulties to which he had referred could be obviated, to see the privileges which had been accorded to intestate successions extended to testate; but probably the matter had better be dealt with in a Bill affecting the whole United Kingdom.

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES. QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the hon. Member for Bedford, Whether it was intentional on his part or by inadvertence that the second Resolution which appeared in his name in the Notices of Motion on Tuesday morning was not the same as the substantive Motion submitted by him to the House on Tuesday evening, and whether any Notice was given by him of his intention to withdraw the second Resolution?

MR. WHITBREAD: Sir, the Notice which I gave consisted of two portions, one a Resolution and the other for an Address to the Crown. The Resolution will have to be submitted first according to the usual practice. It was not intended upon my part, but by some accident that the second portion of my Motion for an Address to the Crown did not appear in the first Paper issued for today; but the hon. Member will see that in the amended Paper the full Motion is properly stated.

VIVISECTION—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. STANSFELD,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Report of the Vivisection Commission should be laid before the House after it had been submitted to the Queen. There had been some delay, for which he could not account, in the printing of the book, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he obtained one or two copies for his own use. As soon as possible the Report should be laid on the Table.

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES— THE CIRCULARS.

RESOLUTIONS. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd February],

"That, in the opinion of this House, a Slave once admitted to the protection of the British Flag should be treated while on board one of Her Majesty's ships as if he were free, and should not be removed from or ordered to leave the ship on the ground of slavery,"—(Mr. Whitbread.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships,"—(Mr. Hanbury,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. HERSCHELL regretted that the heat of Party feeling had been introduced into the discussion on the first night by some of the Conservative Members. If the attacks made on the late Government were calculated merely to inflict a Party wound he should be content to pass them by and to confine his observations exclusively to the question before the House; but inasmuch as those attacks had a tendency to obscure the question under discussion, and to unduly affect the judgment of Members upon it, he thought it necessary briefly to deal with that subject. The first matter dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman opposite and other speakers on the same side, and which, indeed, formed the staple of their speeches, was an attack on the late Liberal Ministry for the Slave Act passed by them in 1873. He knew not when it was Her Majesty's Government discovered that that Act was of the character now attributed to it. They had the question of slavery under their consideration in September last, and if the Act had any bearing on the matter it was to be presumed they had looked into it; yet it was not until Tuesday evening that any allusion had been made to it by the Government or their supporters. However, he maintained that the Act of 1873, were it politic or impolitic, had no bearing whatever on the question which arose on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford. That question had reference to the persons of fugitive slaves who had been received on board British ships and were under the protection of the British flag; but the Act of 1873 dealt not with fugitive slaves, but with the slave trade. It was a law enacted by Parliament for the purpose of carrying out arrangements made by Treaties with various States for the suppression of the slave trade; and the obligation of returning slaves applied only to a case where the captain of a British man-of-war had seized a ship containing slaves, either on the high seas or in territorial waters. In such a case, according to the Treaties, the captain was not allowed to judge whether the ship seized was a lawful prize or not, but must submit that question to a Maritime Court, which would decide whether or not he had a right to make the seizure. If the Court decided that the capture was lawful the vessel was forfeited; if the decision, however, were that the seizure had been made in defiance of law, the ship and the slaves it might contain would be restored to the owners under the order of the Court, because the Treaties under which Great Britain was enabled to take measures for the suppression of the slave trade compelled her to make that restoration. Whether it was right or wrong to deal with the slave trade in that way, it was manifest that the seizure of a ship and the restoration of slaves under such circumstances had nothing whatever to do with the question now under consideration—namely, the presence of a fugitive slave on board a British ship and the obligation of the captain to deliver him up. The Secretary of State for War said the Government were prepared to maintain the law which their Liberal predecessors had passed. He (Mr. Herschell) was sorry to hear that if the law were a bad one; and, as an independent Member, looked to the present Government, if they found that mischievous laws had been passed, to endeavour to remedy them; but he denied that the maintenance of the law of 1873 was in any sense a maintenance of the principle of the second Circular or in opposition to the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Bedford. The next ground of attack was that the Government were compelled to issue Circulars because they were hampered by the acts of their predecessors; but they said that they had leaned more to freedom than their predecessors had done, and had endeavoured to mitigate the evils of slavery. To what did language of that sort refer? Did it refer to the first Slave Circular? He, for one, should have been quite willing not to say a single word about that Circular. His hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) said he should be surprised if any Member of the House, assuming the part of the vulture, should dig the first Circular from its grave. He had, however, to submit to that surprise, which must have been greatly increased when he found the vulture taking the shape of the Attorney General. That Circular, he (Mr. Herschell) contended, contained harder and more rigorous provisions against the slave than any previous instructions issued to naval officers, and it also contained provisions that were erroneous and not justified by International Law. The second Circular was issued to mitigate the rigour of the first, but, as far as there was any credit to be attached to it, he denied that it was issued by Her Majesty's Ministers at all; it was issued by the nation. It was issued because of the indignation felt by the people of England at the first Circular, which they regarded as an abandonment of British rights and an outrage on some of their most cherished principles. He did not, however, make these remarks by way of attack on the Government for having issued the first Circular, because no one knew better than he did how sound the Attorney General was generally on points of law, and he would not lift his voice and say one word against the Government for having acted on the learned Attorney General's opinion, but he was meeting the attacks that had been made upon Liberal Members. They did not commence the warfare. Both sides had been living in glass-houses, but who had been throwing the stones? He ventured to say that no stone had been thrown from his side of the House, except by way of reply to some charge which had been made on the Ministerial side of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not expect hon. Members opposite to agree with him, or anything that he said; but, on the other hand, he could confidently appeal to the House to call to their recollection the speeches made during the former discussion, whether anything in the nature of an attack on the acts of the Government was made, or whether there was not rather an endeavour to discuss the question of principle involved in the Resolution. They should recollect that on that occasion the remark of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) was not calculated to lead to a calm discussion of the question—when he compared those who sat on the Opposition benches to Satan by saying it was a case of Satan rebuking Sin, at the same time adding there was nothing he deprecated more than political tu quoques. With reference to the second Circular, he did not intend to deal at length with the law of the question, although he had something to say with reference to it. With regard to this matter there were three principles which must be taken into consideration for the guidance of the House—two had been generally admitted, but the third had been subjected to some contest. The first was, that British ships of war were intended in general for the reception on board of those persons only who were in the service of Her Majesty or whose presence was required for the purposes of the enterprizes on which the vessels were engaged. The second was, that a British ship of war, even in foreign waters, was subject to British law alone, and that the foreign local jurisdiction no more prevailed on board such a vessel than it did in the British Isles. The third principle was, that a British ship was not justified, when admitted into the foreign waters of a friendly State, in using her immunity from local jurisdiction for the purpose of inciting, or procuring, or inducing a breach of the local laws of that country, and that the country so offending would, according to the comity of nations, justly be called to account by the injured foreign State.

Mr. Herschell

Mr. Herschell

The first and third of these principles were generally admitted; the second had been to some extent impugned. He could not quite gather whether the Secretary for War disagreed with the second proposition or not; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that it was not in accordance with law. In enforcing his views, the right hon. Gentleman insisted that it was shown not to be so, inasmuch as a British man-of-war was subject to Customs and quarantine regulations. These, however, were things outside the ship, and had nothing to do with the law prevailing on board. The Attorney General had said that if a British ship of war were British soil we must carry out the doctrine to its legal consequences. Admitting this, he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member that we were bound to admit all slaves, deserters, and murderers who chose to come on board. Her Majesty's arsenal at Woolwich was British soil; but, nevertheless, the policemen would exclude many people if they endeavoured to enter. It was not because the right claimed might be unreasonably exercised that the right did not exist. He denied that the comity of nations required, under all circumstances and in every case, that a person breaking the local law should be put off the ship; and Her Majesty's Government, who said the second Circular was good law, admitted it, inasmuch as where life was in peril they justified a defiance of the local law; but by what authority was it to be limited to the single case of danger to human life? He asserted that the danger to human life which justified them in refusing to obey a local law was not the only case in which they were justified in doing so. The second Circular, therefore, leaned more to slavery than it need; it did more than International Law compelled us to do, and so did more than it ought to do. Why were the commanders of Queen's ships to defy the local law in the case of danger to human life? Because the comity of nations never compelled them to enforce a law which would shock the national conscience, and to restore and surrender when the effect of restoration and surrender would be to outrage the feelings of humanity. This was an intelligible principle; and if the Circular, as it did, accepted the principle, ought it to remain in its present form, prohibiting the reception and protection of slaves in cases where under the comity of nations there was no obligation upon us to do so? It was not possible to specify all the cases in which the same principle would require us to interfere; but the matter might safely be left to the discretion of our naval officers in each particular case. Experience did not bear out the statement that they were not to be trusted in such a matter. He did not mean to say that cases of doubt and difficulty had not arisen; but when they considered on the one hand that an officer would have a natural disinclination to encumber his ship with those who were unnecessary to its service, and on the other that he would be keenly sensitive to outrage and wrong, they might safely leave the matter in the hands of their naval officers. But if it was considered necessary to issue instructions, he ventured to say that the proper course would have been to have considered the whole question and reviewed the whole law on the subject. This Circular established a direct difference between the treatment of fugitive slaves and political refugees. If a political refugee came on board one of Her Majesty's ships, the orders were to remove him to a convenient place of safety; but in the case of a fugitive slave they were to send him back, not to a place of safety, but to a place of danger. Where was the principle of International Law which said that the comity of nations compelled them to do the one and to refuse the other? This Circular did not deal with the case in a complete manner, and that was one of the reasons why it should be withdrawn. With regard to the question of International Law, he asserted that its principles had been largely created by the action of England herself, and that she had not been slow, even although there might be danger, in asserting propositions which she believed to be right and just. Was England now to be no longer in the van in procuring the acquiescence of other nations to beneficent principles of International Law? International Law was, to a great extent, transitory in its nature, and principles which might hold when most nations were slaveholders became inapplicable when slavery was skulking in the remoter corners of the earth, and the feelings of mankind were outraged by such a traffic. England had

sometimes been accused of a selfish policy in dealing with foreign States; but now when she had no selfish ends to serve, but was acting in the interests of humanity, was she to be more slow to act than she had been heretofore? He agreed that we ought not to bully the weak and truckle to the strong; but, on the other hand, we must not for fear of such a charge, be afraid of doing what was right, and there was not a civilized Power which would not accept the position we might lay down on this question. The Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford put forward the logical proposition that these matters should be left to the discretion of our naval officers; whereas the Government, in place of acceding to that proposal, offered to refer the whole subject to a Royal Commission. If the proper way to deal with this subject were to refer it to a Royal Commission, why, when it was before Her Majesty's Government in November last, did not that course suggest itself to them, and why was that suggestion heard for the first time in the Speech from the Throne? Had the subject been referred to a Royal Commission then, the Commission might have reported by this time, and Her Majesty's Government, instead of having to propose that that course should be taken at this late hour, would have been in a position to announce a policy. What was the Commission to do? It was to inquire into the instructions that had been issued to our naval officers and into our international obligations; but surely these were matters with which they might have made themselves fully acquainted during the three months preceding the meeting of Parliament. The third subject into which the Commission was to inquire was how other nations had acted in reference to their national ships in dealing with this question. He did not want to know how other nations had acted. Supposing other nations had acted as it was desired Her Majesty's Government should act, we should then have the humiliation of finding that we had been waiting for the opinion of others, instead of forming our own on the subject; and if, on the contrary, other nations had acted in a manner in which it was not desirable that Her Majesty's Government should act, were the latter going to follow their bad example? But a far graver objection to the appointment of this Commission was the danger that might result from it. In the event of the Commission taking a narrower view of this question than Her Majesty's Government did, foreign nations to whom we made representations on this subject would point to the Report of the Commission, and say that their views were in accordance with it; and when our Government said—"Oh, but our Lord Chancellor says so and so," they would say—"You were not content to rely upon your Lord Chancellor's judgment. You referred the question to your Royal Commission, and they have reported against his opinion." A reply such as that would place the country in a position of considerable embarrassment; and, therefore, he submitted that the appointment of this Commission would be fraught with danger and difficulty, and might land us in an infinitely worse position than we now occupied. This question was of an importance that raised it far above all Party considerations, and every Member in that House should do his utmost to bring about the best possible solution of this problem. There were two alternatives before the House. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) confessed to a state of mind doubtful and hesitating; it necessitated delay and involved risk; and if they adopted it, whatever they might say to the contrary, foreign nations would think, what he believed to be utterly false, that the mind of England was not made up upon the slave question. On the other hand, they were asked to vote for a Motion which contravened no statute, violated no Treaty obligations, infringed no rule of International Law, but which embodied principles for the sake of which England had made costly sacrifices, and would be willing, with ungrudging hand, to make them again—principles which were as dear to her today, aye dearer, than ever they were in times gone by.

Mr. GORST said, the hon. Member for Bedford, and some of his supporters, had appealed to the independents on the Ministerial side of the House, and had asked them to accept blindly an abstract Resolution without considering by whom it was proposed. He himself thought that the passing of such a Resolution would be a censure on the Government; but since the adjournment of the debate there had been a change of front which left no doubt of the intention of the Opposition. Assuming, as they properly did, that the Motion of the hon. Member would be rejected, they now asked the House to assent to the new Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), that the Circular should be rescinded. There was no doubt that a Motion of that kind involved censure upon the Government. It would be rational before they censured the Government to consider what wrong they had done, and to inquire whether it was not the Party opposite that had reversed the ancient anti-slavery policy of this country, and whether the present Government had gone far enough in reversing the policy of their predecessors. He had no wish to introduce Party acrimony into the debate, but it was right that they should know what was the exact position of affairs when the present Government came into office. In March, 1869, Captain Meara received on board one of Her Majesty's ships two slaves who complained that they had been beaten and ill-fed by their owners. The Government of that day, being an economical Government, found that the anti-slavery policy was too expensive for them to adopt, and so they censured the captain of the vessel. Lord Clarendon said he conceived that the commander of Her Majesty's ship was not justified in taking away the slaves in question, because they were the property of individuals, and the owner in such a case was entitled to compensation. In another case, that of the Daphne, Captain Sullivan, on arriving at Mozambique in July, 1869, found the place in a panic. Some slaves had been flogged to death, and others subjected to frightful tortures. Negroes came on board and sought the protection of the British flag. Captain Sullivan sailed away with two of these men. In March, 1870, complaint was made of this by the Portuguese Government to Lord Clarendon. Captain Sullivan was subjected to a Court of Inquiry, and censured for not having communicated with the nearest British Consul with regard to the negroes who came on board the Daphne. On the 30th of May, 1870, a most humiliating despatch was written to the Portuguese Government, expressing a hope that they would be satisfied with the censure that had been passed on Captain Sullivan, and stating that instructions had recently been issued to the officers of British ships of war on the Coast of Africa which it was hoped would prevent a recurrence of the conduct of which the Portuguese Government had complained. Not a word was said in that despatch about the torture of slaves, or of the flogging of a slave to death. That was the kind of policy which the Government adopted at that time. The next was a remarkable case. In October, 1869, four men, who alleged themselves to be slaves and kept in servitude in Madagascar, in violation of a Treaty with the British Government, asked for protection on board the Dryad. The captain immediately communicated with the nearest Consul. The Vice Admiralty Court having inquired into the case decided that, under the circumstances, the captain was fully justified in receiving the slaves on board and refusing to surrender them; but unfortunately for the captain, before the Vice Admiralty Court decided that he had acted rightly, he had been already condemned by the Foreign Office for doing that which the Vice Admiralty Court said was right. Lord Clarendon, in 1870, decided that, when slaves came on board a British ship, claiming the protection of the British flag, because they were in slavery, in violation of a Treaty, it was the duty of the officer to refuse to receive them, to leave them on shore, and communicate with the nearest Vice Consul. A celebrated East Indian Station Order was also issued in 1871, laying down, as the law, that slaves seeking refuge in our ships, in territorial waters, should be returned to their owners. He would like to know whether, in the course of those proceedings, the Law Officers of the Crown were consulted or not upon the legal question involved. If they were not consulted, the late Government had been guilty of a serious neglect of duty; but if they were consulted, was there no legal Gentleman on the opposite side of the House prepared to defend the law laid down by his predecessor. In the case of the Maggie, two slaves came on board that vessel while she was in the Persian Gulf, in July, 1871. One was surrendered to the Persian Slave Commissioner, and the other not, because of some informality. But after the surrender of the first slave the Political Resident, being in doubt as to whether he had done right, communicated with the Secretary of the Government in Bombay, and the answer he received was—

Mr. Herschell

“The Commanders of British men-of-war would not only be authorized in refusing to surrender a slave who had found refuge on board his vessel, but would incur very serious legal responsibilities if he in any way attempted to coerce that slave to return to his master.”

It seemed that the Law Officers of the Crown had been consulted in that case. On the 7th of January, 1874, the Government of India gave certain provisional orders for the guidance of our officers in the Persian Gulf; and those provisional orders were found to be in force when the present Ministry came into office. He did not suppose any Member of the late Government would disclaim their responsibility for the action of the Governor General of India, Lord Northbrook, on the 7th of January, 1874. Well, the provisional orders thus issued were these—

“(a.) Commanders of ships riding in foreign territory should not receive domestic slaves on board except under urgent circumstances, as, e.g. when a man would be drowned if he was rejected; (b.) they should return slaves to their lawful owners or to the public authorities of the place on proper demand being made; (c.) commanders of ships which may be technically on the high seas, but practically are brought into close contact with the owners of domestic slaves, should do what they can to avoid receiving the slaves on board their vessels.”

The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) the other night said that such an instruction in regard to our public ships on the high seas was entirely new. The provisional order went on to say—

“(d.) If nevertheless such slaves do come on board, the commander may exercise a discretion whether to return the slave to his master, supposing proper demand to be made, or to retain him and set him at liberty.”

Thus, then, the House would see that the anti-slavery policy of this country had already been reversed when the present Ministry took office, although the right hon. Member for Bradford, in addressing his constituents last October, said the people of England could not believe that it was possible for the present Government or for any British Government to issue instructions which gave up rights that belonged to the British flag and reversed the anti-slavery policy, which was our great glory, and which had been maintained at great cost. But the people of England had since then discovered that it was not the present Government, but their predecessors, who had reversed our anti-slavery policy and surrendered the rights of our flag; and hence the exhortation to moderation now addressed to the House by the hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Member for Bradford said last night he would be prepared to wait for the Report of the Commission if he thought no harm would come by waiting. He now said for himself, in turn, that he would be prepared to vote for the abstract Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford if he thought no harm would come from that abstract Resolution. That Resolution still further abridged the discretion of our naval officers by forbidding them, under any circumstances whatever, to give a temporary asylum to a slave seeking refuge under the British flag. ["No!"] It said that when a slave was admitted to a British ship-of-war he should be treated on board as if he were free, and not be ordered to leave or be removed on the ground of slavery. Therefore, unless they made up their minds to take the fugitive on board for good, they must under no circumstances receive him. Thus if a slave got on board who claimed his freedom on the ground of Treaty, he must be kept there, though his claim under the Treaty might be false. They would have the rule laid down by Lord Clarendon in 1870 revived, and fugitives seeking to come on board our ships on the ground of Treaty would not be received, while our officers would have to communicate with the nearest Consular station on the matter. The same objection applied to the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), for it would take away the discretion which the present Circular had given to naval officers, who were instructed, by its terms, to keep a fugitive slave on board as long as it was necessary, in order to ascertain the truth or falsehood of his claim for protection. In these remarks offered to the House he trusted he had not been guilty of Party asperity. He had tried to answer the appeal made to independent Members, and to estimate justly the position of Her Majesty's Government upon this question. The only fault anybody could find with the present Government was that they had shown too much caution in reversing the policy of their predecessors. They had already undone a great part of the mischief done by their predecessors; they were prepared to take steps to undo the rest; and the House of Commons at that moment was asked to pass what was equivalent to a Vote of Censure upon them, and that by the Party which had actually reversed the anti-slavery policy of this country, a Party which had surrendered the privileges of the British flag, and all for the sake of affirming an abstract Resolution, which would further abridge the discretion of the naval officers, and also inflict further injury upon the fugitive slave.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that he was unwilling to give a silent vote upon the question, and he wished to explain the reasons which influenced and would determine that vote. The hon. Member for Bedford, in his calm, temperate, and able speech, had rightly admitted that there was no difference between the two sides of the House in their detestation of slavery. All alike, Conservatives and Liberals, were agreed in abhorring an institution which was an offence against humanity. The strongest opponent of the present Government did not believe that it wished to encourage slavery, or that the issuing of the Circular was anything more than an unintentional error of judgment. And this ought not to be, and was not a Party question. The honoured name borne by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) was a guarantee that he did not bring it forward in a Party spirit; nor could the Leaders of the Opposition on the front benches convert into an engine of Party attack a Circular which in terms was almost identical with the opinions and instructions of Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon. But the Liberal Party were not compromised by those opinions, for they had never heard of them until they were brought to light by the discussion caused by the appearance of the Circulars. As to the independent Members on his (Mr. Forsyth's) side of the House, he felt sure that they would act independently, and not be forced by the allegiance of Party into a vote contrary to their convictions on a matter so deeply affecting the happiness of their fellow men, and also the character of this great nation, as did the question now before the House.

Mr. Gorst

He could have ardently wished that the Government, taking advantage of the appointment of a Royal Commission, had agreed to suspend and withdraw their Circular until the Commission had reported. In that case he should have voted against the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Whitbread), because he should have thought it premature and unnecessary. He could not understand why the Government had not adopted that course. If they were so sure that they were right in issuing this Circular, why did they appoint the Commission at all? It seemed to him that the issuing of the Commission betrayed an uneasy suspicion in their minds that the Circular was wrong; and, if so, would it not be better to wait for the Report of the Commission? Was there any reason for haste in this matter? The matter was first brought under the consideration of the Government in a letter dated March 9, 1874, from Sir Louis Mallet, the Under Secretary for the India Office, but no answer was sent to that letter from the Foreign Office until April 13, 1875; and could not that question be delayed for a few weeks which had been allowed to sleep for 14 months? He would now address himself to the second Circular, under the two aspects of law and policy. He was not going to say that this Circular was contrary to law; but that the first Circular was contrary to law he unhesitatingly affirmed, and although the Attorney General said it was good law, it had been condemned by the Members of the Government, the Lord Chancellor, and everyone else, and he had never heard a lawyer say it was right. Chief Justice Best, in the case of "Forbes v. Cochrane," said that if a man were once received on board a British ship of war and then remitted to slavery, he might just as well be consigned to the deep. Lord Brougham had expressed a similar opinion in the House of Lords in 1842, and the House had heard from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) that this was the traditional view of the British Navy. In the year 1815, after the Treaty of Ghent, a correspondence passed on this subject between the American Minister and Lord Bathurst. During the war with America, a British ship had sent a flag of truce on shore, and it was alleged that the captain of the vessel had allowed 11 negroes to get on board and had carried them away. The captain denied the fact; but a correspondence ensued between Mr. Quincy Adams and Lord Bathurst, in which the captain denied the fact—but said that if he had received escaped slaves on board his ship he would not have delivered them up, but have referred the matter to his Commander-in-Chief. The Instructions in the present case were not contrary to law, because no captain could be bound to receive anybody on board his ship except the crew, the passengers, and the officers of the ship; but when any person, alleged to be a slave, was once received on board, according to the Circular the captain was to give him up, and he would become a slave again. It might be said that to avoid that consequence the captain was ordered in the Circular not to inquire into his status, and not to surrender him to a demand. But was not this something like a subterfuge? The captain would know that the man was a slave, and that if he went back he would be consigned to slavery again. If goods were feloniously stolen, and an advertisement were issued saying that if they were restored no questions would be asked, this might seem to be a very innocent thing; but the law pierced through the thin disguise, and sternly called it by the ugly name of compounding a felony. The Circular was totally silent as to the case which frequently occurred of a slave coming clandestinely on board, and the officer must still exercise his discretion in such cases. Take the case of two ships of war going into the foreign waters of a slave-holding State, one anchoring just within the territorial waters and the other on the high seas within a few yards of the other. If two slaves escaped from the shore to the ships and one swam to the vessel on the high seas he would be free, while the other who went on board the ship within the territorial waters, although it might be only 20 yards distant, would be sent back into slavery before the day was over. Public opinion would see no distinction between these two cases, and would not consent to a Circular which established such a distinction. Admitting that the Circular was not wrong in point of law, did the comity of nations and International Law require that we should surrender a fugitive slave who fled to a British ship and claimed the protection of the British flag. If such surrender were not required by the comity of nations the Circular was wrong and ought to be withdrawn. If it were required, we had no option, and must surrender a runaway slave who came on board a British ship in territorial waters. There were two conflicting principles—the first, that every independent State had jurisdiction within its own territory, including its territorial waters; and the other that no Foreign Power had any jurisdiction whatever over any British man-of-war, whether in territorial waters or on the high seas. This had been asserted by every writer on International Law, but he would content himself with quoting a passage from the work of M. Calvo, a French author of great authority on the subject. M. Calvo said—

“The reasons which subject a merchant vessel to the territorial jurisdiction, have no possible application to a ship of war, of which the character, organization, and employment, are essentially different. Therefore, in whatever place it finds itself, it remains exclusively governed by the sovereignty and the laws to which it belongs.”

The captain of a man-of-war, however, had no right to use violence to break the chains of the slave unless he was enabled by treaty to do so. He must remain perfectly quiescent, perfectly passive with regard to domestic slavery; if not, he violated national law and acted contrary to the comity of nations. There was, as Mr. Justice Bayley had said, a great difference between making the law active and allowing it to be passive. And in the case of “Forbes v. Cochrane” Mr. Justice Best said that the comity of nations was a maxim that could not prevail in any case where it violated the law of our own country, the law of nature, and the law of God. Convicts and murderers might and ought to be expelled from a ship of war by the comity of nations, for they had committed crimes admitted to be such by all nations. But there was no comity of nations which required that the captain of a man-of-war should assist actively in restoring a slave to his owner. An escaped slave was not in the same category as a murderer or a thief—for the only thing he had stolen was his liberty. We had no right to use force for the purpose of putting an end to slavery; but, on the other hand, no State had a right to ask us to use force to restore a slave to his master. The captain of a British man-of-war ought not to be called upon to act as a policeman in favour of the slaveowner. Then, with respect to the obligation of Treaties—so much insisted upon by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, and which seemed to have a great effect on the House—all the Treaties on this subject for the last 30 or 40 years—and there were 32 in number—were made with States for the purpose of preventing the slave trade, and had no reference to fugitive slaves. It was said that the Members of the former Liberal Government were extremely inconsistent in condemning this Circular, having themselves been parties to the Act of 1873, which for the first time contained a provision that slaves should be restored to their owners. There never was a more unfounded assertion. The law of 1873 only consolidated the Acts relating to Treaties for putting an end to the slave trade, and precisely the same provision for the restoration of slaves to their owners, if the seizure were condemned by a competent Court, was contained in 5 Geo. IV. cap. 113, enacted by a Tory Government. It might be said that slave-holding States would exclude our ships from their ports if they became a refuge for fugitive slaves. But he (Mr. Forsyth) would like to know what slave-holding State would dare to do this? Would Spain, or Brazil, or Madagascar, or Zanzibar venture to shut their harbours against the British Navy and British commerce? He believed that they would not—that the danger was absolutely chimerical. He believed the true solution of this question was to leave it to the discretion of commanding officers. The captains of our men-of-war were gentlemen, men of humanity and judgment; and no real difficulty would occur if the matter were left to their discretion. And in one important particular the matter was left to their discretion, for the Circular provided that where life was in manifest danger the captain was to receive the slave. He therefore must determine whether there was or was not danger to life, and this was a question in which one man would form one opinion and another another, and so it was a matter of entire discretion. Suppose the slave truthfully said—“No! I shall not be killed—I am too valuable for that—but I shall be severely flogged," what was the captain to do in such a case? It was because this Circular seemed to be in the interest of the slaveowner rather than of the slave, because it enabled the slaveowner to assert his property in human flesh, that a feeling of dissatisfaction pervaded the public mind in regard to it. He believed that the instinct of a whole nation was seldom wrong. For these reasons, although he should reluctantly be placing himself in opposition to the Government with whose principles he generally agreed, and whose conduct he generally approved, he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford.

Mr. Forsyth

MR. PEASE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had alluded, with great feeling, to scenes of his early life, and to his acquaintance with those great promoters of the abolition of slavery, from whose footstool he drew the inspiration which he had brought to the House on the question of slavery. He (Mr. Pease) had also passed his early years in close acquaintance with the followers of the noble band, and had been in close fellowship with that Christian Church which had, more than 100 years ago, expressed, in instructions to its members and missionaries and teachers abroad, in earnest terms, the deep abhorrence that was felt in regard to the slave traffic. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pease) read the extract he referred to, and reminded the House that at the time it was issued, 1758, and for 30 years afterwards, this country was a slave-holding and a slave-trading country, but the light of liberty had spread, for during the last 50 years, this country had not only abolished slavery and the slave trade in her own colonies at a great sacrifice, but had entered into Treaties with other nations, and had kept a fleet upon the seas to hound down the traffic in slaves, and root out the system of domestic slavery. The history did not end here. A few years ago, when a fierce war was raging on the other side of the Atlantic, the sympathy of this country only went with the North when it was found the result would be freedom to the slaves. Their attention had been called to the state of the slave trade on the East Coast of Africa, and they had sent out a special mission to Zanzibar, and had almost enforced Treaties there with the object of destroying the slave trade, and rooting out a thing which he wished to keep steadily before the House—namely, the horrid institution of domestic slavery; and more than that, they had brought home the other day the travel-worn attenuated remains of a great African traveller, who had caused their attention to be directed to the slave trade of the whole continent of Africa, and they had buried him in that large mausoleum where the great of our country were interred, and under the statue of Clarkson and Buxton and other famous philanthropists. Why had he made this sketch of things which were well known to every man in the House? Not to celebrate the triumph of Party, because he thought Party had very little to do with this matter; but to celebrate the great triumphs of the great Anglo-Saxon race, both on this side and on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean. It was the proudest page of the history of that race which chronicled the efforts it had made, not only to alleviate the sufferings of the slaves, but to secure their liberation. The real matter under discussion, he contended, was not the Commission, but the proposition that henceforth a slave once admitted to the protection of the British flag should be treated whilst on board one of Her Majesty's ships as if he were free, and should not be removed on the ground of slavery. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had insisted that under the British flag they did not know a slave; and he went further, and suggested that they should go further, and ask Her Majesty that they might repeal those letters, instructions, and Circulars which had been sent out from time to time, and which were at variance with the proposition which the hon. Member laid down in his Resolution. Well, whether the Commission they were to have was wise or foolish, he believed that it could be attended but by one result. The fiat had gone forth from the people of the country, and no Government would for one day or for one moment have the confidence of the people who did not adhere to the very simple terms of the Motion, and that which was involved in the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford. Why, he asked, should they delay to conform to that which his hon. Friend proposed to the House? Why should they delay that which, whatever the Commission reported, the country and the House, he believed, emphatically affirmed as necessary? Why delay until some other country had taken a leaf out of our book, but, at any rate, had followed our policy, and did that which we ought to do, and declared what, he hoped, the House would declare to-night, that they knew nothing of slavery wherever the national flag was unfurled. They spoke of independent Members in the House, and his appeal would be to those Members. What were independent Members? It seemed to him they were those who either having been in office had left the honours of office with the great trials of office behind them, and they were those who came into the House not looking at Membership as a stepping stone to higher honour for themselves, but as the Representatives of constituencies who looked upon their independence with approval, and knew their independence of thought and character. He appealed to these independent Members on the present occasion. The hon. Member for Bedford was one of the foremost of independent Members; but it had been said that he had been "put up." He did not ask Mr. Speaker to call the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury), who had made this statement, to Order, because he knew the judgment of the House would condemn the phrase as applied to the hon. Member for Bedford; but he believed the hon. Member had been put up to speak—put up by his own feelings—because he felt that the character of this country before the nations of the world was in danger if they delayed or played with, or tampered with the question. At any rate, the name of his hon. Friend would not go down with those of hon. Gentlemen who had attempted to delay a process which the country was anxious for. He wanted to know how any hon. Member could look on the matter as a Party question. Those who had read the letters of Lord Palmerston or of Lord Clarendon, or the two Circulars on the question could come but to one conclusion—that we had done those things which we ought not to have done, and we had left undone those things which we ought to have done. The hon. Member for Tamworth had spoken of domestic slavery as a thing very difficult to handle, and had spoken of violation of Treaties with other nations. God forbid that he (Mr. Pease) should say anything in violation of Treties, but none of these Treaties made us parties to domestic slavery, and there was no fear of the violation of Treaties. Domestic slavery was contrary to the laws of God and man. The only countries where a system of domestic slavery prevailed were parts of South America, Turkey, Egypt, Arabia, the West, and part of the East Coast of Africa, Mahometan, and half civilised countries that were fast sinking into the lowest moral depths as nations. This accursed system of slavery was, he believed, one of the chief causes that were sapping their foundations. What would be the feeling of Wilberforce, of Clarkson, or any of the early abolitionists if they could walk into the House and find a discussion of this kind going on? Surely it would be thought this was not the nation that was the foremost in the righteous cause of giving freedom to the slave at a time when she had arrayed against her the slaveholding powers of Spain, Portugal, and America. All that had passed away. He was thankful for the Circular, inasmuch as it had drawn the attention of the people of England to the subject. He would welcome a Commission as having the same effect. It needed no seer to foretell that the feeling of the people of England would be true to their traditions and history.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he did not rise in answer to the appeal which had so often been made to independent Members, because on such a question as this they ought all to be independent Members; but he rose mainly with the object of expressing to the Government a very strong wish that before this debate closed they would see their way to adopting some course which would save the House from a Division. He foresaw that not only the great Party to which he belonged, but the whole House, would by a division be placed in a false position. There had been a great deal of misunderstanding on the subject, some misrepresentation, and there had been admittedly many mistakes, and he himself would not be a party to making another. He believed that a division would be a mistake. The House was actuated by a sense of double duty in the course which it had to take. Its first duty was that which it owed to itself, a duty big with great, noble, and glorious traditions; a duty which had its origin in the deepest and strongest feelings which could actuate the English people—hatred of slavery. Its second duty was that which we owed to our neighbours. They were all of one mind upon this subject; but if a division happened the old Party organization would come in, and the Liberals would go into one Lobby and the Conservatives into another; and the impression would consequently get abroad that the Liberal Party were the friends of the slave, and the Conservatives his enemies. He, as a Conservative, had a strong objection to being placed in such a false position. He did not say that the Government wished to place them in that position; but the necessitas rei would place them in it if there was a division upon this Motion. He should have thought that the policy which was dictated by high feeling and spirit would have been easy to adopt; but when they came to put on paper their instructions to carry out that policy, the lawyers immediately disputed about every word. He did not want to argue this question on petty considerations. They had had rather too much of that lately. Let them try to decide so as not to be hard on the slave, nor uncivil to their neighbours, nor untrue to Treaties. But the difficulty was, how was that to be done? Both sides of the House were of the same mind as to what ought to be done. They wanted, in fact, to do the same thing. All they needed was a clever fellow to tell them how it was to be done; but they could not find him. He was afraid the Government would, if they persisted in their course, find themselves in a false position. They had issued a Circular, and now they were going to appoint a Commission. He had always thought that the object of a Commission was to get information; but the Government had issued the Circular without that information. If information were necessary, why not suspend the Circular? There was really no sense in saying—"We have issued a Circular, and now we want information." That was putting the cart before the horse. He was very anxious that they should, if possible, avoid a Division, as it would be sure to be misinterpreted. He had a very strong opinion that there were a good many Members on the Conservative side of the House who did not like this business. They did not see their way to its approval, and they did not think it had been conducted with that dexterity which might have been expected. In saying that, he did not wish to throw any discredit on the Government. He gave them full credit for good intentions. He believed they wanted to do what was right; but that was not always a very easy thing to do. He thought the matter might very well be left to the discretion of our naval officers. He repeated that he did not like the Circular. It had an ugly hard sound about it. Moreover, he did not think it was necessary. In conclusion, he was sure of this—that if they were dragged into a division the only effect on the mind of the country would be that the action of the House of Commons would be misconceived, and the existing confusion would be rendered still more confounded.

Mr. Pease

MR. WADDY said, the debate afforded the most lamentable history of tu quoque that he had ever listened to. The time of the House had been occupied throughout by an accusation on one side of, "You did it," and of the retort on the other side that "You did it quite as much as we." He thought the time had arrived when this country ought to put aside all precedents and boldly declare that henceforth the grand principle England would act upon was that there should be no peace for slavery. Having abolished slavery in their own possessions, they sought to lay down the principle which lay at the root of the Resolution before the House. Until lately, however, they could not do it. Their position was complicated by the case of America, to which the cursed legacy of slavery had been left by ourselves. But that had all gone. It was not until 1865 that, in a Circular, they laid down anything like a principle. It was then declared that Great Britain was determined to put down the slave trade, and that there was a system of domestic slavery with which they did not wish to interfere. He did not say they ought to interfere with domestic slavery; but what he desired to see laid down was that they would never recognize it again in their dealings with those who maintained it. Then, in 1870, they had the Circular of Lord Clarendon with respect to Madagascar, saying that they were not warranted in depriving the inhabitants of slaves who were rightfully their property. This nation, however, had spoken out on the subject, and the time had come when they did not own that slaves were the rightful property of anyone—that any man could have property in another. They could not do better than to let it be clearly understood that for the future, whatever might have been done in the past, they would do all that lay in their power to mitigate the horrors of slavery, and, if possible, put an end to it altogether. At length they came to the two Circulars of the present Government, and they found themselves in this position—that scarcely a single case could be mentioned of a difficulty arising in respect of the slave trade that was not due to the determination of those with whom they had Treaties on the subject to break through those Treaties. It was to that, and not to their naval officers, that those difficulties were to be attributed. They could not put down slavery and leave the slave trade alone; and it was time they should recognize that fact, as he believed they could now do with safety and propriety. He should have liked to see the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford worded more strongly than it was, and that it should declare that a slave once admitted to the protection of the British flag became from that moment free, and should not be permitted to return to slavery. The principle of the Amendment was no principle at all, and for that matter there was no reason why it should not have been made a rider to the original Motion. They might have a Commission if it were necessary to enlighten them as to the state of the law, of which different versions had been given on both sides of the House; but the question of the law did not affect the real question now at issue. He, for one, did not mind whether it was the Lord Chancellor or the Attorney General who was right in his law. He declined altogether to go into cases and precedents, by which Lord Derby and Lord Clarendon had felt themselves to be bound; for, whatever the law might have been in the past, there ought to be no doubt as to the course which this country meant to take in the future. If any Circular gave the slightest encouragement to slavery he should deem it his duty to vote against it, from whichever side of the House it might have emanated. This question was likely to become a Party one, unless Her Majesty's Government would join in the attempt to do away with slavery. The House ought to lay down the principle that henceforth it would never hold out the hand to slavery, and he felt sure that the voice of the nation would support the House, even at the risk of losing any association with the most important port of Madagascar. The nation did not want to infringe any grand principle of International Law; what it wanted was to refuse in future to recognize the property of man in man. Supposing one of our men-of-war happened to be in the territorial waters of a State in which human sacrifices were legal, and a slave escaped to the ship at the time when he was about to be murdered, would the captain give up a human being to be massacred, whatever might be the municipal law of the country? The owner of the fugitive might say—"I demand him on the ground that he is my slave. It is true I am going to sacrifice him as a sacrifice to the gods, but I do not put it on that ground; I only ask you not to deprive me, an inhabitant of this country, of a slave who is rightfully my property." He was aware that this was an extreme case, but principles must be tested by extreme cases; and, moreover, it was only in such cases that difficulties had arisen. It was time that they should make up their mind boldly and definitely to sweep away all cases of Treaties and precedents—[Ironical cries of "Hear, hear!"—]which made war on the personal liberty of the slave. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might derisively cheer that statement; but they might depend upon it that it would be repeated in the country, which was now thoroughly alive to the importance of this question. Let them try once more to get into the front of the fight for freedom, in which Great Britain had in bygone days taken a leading part, and let them afterwards take steps to secure the co-operation of America, France, Prussia, and the other great nations of the civilized world. If a Royal Commission was appointed, what was the captain of a Queen's ship to do meanwhile? When a slave sought shelter on board, was the captain to say—"I should like to protect you, but the fact is that a Royal Commission is sitting just now, and until it has reported I can do nothing for you; a few months hence the question may be settled, and if I come back here I may then be able to take you on board; but, meanwhile, back you go—back to slavery, or even to torture and to death?" Was that the answer that that was to be given to the poor fugitive slave by a British officer? The House would answer "No;" the country would answer "No; and, indeed, the country was answering "No" every day with an emphasis that could not be mistaken. If the Prime Minister was present, he (Mr. Waddy) would appeal to him to take advantage of the opportunity now offered him of acting in accordance with the unanimous feeling of that House and of the country. He would ask him now, towards the close of his long political life, to join his name to the names of the great men who in times past had laboured for the abolition of slavery, and to add the crowning stone to the edifice of which the foundations were laid by Wilberforce and his contemporaries.

Mr. Waddy

MR. BENTINCK said, it had never been his fortune to listen to a debate in that House in which more ability, earnestness, and sentiment, had been cut to waste. In dealing with matters of this kind it was necessary to drop sentiment and adopt practical views. As far as he had been able to gather from the tone of the debate, there was no difference of opinion on either side of the House. They had but one object, and that was to mitigate the evils of slavery. What they had now to consider was how they were to deal with existing circumstances. It was all very well for the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken to tell them that they must at once denounce slavery, and if a pronunciamiento from this country could at once put a stop to it, they would all endorse the proposal. He remembered when he was once lying in a foreign port news arrived of a very large capture of slavers, and happening to meet at dinner that day with a distinguished individual who was largely embarked in slave-trade speculations, he asked him whether the reported capture would have the effect of putting a stop to the slave trade? The reply was that a speculation which paid 22½ per cent could not be stopped by any human ingenuity. He believed his informant was perfectly correct. It would certainly never be stopped by making speeches in the House of Commons. It appeared to him that the Motion, if carried, would rather tend to complicate the difficulties of the position than to smooth them down. The hon. Member for Bedford and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) both repudiated any Party feeling in this matter, and there had been assurances from all quarters that this was not a Party question. All he could say, after a good many years' experience in that House, was that if it was not a Party question, it looked wonderfully like one. His right hon. Friend advised that both sides of the House should take counsel together; but was it possible for them, as a body, to deal with a question involving the construction of Treaties and complicated points of law? It was perfectly hopeless for the House to undertake such a task; and if it did, it must fail in the undertaking. If the House could not deal with it, somebody must—and what could be better than a Royal Commission? He was no partizan; but he believed that the Government were perfectly right in the course they had suggested. The right hon. Member for Bradford had objected to the instruction which informed commanders of Her Majesty's ships-of-war that within the territorial waters of a foreign State they were bound by the comity of nations, while maintaining the proper exemption of their own ships from local jurisdiction, not to allow them to become shelters for those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place. He, for one, could see no objection to this instruction; because to deny it was to say that England was omnipotent, and could with impunity, and in defiance of Treaties, break the laws of other countries. He asked how the House of Commons could endorse a proposition like that? He was heartily desirous that they should find some escape from the difficulty which he admitted they were all placed in; but of this he was sure—that it would not be found in the Motion before them. To what higher or better tribunal, then, could they resort than to a Royal Commission composed of some of the ablest men in the country? No one in the House or out of it was more anxious that slavery should be put down and finally got rid of all the world over; but what would be the result of dividing upon the Motion? Why, it would inevitably have the effect of conveying the impression that there were two Parties in the House—one in favour of slavery, and the other opposed to it. Was that the way to get rid of slavery? Would not the creation of such an idea contribute greatly to weaken the moral force of this country in dealing with the question? It had cost England a large amount of blood and treasure in her endeavour to put down the slave trade; but he believed that the moral example of the country had contributed to that end more largely than anything that had been done by our cruisers and by force of arms. If, however, they were to put forth the impression now that there was a strong party in the country still in favour of slavery, they would enormously diminish its moral force. He implored the House to consider this point before they came to a division upon the subject. Great stress had been laid upon the fact that during the complications which had occurred where our men-of-war had acted upon the slavery question, in only one case had instructions been applied for. That one fact was sufficient to justify the Government in issuing full and complete instructions to the officers in command of Her Majesty's ships as to the course they were to adopt under the difficult and complicated circumstances with which they had to deal. No officer should be left in doubt as to the course he should pursue; because, if he were left to himself, he might, with the best intentions, render himself liable to be sued for damages, although he had performed a duty which humanity demanded of him. Why ought such a responsibility to be thrown upon our naval officers, instead of each Government taking the responsibility of dealing with the question? He happened to hear that morning a case that occurred a good many years ago to an old and gallant friend of his, now one of the most distinguished Admirals in the Service. It did not apply directly to the slave question; but it showed the difficulties with which our officers had sometimes to contend. His gallant friend took upon himself to release, by force, an Englishman who he thought was unjustly detained in a foreign port. The attempt succeeded in consequence of the gallantry on the part of the releasing party, who were opposed to a much superior force. His gallant Friend sailed from the port a day or two afterwards for the Pacific, and on his arrival there he found two letters—one containing a very severe reprimand from the Board of Admiralty for the course he had taken, and the other from the then Foreign Secretary (Lord Palmerston) giving him the highest possible encomiums for his gallant exploit. Well, he asked, ought any officer to be placed in a position in which he was liable at once to be praised and blamed, and still less in a position where he was called upon to deal with complicated questions which puzzled the ablest lawyers in that House? What would inevitably happen if they passed the Resolution? They would then have proclaimed that every slave setting foot on one of Her Majesty's ships was a free man. The fact would become known in States in which domestic slavery existed, and what would happen if a body of 500 or 1,000 slaves were to force themselves—knowing they would thus become free men—on board a Queen's ship? It was a case—whatever the number might be—sure to occur as the inevitable consequence of adopting the Resolution; and what, under such circumstances, was the commanding officer to do? He could not send them back, and yet he might have no means of stowing or feeding them. He trusted that the House would decline to deal with the question in a manner which would land us in such endless difficulties. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford said that, this not being a Party question—although it looked very like one—no humiliation would attach to the Government if they accepted the Motion; but he trusted he had shown the right hon. Gentleman that such a course, instead of lessening, would greatly increase and aggravate existing difficulties. He did not see why the argument in favour of withdrawal should not hold good in one case as well as the other. Why should not hon. Members on both sides take counsel together in order to get the House out of the false position in which it was now placed? Let both the Motion and the Amendment be withdrawn, and let it stand forth to the world that Party spirit had no share in the matter, and that the House was unanimous in its desire to do away with slavery and the slave trade. If, however, they refused to withdraw the Motion and Amendment they would compel the House to stultify itself and make the question of slavery a mere stalking-horse for Party strife.

Mr. Bentinck

MR. STANSFELD said, that if the debate had been conducted in the spirit of the speech of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) there would have been no difficulty in keeping it outside Party questions. But on the other side of the House attacks had been made on the conduct of Liberal Administrations, and it was not possible that these attacks should not be met with some reply. The hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury), the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Mills), the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) appeared to have spoken from one brief, which contained only the words—"No case—abuse the opposite attorney." ["Oh, oh!"] He would justify that assertion. Their argument was that the Government had been hampered and fettered by the precedents and legislation of previous Liberal Administrations. That was not a defence worthy of a Government in a case of this kind, because a Government was bound to stand upon the justice and merits of its own decrees. The precedents relied upon by the other side were only six in number. The first was the case of the Romney in 1837. That was, however, no precedent for the action of the Government, but a decision of Lord Palmerston's on a specific case, and the clue was to be found in the letter of the Havana Commissioners, nor was there a person who would not say that Lord Palmerston was the last person to have put his hand to the second Circular. There was then the case of the Danube in 1856, which was the first of Lord Clarendon's decisions, and it was to the effect that a slave once received on board a British man-of-war could not be surrendered. [MR. HANBURY: That was in Brazilian waters.] He would admit that Lord Clarendon's subsequent decisions were not in accordance with that doctrine. Then came the cases of the Nymph, the Dryad, and the Daphne, and these Lord Clarendon decided in accordance, not with the first but the second Circular of the Government. He would not ask whether the Government were right or wrong in issuing this second Circular; but in what possible sense or manner could they have been hampered or fettered by these precedents? These were, in fact, conflicting decisions, and he admitted that the Government were entitled to cite those of 1869 and 1870 as precedents in their favour. If they were of opinion that their last decision was right, then the Government were not justified in sheltering themselves behind the decisions of Lord Clarendon, as if they were hampered and fettered by them. If, on the contrary, the Government regarded their decision as wrong, they must now be aware that nothing would have given them greater strength and popularity with the country than to have over-ridden those personal decisions of Lord Clarendon. He now came to the legislation of 1873. He regretted that the Secretary for War was not present; because he felt bound to question the arguments which the right hon. Gentlemen had addressed to the House the other night. In the first place, he would contend that that argument was irrelevant; because they were dealing with fugitive slaves, and not with the capture of slave traders. The right hon. Gentleman went further, because he accused the late Government of a kind of plot in 1873 in passing through the House of Commons during the small hours of the morning, and without discussion, an Act which took away the liberties that were guaranteed to the slave under former Acts of Parliament.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I never said anything of the sort.

MR. STANSFELD said, that if the right hon. Gentleman said nothing, there was of course nothing to reply to.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It is a reply to a statement that is utterly incorrect.

MR. STANSFELD: I think the right hon. Gentleman is hardly courteous. I am in the recollection of the House, and I am ready to say what were the statements of the right hon. Gentleman. What he said the other night was that in the Consolidation Act of 1873, which he said was an Act passed without discussion, certain provisions of previous Acts of Parliament had been repealed or left out.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I said nothing of the kind. It was the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills). I said nothing of the sort.

MR. STANSFELD: If I am mistaken, of course, I apologize to the right hon. Gentleman. At any rate, the argument was adduced.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: But not by me.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would address himself to an argument which he thought the right hon. Gentlemen would not deny. The argument stood in this way. It had been supposed that the Consolidation Act of 1873 deprived the slave of the opportunity of procuring his freedom which was conferred upon him by the Act of 1824, for it provided that in case of an appeal from the decision of the Court on the seizure of a slaver, the slaver, instead of being surrendered, should be valued and treated as if he had become the prize of the Crown. His (Mr. Stansfeld's) answer to that objection and charge against the late Administration was, that that was the reading of the Act of 1873. The answer to that objection was that in the Act of 1873 no special provision was made respecting slaves illegally detained in slavery which had been specially provided for in the Act of 1824, which had become obsolete before the passing of the Act of 1873. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said the second Circular did infinitely more for the slave than any previous Circular. Now, if there was any infinitude at all, it was the infinitude of littleness, so far as the liberties of the slave were concerned. It deprived the captains of our ships of war of almost every possible discretion in dealing either with the reception or protection of slaves who might seek a refuge in their vessels. The Circular destroyed all discretion, and there was absolutely no conceivable case of a slave fleeing from outrage, torture, or even from life itself in which a captain would be entitled to exercise his discretion in receiving that slave under the protection of the British flag. According to the terms of the Circular a slave might be received on board if his life was in imminent danger; but when he had been rescued from that danger what was the commander of the ship called upon to do? He was no longer to permit that man to remain under the protection of the British flag or on board that vessel. The word "surrender," which was objectionable and dangerous, was avoided;

but, in point of fact, they did not leave any discretion to their commanders in any exigency, however urgent to receive a slave under the British flag. No one could imagine that whether the law did or did not require such a course of proceeding the country would submit to such a regulation. The hon. Member for West Norfolk said he could not vote for this Resolution because it was illegal and inconsistent with International Law and the obligations of Treaties; but he (Mr. Stansfeld) maintained there was nothing whatever illegal in the Resolution of his hon. Friend. He did not deny that the Circular was legal; but it did not express the policy and will of the country, and it imposed greater burdens than they were willing to take on themselves in regard to existing International Law and the comity of nations. International Law was somewhat elastic, and there was nothing in it which compelled them to deprive the commanders of their vessels of all discretion. The only penalty of refusing to surrender a slave would be compensation, and that penalty the country would be prepared to pay. A very sensible letter had appeared in The Times on the 28th of January—written by a captain who had served 10 years on the East Coast of Africa—as to the effect the Circular was likely to have on the officers of the Navy. The writer referred to a case which had occurred to himself, in which he was justified in exercising a discretion under the circumstances and giving refuge to a slave. He said he felt he had not a justification which would entitle him to refuse every compensation and he paid it, amounting to $60, out of his own pocket. He knew many would think him very wrong; but he was only too glad to get out of the scrape so cheaply. He added that cases of this description were not of frequent occurrence. The instance mentioned was the only one which had come under his notice during a service of 10 years in Africa and five in Brazil; but he thought the effect of the Circular would prevent captains from using their discretion. With reference to that letter, what he desired was, that there should be no tying of the hands of commanders of vessels so that they could not exercise discretion in the name and for the sake of humanity; and that if they did exercise it, the cost to which they were put in exercising that discretion should be repaid to them. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Tamworth was a curious one. Surely, if the Government and their supporters had the courage of their opinions, they would have negatived the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford; but they had not ventured to negative it, although they maintained that their Circular did all they could do for the slave under the hampering and fettering conditions of previous legislation. But what did the Amendment say? "That in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission" before withdrawing the Circular, which did nothing for personal liberty and forbade anything to be done. But the House must look not only to the Amendment, but to the terms of the Commission and to the Speech from the Throne, in order to see what the object of the Commission was. According to Her Majesty's gracious Speech, it was—

"to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for my ships and their Commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty."

But if such was the object of the Commission, did not the House perceive that that meant negotiations and Treaties with innumerable small slave-holding States? And, if there was any logic in the Amendment, the Circular must be maintained not only until the Report of the Commission, but until those negotiations and Treaties were concluded and greater power was obtained. Now, the House and the Government knew that the second Circular could not be maintained indefinitely. They knew perfectly well that the withdrawal of the second Circular was only a question of occasion and of time. The Government might not choose to withdraw it until they had come to issue upon the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Whitbread); that was a question for their own decision. What they had to do on that side of the House was to justify themselves before the House and the country, in supporting his hon. Friend, and in dividing with him on his Motion. There was one conclusive reason, whatever the issue might be, why they were bound to take the division to-night. He had not attempted to make any marked distinction between the action of successive Governments in this matter. He had admitted that in the decision of Lord Clarendon the present Government had found a precedent which they were entitled to use. But there was a respect in which no possible parallel could be made between that precedent and the action of the present Government. The precedent of Lord Clarendon was the personal decision of a Foreign Secretary who was divided against himself; but the second Circular was the deliberate production of a Cabinet, put before the country on the withdrawal of the previous Circular as their ultimate view of the obligations of this country with respect to the reception of fugitive slaves. But that was not all. The second Circular was the answer of the Cabinet to the almost unanimous and indignant demand of the British public for the withdrawal of their earlier Circular; and, that being the answer of the Cabinet to the demand of the British public, that public was bound to say whether it accepted that answer or not. But the House knew that the second Circular, in public opinion, was condemned as well as the first. If the House did not challenge that Circular, they would accept it and would be bound by it, as if it were the bond of all the slave-holding countries in the world for all time to come. That was an obligation which that side of the House could not accept for the purpose of avoiding the unpleasantness of a Party discussion. He did not know what the issue of that night's division would be, but he did know two things; first of all, that this Circular was already condemned by the country, and secondly, that, sooner or later, it would be withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON said, if ever there had been any doubt whether this was a Party discussion it was impossible, considering the words of the Motion and the time at which it had been introduced, to have any longer a doubt on the subject. Scarcely was it announced that a Royal Commission would be appointed, than the occasion was seized for the manufacturing of the Notice of Motion, and the interval which had elapsed since Notice was given had been devoted to a very extensive correspondence to secure a large attendance for a discussion which surely was not described in that correspondence as a non-Party discussion.

The topics involved in the issues before the House were grave, important, complicated, difficult to be discussed and decided in a large Assembly like the House of Commons, and much more likely to be prudently, wisely, and cautiously considered by a Commission nominated by the Crown. It was not a little worthy of notice that during this long discussion not a single statement had been made that anything contained in the second Circular was opposed to our law. In the matter under discussion there were some things clear and some things obscure. It could not be denied that a ship in the territorial waters of another State had an extra-territorial character for certain purposes; but in none of the remarks of hon. and learned Members opposite had he heard the unqualified statement that for all purposes it had an extra-territorial character. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had only stated that, as regarded the ship, her crew, and discipline, a public ship did possess extra-territoriality. It should be remembered that the wide privileges which a national ship possessed in the territorial waters of another State were conferred by the comity, which was another word for the courtesy, of nations, though the hon. and learned Member for Taunton appeared to speak as if they were different things. All those privileges were based on a presumed consent. That presumed consent implied two parties; and if one conferred those privileges, it was on condition that the municipal law of the country would not be violated by the other. Chief Justice Marshall, of the United States, put the proposition most widely for the ship, when he said the Sovereign of the port must be considered to have conceded a privilege to the extent to which it was asked; that was the way in which it was put in all recent discussions, and that was putting the case for the ship as widely and as broadly as on the whole could be suggested. He accepted the proposition; and, presuming that outside territorial waters the captain said—"I desire to enter your port, and I ask for the privilege of preserving the extra-territoriality of my ship and the privilege and right of carrying off fugitive slaves which may come on board my ship," could there be any doubt what the answer of the Sovereign of the port would be? We could not, in considering the matter, discard the dictates of common sense. The ship was not invited; it was a matter of indifference to the Sovereign of the port whether it entered or not; it went there voluntarily, it might be for supplies—and surely it was a strong proposition, and an entirely unreasonable one, unsupported by law, that that vessel was not bound to respect the municipal law of the port. The answer to the objection of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), that the second Circular did not refer to any class except that of slaves, was furnished by the heading, "Fugitive Slave Circular." That meant it did not purport to deal with political refugees, who were dealt with by other Circulars; but it was presupposed to be addressed specially to those who would have to consult it in countries where slavery was a domestic institution. The second Circular dealt fairly, moderately, and with a caution which was absolutely necessary with an intricate and difficult question; but it preserved absolutely our own jurisdiction; it repudiated absolutely the right of surrender. It did not unduly run in the face of the domestic institution of any country, and it had been argued that that was practically the same as surrender; but it was nothing of the kind. The Circular did not deal with cases of extradition; it preserved to the captain the power of deciding as to the retention of a slave with the courteous regard to the obligation cast upon him by the hospitality he received. If the hon. Member for Bedford wanted a Circular that would please slave-owners more, he would find in the Sailing Orders of 1871 an order after the slave-owner's own heart. The withdrawn Circular required, before anything at all was gone into, that there should be a demand by a slave-owner; but even that was not to be found in the Sailing Orders of 1871, which, whether there was a demand or not, placed captains not only under an obligation to restore slaves to slavery, but to find out the owner of each slave and restore him to his owner. The right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House spoke ungenerously of that eminent statesman the late Lord Clarendon, and said those Orders were the mere personal decisions of a Foreign Secretary divided against himself. Whatever might be the issue of this discussion, there could be little doubt as to on which side of the House generosity and manliness lay. On the first night of the Session the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government manfully, frankly, and boldly avowed his responsibility for the Circulars issued under his Government. There was no questioning or denying. Let the House contrast that with what it heard from the front bench opposite. The Act of Parliament of 1873, passed when the late Government was in power, was not three years old, and yet they could not find out its author. It was a kind of foundling Act of Parliament. They had been unable to discover the source of the Sailing Orders. Lord Clarendon was a statesman of experience, and a distinguished Liberal Leader and statesman. He was dead; but the suggestion was that the matter rested on his mere personal decision, and that he was divided against himself. But was that so? The Note of June, 1856, was specially founded upon the Aberdeen Act, was justified under the special circumstances of the case, and harmonized with subsequent Acts. As to Lord Palmerston, it was said that he acted on his own responsibility. Well, he acted on his own responsibility for many years in a prominent and powerful position. But he was no more, and he was passed by as a person who was not entitled to any special weight upon this matter. It had been said that the second Circular should be withdrawn; but what was the proposed substitute? Instead of something clear and definite, they found in the Resolution a careful abstention from suggesting any single plain proposition as to the status of a fugitive slave when he got on board a man-of-war. It was not stated either by implication or at all that the fugitive slave when he went on board a man-of-war acquired the status of a free man. On the contrary, the words, prepared with consideration and consultation, were very cautious, and simply said that the slave must be treated as if he were free. Was there anything in the second Circular inconsistent with that? As to the fugitive not being asked to leave the ship on the ground that he was a slave, he might be required to do so on any other ground for all that appeared in the Resolution. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton had not gone beyond the Resolution; he shrank from stating that the fugitive slave acquired the status of freedom in territorial waters. From beginning to end there was no suggestion that went to the extent of asserting the status of the fugitive; but the cautious terms of the Resolution minimized the undefined and uncertain rights of our men-of-war. The words, "admitted to the protection of the British flag," according to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton and the letters of "Historicus," meant admitted on board a British ship with the sanction of the captain; and if that sanction were wanting, the slave could not be regarded as admitted to the protection of the British flag. That entirely gave up the principle contended for that the slave who planted his foot on a British ship acquired the status of a free man. That was a broad proposition contended for out-of-doors, but not accepted by the other side, or supported by the authority of "Historicus." The case of the stowaway slave who had stood upon the deck of a British man-of-war, under the English flag, but who had been surrendered back into slavery, was one in point, and it was a mere quibble, for principle there was none, to say that there was any distinction between a stowaway slave and a fugitive slave, because the former had come on board surreptitiously, and without the consent of the commander of the vessel. Once it was admitted that persons with the admitted status of slaves could stand on the deck of a British man-of-war without losing that status, and without becoming free, then the arguments that had been used by hon. Members opposite resolved themselves into mere sentiment. In some foreign stations slaves were employed in coaling our ships of war, and he wished that hon. Members opposite would tell him what was the status of the 100 or 200 slaves after they had been so employed; was the commander of the British man-of-war to carry them away to freedom, or to surrender them back to slavery? Turning to the Act of 1873, he asked whether there was any magic in the word "fugitive," as applied to slaves, that gave a fugitive slave a different status from all other slaves, because under that Act slaves seized on board ships, under certain conditions, were to be restored to slavery, notwithstanding they had set foot on board our men-of-war. What distinction could it make that the slaves were seized in the course of an Act for the suppression of the slave trade? The point remained that a slave could admittedly stand on the deck of a British man-of-war without, according to British law, losing his status of a slave. As to the right of the commanding officers of our men-of-war to receive slaves on board of their ships, he said nothing, because the point was concluded by the admirable quotation from "Historicus" which had been cited by the Secretary of State for War, in which that eminent and distinguished writer suggested that the proper course for the commander of a ship of war to take was to give directions to the officers of the watch and to the sentries on duty that under no circumstances were they to allow a slave to set foot on board his vessel. The result of the rule laid down by that learned writer was, that either absolutely no discretion was left to our naval officers in the matter, or else that they were so bound down and fettered by rules that they could scarcely take any independent action with regard to the reception or the non-reception of fugitive slaves. But what bearing had our Treaties on this question? He would take the case of Madagascar, mentioned in the Papers. By Treaties affecting the Slave Trade of Madagascar all the slaves imported after 1865 were to be made free. Supposing, however, that Madagascar should claim to be freed from the obligation, on the ground that our vessels of war had carried off as free persons who had been imported as slaves before that date, and should therefore refuse to set free those who had been imported in subsequent years, should we not be obliged to admit the justice of their reasoning; and would it be prudent to imperil the success of a Treaty under which thousands of slaves would be set free, in order that we might carry off in a half-smuggling, unsatisfactory way, without making compensation to their owners, some two or three slaves who succeeded in getting on board our men-of-war? The question of Treaties was one which was to be considered with the closest possible attention. The course adopted by the Government on this most important and difficult occasion, of issuing a Commission of exceptional strength, was most desirable. He ventured to think that the debates which had occurred, and that the contradictory opinions which had been expressed even by eminent lawyers, showed the desirability of settling the question by the issue of a Royal Commission. He should support the Amendment, and he ventured to hope and believe that the labours of the Commission would result in the acquisition of information which would largely tend to the development of the principle of personal freedom.

Mr. Gibson

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that at this late stage of the discussion they should endeavour to clear it from the extraneous matters which had grown up in the course of the debate, and which only tended to obscure the real point at issue. He would, therefore, ask the House to be patient with him for a short time while he endeavoured to get rid of the husk in order to arrive at the kernel. In doing so he refused altogether to discuss the tu quoque argument which had formed the staple of the speeches from the other side. It was at its best a very bad political argument, and was quite out of place when they were discussing a national question. A great deal had been said about the difference between domestic slavery and the slave trade, and he admitted that while we had made great efforts to put down the latter, we had not undertaken a crusade against domestic slavery. The question was how we were to deal with the question of the position of a slave on board an English ship-of-war. That had nothing whatever to do with the question of the slave trade as affected by our Treaties, and the rights we had in foreign territories. There had been a great deal of mystification about the Treaties. No doubt those Treaties authorized exceptional acts. If you got leave from a man to go into his house to do a particular act, of course you were not at liberty to do any other act than that which he had authorized you to do. But what had that to do with the rights you had in your own house or on board your own ship, which was a totally different thing, and that was the thing they were discussing that night. If they went under slave trade Treaties and took steps which were not authorized, they would be rendering themselves guilty of unlawful acts. A good deal had been made of the Act of 1873. That was the cheval de bataille of the hon. Member for Tamworth, and so complete was his oblivion on the subject that when the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) asked him if that was such a dreadful Act why he did not do something to prevent its passing or to amend it, he said, with all the confidence of youth—"I was not in Parliament at that time." He (Sir William Harcourt) should have thought that one of the first things which the hon. Member for Tamworth would have remembered would have been that he had a seat in the last Parliament, and if he sat in the last Parliament he must have been present when the Act of 1873 was passed.

MR. HANBURY said, that a minute after he said he was not in Parliament at the time he recollected that he was in Parliament, and he immediately went across the floor of the House, and communicated the correction to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton while he was speaking, in order that he might put it before the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not intend to cast any reproach upon the hon. Member for Tamworth. The Act of 1873 had altered nothing in the state of our legislation with reference to the slave trade or the question of slavery. It was a pure Consolidation Act prepared by Mr. Rothery, who had charge of the Slave Trade Department. The notion that it had altered the state of things was a complete delusion. All the arguments therefore which were founded upon that notion were false trails which had been drawn across the scent. He would, however, come to the real question before the House. The whole subject might be divided into two questions—were we bound by international obligations to surrender a slave taken on board in the territorial waters of another State or were we not? That was a question of law; and, secondly, if we were not so bound, should we do so? That was a question of policy. He would apply himself to the first point—Were they bound as a matter of international obligation to surrender a slave in that situation? He said, without hesitation and without limitation—They were not bound to do so. He would refer to the first Circular, not for any purpose of recrimination, but simply to examine the question of law, because it was important to see why the first Circular was withdrawn, and what was the bad law which induced its withdrawal. He did not wish to add to the difficulties and embarrassments of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. They were sufficiently considerable. But the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) opposite took upon himself to lecture Gentlemen on the other side of the House as to manliness and generosity in the way they treated their own Party. He thought that the hon. and learned Member might have taken into consideration the manner in which the Law Officers of the Crown were treated by the Government before he delivered his lecture on the subject. The first Circular was founded on a supposed obligation on the part of a ship to submit to the local law of the port. Well, if that was so, all he could say was that they reduced the Queen's ships to the condition of a merchant vessel, because that was the situation of a merchant vessel; but if that doctrine was true, then he very much agreed with the Attorney General that the first Circular was just as good as the second. If you said there was this distinction between a public vessel and a merchant vessel, that in the case of a merchant vessel the authorities of the port carried out the police regulations themselves on board the ship, but in the case of a public vessel the ship's officers were to execute the local law, that was not immunity at all, and he would much prefer that their own police should come and do their own dirty work in a Queen's ship. That was not what he meant by the immunity of a public ship. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War challenged him to say what he meant by extra-territoriality. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to intimate that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton and himself (Sir William Harcourt) would shrink from defining extra-territoriality. But he did not shrink, and he would give the right hon. Gentleman a definition of it in words which would deserve more attention than any he (Sir William Harcourt) could utter. M. Ortolan, a distinguished captain in the French Marine, and a great international jurist, speaking of extra-territoriality, said, and he (Sir William Harcourt) adopted his words—

"This phrase signifies nothing else except that you must conduct yourself everywhere in respect of facts which occur and of persons who are found on board a ship-of-war as if those facts had occurred or those persons were found in the territory of the nation to which the ship belongs. This phrase announces a principle in a manner which makes it intelligible to all—to ordinary persons as well as to scientific lawyers, to the common sailor as well as to the officer. It teaches those who belong to the ship the sentiment of their native soil. It identifies the one with the other. If this phrase were not in use; if it had not become common in all nations, it would have been necessary to invent it."

That was what he meant by the extra-territoriality of a ship, and he did think it most dangerous and most deplorable that the authorities, either law or political, in a Government which rested more than anything else upon its naval arm, should be occupied from the beginning of the question in casting doubts upon the immunity of their ships. If anybody would read the speech of the Attorney General, of the Secretary of State for War, or of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, they would see that they had exerted all their ingenuity and influence to cut down the principle upon which more than anything else depended the integrity and strength of the Navy. He ventured to say that the right hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had in his speech conveyed, though in different language, exactly the sentiments of his gallant colleague in the French Navy. There was a danger in the question, a mischief in both Circulars which was a question of national importance greater even than the importance of the slavery question itself. The Attorney General, who had referred to a work in which the use of metaphors was condemned, seemed to have studied that work with very little profit, for when he spoke of the extra-territoriality of merchant vessels he used a metaphor which was inapplicable and untrue. Merchant vessels were not extra-territorial within the waters of foreign States, but ships of war were. On the high seas, in war and in peace, such a ship was extra-territorial; in the harbours of foreign States, at all times, in all conditions, and to every extent, she was extra-territorial; and when England shook that doctrine she shook the doctrine on which navies depended, and which no other maritime State in the world would surrender. He asserted that doctrine with some confidence, because it was mainly in consequence of its having been violated in the first Circular that the Circular was withdrawn. It said that the public ship on the high seas was a part of Her Majesty's dominions, but it implied that when she went into a foreign port she ceased to be a part of those dominions. When a jurist of the eminence of Lord Cairns came to consider that proposition, he found it was untenable, and the first Circular was withdrawn. But it was urged that, though that immunity existed, comity required them to regard the local law. There had been a great deal of doubt expressed by persons who had not made it their study as to what was meant by comity. The comity of nations was a very useful phrase, conveying a very intelligible idea. It had to do with a subject no doubt complicated in its application, which was called "the conflict of laws." The nature of that principle was a very simple one. It assumed the native domestic jurisdiction as being supreme; but it was found that in the communications which must be held between different States questions of foreign law would arise, and that in their internal and domestic jurisdiction it might be necessary and convenient to give operation to foreign law; and so they did in reference to contracts, status, and all manner of subjects. But then there lay at the bottom of it this fundamental principle—the question as to how far that foreign law should be applied, what kind of foreign law, in what manner, and to what extent it should be applied. And that was the basis of the application of the principle of comity. Now, being the judges how far that foreign law was to be applied, they might say there were certain classes of cases where, within our own jurisdiction, we would not apply foreign law. What were those cases? That greatest master on the subject of comity and the conflict of laws, Story, said—

Sir William Harcourt

"There are well established exceptions to the application of foreign law within your own jurisdiction, and what are these exceptions? All contracts and other similar things which in their own nature are founded on moral turpitude, and are inconsistent with the good order and sacred interests of society. All such contracts, though they might be held valid in the country where they are made, would be held void elsewhere, and ought to be, if the dictates of Christian morality, or even of natural justice, are allowed to have due force and influence in the administration of international jurisprudence."

The next class of exceptions mentioned by Story were those contracts which were opposed to national policies and institutions; and such contracts were to be held void, whatever might be their validity in the country where they were made, because they were inconsistent with the policies and institutions of other countries where they were sought to be enforced; and Story mentioned slavery as an example of that principle. What followed from that? If the first proposition was clear, that a ship of war was ex-territorial, and therefore within their jurisdiction, then the comity of nations did not call on them to enforce on board such a ship any foreign law which violated the principles to which he had referred, and therefore not to enforce the law of slavery. That he believed to be the answer to the question raised with respect to the comity of nations. Then it was said—"Are you to go and force yourselves upon foreign States and offend and outrage them as you like?" Certainly not. Foreign States had a right to prescribe the conditions upon which they admitted to their ports. That he fully admitted. He admitted, also, that they ought to deal with weak States on the same principle as they dealt with strong. It was the great and sacred principle of the Law of Nations to assert that doctrine, and it was for the assertion and maintenance of that doctrine that the Law of Nations existed—that it should declare the equality of rights between the dwarfs and the giants of nations. But there was a correlative to that proposal—namely, that they had a right to declare the conditions which they would or would not accept. He would give an instance. In old days the British Ambassador would not be received by the Emperor of China unless he made the "kotow;" but our Ambassador (Lord Macartney) refused to go through that ceremony, and the Emperor of China admitted him all the same. He thought Lord Macartney took the proper line. There was a condition in old times that no trader should enter Japan unless he trampled on the Cross. The Dutch, he believed, entered on those terms, but others declined to enter on those terms, and people now traded with Japan without first trampling on the Cross. We could refuse, and we could prescribe the terms on which alone we would consent to enter the ports of foreign States. We had done so. The other day he met with a very remarkable document. It was a Treaty 200 years old, which dealt with this very question of the principles for which he was now contending. In those days the Barbary States—among others, Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers—were powerful in the Mediterranean, and we had to deal with them as equals. In 1686 we made a Treaty with them in which it was declared that, when any of His Majesty's ships of war appeared before Tripoli, notice should be given by our Consul or the commander of the ship to the Chief Governor of Tripoli, when proclamation should be made to secure Christian captives; and, after that, if any Christians whatsoever made their escape on board any of the ships of war of His Majesty, they should not be required back again, nor should the said Consul or commander, or any other of His Majesty's subjects, be obliged to pay anything for the said Christians. That Treaty was made by a Monarch whom we did not regard in all respects as an admirable Sovereign; but the last Prince of the House of Stuart who sat on the British Throne, whatever faults he might have had, was a distinguished British Admiral. He knew what belonged to the English flag, and he made it a condition that when a slave escaped on board one of his ships he should not be restored. That Treaty was frequently repeated in the course of the subsequent century, and it was founded upon this principle:—"We do not come to your ports to invite away your slaves, to surprise you, or to take you at a disadvantage. We give you notice to take care of your slaves if you can; but we will not act as your police, and if these slaves get on board our ships we will not give them back." That was the principle upon which the Treaty was founded. We went on in the same way during the last century making Treaties of that kind. The Treaty of Tunis in 1751 laid down that if any slave of Tunis got on board an English man-of-war he should be free, and that neither the English Consul nor any person of his nation should be questioned on the subject. Those were Treaties, but precisely the same thing might be done by a Resolution such as was now before them. We might, in effect, say to foreign States—"We don't you intend to take which they might have done, they put in a dilatory plea, and asked the House to wait until they had time to consider the laws of foreign States. The sentiment of that paragraph was ignoble, and he hoped that whatever they did they would spare the House of Commons the humiliation of declaring that on the question of slavery they must wait until they knew the attitude of other Powers. He ventured to say that that sentence would be taken by the English people as an insult to the national pride. He thought that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were the Party of a spirited nation; but he asked if it was part of their spirited foreign policy that they should look calmly on until they had ascertained what was the view taken by other countries with regard to our national ships? What did the Amendment declare? The first thing it declared, as it appeared to him, was the incapacity of Her Majesty's Ministers to deal with great national subjects. They did not want a Royal Commission in July. They thought they could settle the question themselves, and with the help of their Law Officers they issued the first Circular. The country pronounced against it. They suspended it in October, and cancelled it in November. They did not want a Royal Commission then, and they thought themselves capable, with a great lawyer as Lord Chancellor, of settling the question, and so the second Circular was issued. It was not until they were about to meet Parliament, and that they feared an Amendment would be moved on the Address, that the necessity of having a Royal Commission occurred to them. After these incredible failures, extending over eight months, what had they done? They had determined that Her Majesty's Government must go elsewhere—to other persons to settle the question which they had failed to settle for themselves, and that was the conduct of what was called a great and capable Administration. He did not complain of the judgment which they passed on themselves. They and the majority behind them had a right to judge of the capacity of the Government, and if they chose to solicit a Vote of Want of Confidence in themselves, they had a right to do so; but the Amendment did more, inasmuch as it offered a Vote of Want of Confidence in the House of Commons.

Sir William Harcourt

That was a far more serious matter, and he should like to know when, in the course of this century, the House of Commons had felt itself to be incapable of dealing with the question of slavery? They and their ancestors before them had dealt with it over and over again, and yet the Amendment sought to declare that they were wanting in knowledge, prudence, and courage, and must resign to a Royal Commission a duty which they ought themselves to perform. If that were so, they were, he could not help thinking, very unworthy descendants of those whom they had succeeded. They might, however, that evening pronounce against the capacity of the Government or against the competence of the House of Commons. But there was one thing he ventured to say they could not do, and that was to deprive the minority who sat on the opposite side of the House of the privilege of exercising their rights and declaring their principles. If the Government did not know their own minds on the question, the Opposition knew theirs; if the Government had no policy, the Opposition had; and their principles were contained in the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford. His hon. Friend bore an honoured name, and he would pay him no higher tribute of praise than to say that he was worthy of that name. He had placed on the Journals of the House a Resolution which, whatever might be its fate that evening, would live. It might be defeated by a dilatory Amendment; but that Amendment could not destroy it. It would still remain, and would in the end prevail, because it expressed the determined resolve and the enlightened judgment of the English nation.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, that if it were for the advantage of the slave and the amelioration of his hateful condition that the question before the House should be decided in this great country amid agitation and excitement, and without due deliberation, the speech of his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down and the line of debate from beginning to end was admirably conducive to that result. A Circular had been issued by the Government, which had afterwards been frankly and readily withdrawn. That Circular had been succeeded by another, which it was admitted contained concessions which exceeded in the favour of the slave any similar State Paper which had been issued by previous Governments. But Her Majesty's Ministers had not stopped there. They believed they had given instructions which were in consonance with the municipal law of England and with the International Law of the world. The Circular did not violate any Treaty obligations; but in order that the noble and generous feeling which had been evoked in this country should have full play, and that it might be seen whether any improvement in the condition of those who were now slaves could be effected, they further proposed the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject. The duties of that Commission had, he might add, been intrusted to men than whom better could not be selected—among them a noble Duke, who was honoured and respected for his independence; and a Chief Justice, of whom he would only say that he had before now on a great occasion had the honour of England as well as the interpretation of International Law committed to his charge, and he had proved himself worthy of the confidence which had been reposed in him by the country. The other Members of the Commission were also men of eminence, and when the Government proposed that they should investigate the whole question, they were taunted by persons who themselves had belonged to an Administration which issued Circulars similar to those of which complaint was now made. But the true state of the case was that a mistake had been committed in issuing the first Circular, and that a wonderful opportunity of making political capital had thus been afforded to frozen-out politicians. At a period when the Party opposite were in hopeless and apparently endless exile, there came an angel to them one morning in the shape of this first Slave Circular. He need not describe with what promptitude, skill, and eloquence the occasion was instantly seized. His hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General (Sir Henry James)—than whom there was no more alert, astute, and, he might add, cautious politician—rushed down to his constituents, and having denounced that part of the first Circular which dealt with taking slaves on board Her Majesty's ships in territorial waters, said—"This is done by the Conservative Party." The substance of his hon. and learned Friend's accusation was that his Party had never dishonoured the country's love of liberty as this retrograde and top-boots Party had. Well, this retrograde Party took counsel together and withdrew the Circular which had given the opportunity to the Party opposite. That proceeding was rather disappointing to them, and when it was found that this business was to be taken altogether out of the arena of popular excitement by the nomination of a Royal Commission, by whom the subject could be calmly considered and studied, there was among the ranks of the Opposition considerable lamentation. Still they were equal to the occasion, for on the very day on which Her Majesty's Gracious Speech was delivered, a Motion skilfully, and he would add—if the expression were not un-Parliamentary—craftily drawn, was placed on the Notice Paper of this House. In principle it hardly differed in the smallest degree from the terms or challenged the law of the second Circular, but there was a wonderful display in its language. He felt the greatest diffidence in venturing to follow his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down in his disquisition on extra-territoriality; but it was necessary that he should do so for a few moments in order to remove the impression which had been left upon the House that by the Circular now in existence and by the later policy of Her Majesty's Government grave doubts were thrown on the immunity of British ships in foreign waters. The greater part of his hon. and learned Friend's speech on the legal branch of the subject was devoted to a development of this question:—"Are you bound to surrender a slave?" though after the hon. and learned Gentleman had gone on for some time he admitted that there was nothing whatever about the surrender of a slave in the present Circular; and he then called attention to some terms of that Circular in which captains and commanders of Her Majesty's ships of war were directed not only not to surrender, but that they were not to entertain any demand for surrender. His hon. and learned Friend next asked whether we maintained the immunity of British ships of war. The fact was that that immunity was maintained in the most absolute manner. Let him now call attention to another expression which was very likely to mislead. His hon. and learned Friend said we must either violate the law of the place or we must enforce it, and he asked whether it could be said we should violate the law of the place if we took on board a drowning man. In no respect could that be a violation of the law of the place; but if we saved the man and then sailed away with him, that would be a very different thing, if by the law of the place he was regarded as the property of his master. For all the purposes of maintaining and enforcing the discipline of our ships and for all purposes connected with our country, such as the protection of Her Majesty's subjects, he contended that our ex-territoriality and our immunity from local law was clearly asserted and fully maintained by the second Circular. But it was a different thing when we came to those things which we were to do or to abstain from doing in regard to a foreign State, for the ex-territoriality was the consequence, and not the cause, of the immunity. The commander of a ship who took advantage of the ex-territoriality was bound in return to have consideration for the institutions of the country. There might be no process of the local law whereby this obligation on the part of a commander of a foreign ship of war could be enforced, yet by the Commerce of Nations he was bound conscientiously to observe it; for this was, if he might use the expression, the equity of International Law on the subject. He must repeat that there was nothing in this second Circular that called on a captain or commander of a British ship of war to enforce the local law of slavery. There was in it nothing of the kind. The commander was called upon not to violate the law of the place; but this was a totally different thing from actively enforcing it. His hon. and learned Friend announced that he had discovered the means of extricating the Government from their difficulties. He said that we had a right to make any conditions we pleased before going into a foreign port, and if they did not choose to admit us we were free. That was, of course, quite true; but how were we to give notice of these conditions according to his hon. and learned Friend? It was by passing a Resolution of the House of Commons and communicating it to foreign Governments. This was certainly a most astounding process. They had all heard of quasi instruments of different kinds; but a quasi treaty such as this, made by a mere Resolution of the House of Commons was a suggestion seldom before heard of. The proposal could hardly be seriously intended; it was a means of escaping from the rather difficult position in which his hon. and learned Friend found himself. But passing away from the law of the case and dealing with the subject generally, it was obvious that policy must be considered as well as the legal bearings of the case. He had heard with great pleasure, as every one must have heard, his hon. and learned Friend dilate so eloquently upon the course which England would wish to pursue on this subject. For his part, he should rejoice if any better plan could be found for dealing with slavery than that which for many years had been adopted by this country. When, however, his hon. and learned Friend taunted the Government with not having produced at once a brand-new scheme upon this subject, he should remember that the present Government had not been in power as frequently and as long as their predecessors. It would have been well, therefore, to concede a little time and forbearance. It should be borne in mind that the policy now adopted towards these semi-barbarous States was one of gradual amelioration. We endeavoured to make friends of these peoples, and by observing carefully all the obligations of international amity, to make our example and influence felt among them, that we might obtain Treaties and secure advantages for the slaves. With several countries we had succeeded in making Treaties whereby no slaves were to be introduced into the country after a certain period. This was what was meant when it was said that a slave country was on the road to freedom. But if these friendly relations were broken off, and an attitude of stern repudiation of slavery was adopted towards these countries, we might sacrifice great material advantages for the indulgence of what might then turn out to be little more than a selfish boast. How many slaves could be emancipated by such a policy? How many slaves in a year should we succeed in emancipating? A few, perhaps, on the coast; but what would become of those in the interior, where our ships could not reach? In vast tracts of country in Africa slavery luxuriated. It had long been the policy of England gradually to trench upon its domains, to beat it back inch by inch, and keep this distress and crime from the people; and while, on the one hand, he was proud to have witnessed the generous outburst of feeling on this subject, it was important that this feeling should not be allowed to run into excess, and should be wisely regulated. The days were gone by when it was necessary to raise a storm of indignation on the subject of slavery. All parties united absolutely as one upon this subject. Their object was to ameliorate as best they could the present position of the slave and ultimately to eradicate the crime altogether. But the means of doing so necessarily required the most careful consideration. He therefore submitted to the House that the appointment of the Commission, which was the real question upon which they would divide, was a wise step, not only because it was likely to produce trustworthy information, but because the results of its labours would be accepted with entire confidence by the country. He trusted that these results would afford the foundation of perhaps a more perfect scheme for dealing with the crime and the curse of slavery than any system which had up to the present time been arrived at.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I congratulate the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down upon the temper and moderation with which he terminated his speech; and in one of his concluding sentences I thought I heard an indication that perhaps, whatever may be the result of the divisions upon the Resolution, this debate has not been without effect—that the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) will be accepted, and that, at all events, the second Circular will be withdrawn until the termination of the labours of the Commission. In the somewhat passionate exordium of the hon. and learned Gentleman, however, he was somewhat bolder than any speakers who preceded him upon that side of the House. We have heard a good deal of recrimination. We have heard some unpleasant truths. We, on this side of the House, have been called hard names during the debate. As far as I can gather, the burden of the speeches made has been—"Whatever we have done, we are not worse than you." But it was reserved for the hon. and learned Gentleman to claim that the present Government has done more to benefit fugitive slaves than any Government which preceded it. If the fugitive slave was under preceding Governments suffering from harsh and oppressive enactments, as the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken would lead us to suppose, I can only say that such preceding Governments have, somehow or other, been singularly unsuccessful in bringing that fact to the knowledge of their subordinate officers. I take up the Papers which have been presented to Parliament in reference to the subject, and I find it stated, in almost the first despatch, that on the 17th of July, 1871, Colonel Pelly sought instructions from the Government of Bombay for his guidance in such cases. In their reply, dated November 29, 1871, the Government of Bombay quoted the opinion of the Honourable the Advocate General, to the following effect:—

"The commander of a British ship of war is not bound to receive fugitive slaves on board his vessel, yet if he does receive them they become free. And the Commanders of British men-of-war would not only be authorized in refusing to surrender a slave who had found refuge on board his vessel, but would incur very serious legal responsibilities if he in any way attempted to coerce that slave to return to his master."

I will not trouble the House by referring further to the Papers, but will simply remark that whenever you find the opinion of a subordinate officer given upon this question, there is one universal opinion throughout the Service that the slave who has been received on board, under the protection of the British flag, becomes free, and that the captain of the vessel is not bound to surrender him. How will the House reconcile that with the assertions which have been so freely made by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has last addressed it? I perfectly admit that decisions—perhaps more than one—upon isolated cases have been given which I, in common with others who have spoken on this side of the House, deeply regret; but I do not think it is possible to contend that the regulations of preceding Governments have been consistently in that direction; or, if they had, I cannot conceive how it would have been possible for their subordinates to have entertained so universal and exactly contrary an opinion. The discussion to-night has, as was not unnatural, been confined, to a great extent, to Members of the legal profession, for it has turned mainly upon points of International Law. I do not myself intend to go into that question; but I shall state as briefly as I can what seems to me to be the real question upon which the House will have to decide. We are going to decide whether the Motion which has been submitted by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford adequately expresses the sense of the House and the country upon the subject of the reception and retention of fugitive slaves; and whether, if that is so, the Resolution contains anything which is inconsistent with our international obligations. In the next place, we shall have to decide whether, if that be so, the Circular recently issued by the Government, or any previous instructions issued by any preceding Government, conflicts with principles so asserted by the House. And we shall have further to decide whether the recent Circular, even in parts where the doctrine it lays down is sound, does not invidiously and unnecessarily restrict the discretion of our officers in regard to the reception of fugitive slaves. The Motion of my hon. Friend was not aimed exclusively at the Circular of the Government, but it was aimed—and the terms of it are distinct—at instructions which have been issued also by preceding Governments. The speech in which the Motion was laid before the House was conceived in the same spirit. My hon. Friend said he deeply regretted that his Motion would affect not only the Circular of the present Government, but instructions which had been given by a Government to which he had given his support. He imputed no blame to the Government, but simply asked the House to assent to a certain declaration of policy which should become the guide of our naval commanders in all parts of the world in relation to our dealings with fugitive slaves. Is there anything, either in Treaties or in the obligations of International Law, which conflicts with the principle which my hon. Friend asked the House to assent to? If there is one thing which has been distinctly proved in the course of these debates, it is that there is no such conflicting Treaty. I ask, Is there any international obligation resting upon a general principle of law which militates against the principle of my hon. Friend's Motion? I believe there is no such obligation. Attempts have been made to lead us away from the question submitted to us to a much wider and very different issue. The question the House should remember is, not whether there exists the right on the part of the slave to make his way upon the deck of an English man-of-war and there claim his freedom, but, on the contrary, whether there exists on the part of the owner, or any one on his behalf, a right to make his way on board that vessel and there claim to have the slave restored to slavery. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War contended the other night that to maintain that there was nothing in the Circular which was contrary to law was all he had to do. Well, there may be nothing contrary to law in it, that was admitted; but I maintain that that is not enough for the Government. What the Government have to do is to show that there is nothing in it in excess of what is required of us by our international obligations, and that it is that, as it appears to me, the Government have failed to do. Sir, the first Circular has been disowned by almost every Gentleman who has addressed the House. The First Lord of the Treasury said the other night that it has been condoned by the country. Whether it will be so completely condoned by the country after the speech of the Attorney General and the Secretary for War, we shall presently, perhaps, find out. But whether the first Circular is condoned or not, this observation occurs to me—that when we find any Member of the Government, or any hon. Gentleman on that side of the House defending the second Circular, we find them getting into a line of argument which would cover the first Circular itself. The Attorney General, defending his own work the other night, completely set up and defended the first Circular, and maintained that it was in accordance with the principle of International Law; and although the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War said he was not here to defend the first Circular it occurs to me that his argument also went far to defend that Circular. When the right hon. Gentleman in eloquent phrase appealed to the justice of England, which he said ought to be as great as her mercy, what did the right hon. Gentleman mean by justice except this—that when the slaveowner demanded the restoration of a slave who had been received on board of one of our men-of-war he made a just demand? [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: What I said was “honour and truth.”] Well, I was under the impression that the words of the right hon. Gentleman were that great as is the mercy of England her justice ought to be still greater—namely, that in justice she was bound to yield to the demand for the restoration of a slave to slavery. The right hon. Gentleman says he used the words “honour and truth,” not “justice and mercy;” and if he considers that it would be consistent with honour and truth to deliver up a slave on the demand of his owner, I can make him a present of the distinction. But, Sir, the Government does not go the length of the whole principle of surrender. If justice, or rather honour and truth, demanded such surrender, why did the second Circular distinctly order the commanders of our ships not to entertain any demand for the surrender of slaves? International Law either requires that upon the demand of the owner the slave should be surrendered, or, as I understood the assertion, justice prefers that the slave should be surrendered; but the Circular distinctly instructs our naval officers not to surrender the slave, at the same time stating that they were not to allow the slave to remain on board—for what reason I feel myself at a loss to guess, if, indeed, justice did not require it. If you controvert the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, are you prepared to adopt the opposite opinion, and to say that, in the opinion of this House, when a slave is once admitted to the protection of the British flag he ought not to be treated as if he were free, but may be removed from or ordered to leave the ship on the ground of slavery? No, you are not prepared to consider him a slave on board one of Her Majesty’s ships. You are halting between two opinions. You laid down in the first Circular what you were advised by your Law Officers was required of you by international obligations, and you found that the law as so stated was not acceptable to the people of this country. You have retracted to a certain extent the law so laid down in the first Circular, but you retain the policy of that Circular, and you order your commanders, if not to surrender the slaves, to do exactly the same thing; for they are not to be allowed to remain on board ship. It has been frequently said—and I have no hesitation in repeating it—that we have not sought to make this a Party question. I do not know what precautions we have omitted to remove this question from the arena of Party. The Resolution is not aimed at one Circular only or at any one set of instructions. We condemn all instructions, by whatever Government they may have been issued, which infringe the principles we ask the House to adopt. But when we are told by the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) that the present Government were hampered or fettered by the decision of its predecessors, and when we are told by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy), in referring to the Act of 1873, that he regrets that he and his Friends did not do their duty in watching the passing of that Act, let me ask the right hon. Gentleman, who will follow me, whether when the Government were preparing the first Circular they were even aware of the precedent of 1871, or whether it has not been hunted up since the withdrawal of that Circular, in order to furnish the Government with an excuse? And let me also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, when the Cabinet were deliberating on the second Circular, they found themselves much hampered by the Act of 1873? The right hon. Gentleman, who spoke the other night, need not reproach his conscience for his omission in allowing the passing of that Act, which is, I am informed, what it professed to be. It was simply a Consolidation Act, and the part to which he referred—merely the repealed clauses—had become utterly and absolutely obsolete. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues found themselves hampered when they were preparing the second Circular by the provisions of the Act of 1873, let them take it in hand and alter it to what it ought to be. We have been told that the first Circular has been condoned. Now, I will ask whether—after all the recriminations and accusations which have been hurled at the late Government, and the frank admission of error that has been made from these benches—the despatch of Lord Clarendon in 1871 has not been condoned also. I will ask whether the country would desire, upon the authority of one or two isolated decisions, given in individual cases, and partly mixed up with considerations of an extraneous character to fix the stigma of pro-slavery tendencies upon the reputation of a Statesman like Lord Clarendon? I will ask whether the House and the country would bear more hardly upon the isolated decisions of Lord Clarendon, who never had the opportunity of explaining or defending them, than upon the deliberate action of a Cabinet warned by the almost unanimous voice of a whole people that they were treading upon dangerous ground? Much has been said about the secrecy of the instructions of the late Government. I deny that there was any secrecy. The fact is, that no instructions were ever issued by the late Government; all they did was through the Foreign Office, which gave its decisions on isolated cases upon the facts submitted to it. There is not the slightest excuse for saying that the Circular alluded to, which never was issued by the late Government, was a secret one. A despatch of Lord Clarendon was sent to the Commodore on the station, and he, on his own authority, translated it into what are called Station Orders; but there was no secrecy; on the contrary, the decisions of the Government, of which so much has been made, were laid on the Table of the House, and the House of Commons and the country, in my opinion, became, in a certain degree, a party to those decisions which had been found so much fault with. The Slave Trade Papers, presented in 1871, contained one of the very despatches of Lord Clarendon to which so much allusion has been made, and in which the passage occurs that commanders are not justified where slavery is legal in receiving fugitive slaves on board their vessels, or in carrying them away in opposition to the will of the local authorities. That despatch was laid on the Table of the House, and it would have been open to any hon. Member who rejected that doctrine to have called Lord Clarendon to account for it. I heard something about a humiliating despatch written by Lord Clarendon to the Portuguese Minister, and I find that despatch at length in the Slave Trade Papers. What, then, becomes of the charge that the proceedings of the late Government were secret, while those of the present Government have been open? If the Government insist on making this a Party question, I am not unwilling to accept the issue. I am willing—and I think those on this side of the House are willing—to bear whatever responsibility may justly fall upon us as to those decisions of Lord Clarendon. At the same time, we must recollect, if we are to bear the responsibility of those decisions, you who sit on that side of the House will have to bear the responsibility of your two Slave Circulars, and for the vote you are going to give.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I feel that, from an abstract point of view, few things are more disagreeable, and certainly none are more difficult, than to codify International Law respecting fugitive slaves in territorial waters. It may be said—"Then, if that be your opinion, why have you attempted it?" My answer is, we had no alternative; we were called upon to do it by those to whom we were peculiarly responsible. The Viceroy of India in Council made a direct request to the Government of Her Majesty that we should send him direct instructions upon that very subject. The Viceroy of India in Council forwarded to us a correspondence of the Council with our Resident in the Persian Gulf, making the same request to his Excellency. He forwarded also to us provisional instructions which the Viceroy in Council had found it necessary to draw up for the Government and the regulation of the Resident in the Persian Gulf; and we found that these provisional orders were altogether untenable. Under these circumstances, it was absolutely necessary that the Government should take some steps. They had to consider, for their guidance, first, the position of the question as to the treatment of fugitive slaves in territorial waters. They had to consider the state of the question as it had been treated by their Predecessors in office. I will not go into any old cases or ambiguous instances. I will confine myself in this part of the case to the instances which the noble Lord has just referred to, and which occurred under the control of Lord Clarendon—the cases of the Daphne, the Dryad, and the Nymph. It appears in all these cases that slaves have been received in territorial waters by commanders of Her Majesty's ships, and taken out of the territorial waters. Remonstrances were made by the Powers to whom those territorial waters belonged—Portugal and Madagascar—and in all these cases Lord Clarendon condemned the commanders for what they had done. More than this, Lord Clarendon required the Admiralty to try one of those commanders of Her Majesty's ships—Captain Sullivan—and there was a Court of Inquiry on his conduct, and he was censured. In the case of the Daphne, Lord Clarendon communicated the decision to the Portuguese Government, and afterwards an order was circulated on the Eastern Station embodying the views of Lord Clarendon. Now I have quoted from documents before us, I believe with accuracy, what took place, but I do not blame Lord Clarendon. Lord Clarendon was a most eminent man. He had assisted Lord Palmerston for years in building up a great diplomatic fabric of Treaties, the object of which was to insure the abolition of the slave trade; and the condition on which those Treaties were obtained was that the state of domestic slavery in the countries which granted those Treaties would be respected. Therefore, it is not surprising that Lord Clarendon, who had a great object with Lord Palmerston in view—an object shared by all statesmen in this House, on both sides, and the performance and development of which fell peculiarly to those eminent men—it is not surprising that Lord Clarendon, knowing with what difficulty these abolition Treaties had been obtained, should vigilantly watch over the fulfilment of the conditions by which their ends had been accomplished. And I, therefore, do not blame in any way Lord Clarendon for the course which he pursued, which I believe was perfectly consistent and very advantageous to the great cause in which this country was so deeply interested. But what I do blame is the conduct of those who were the political followers, and some of them the Colleagues, of Lord Clarendon, who can come out now and speak of him in the manner in which he has been spoken of in this debate. Now, the first person who introduced the name of Lord Clarendon in this debate was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who made a very peculiar speech. Considering all that had occurred in the Recess, it was not to be wondered at that he should take an early part in the debate; and it certainly was not very consistent with the position he had occupied in the country during the Recess. He was the first to introduce the name of Lord Clarendon. The right hon. Gentleman felt the great difficulty of pursuing the course he had adopted, and he at once met that difficulty. What was the description of the conduct of Lord Clarendon in these matters? It would appear from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that Lord Clarendon, in some inadvertent moment, without thought, with great recklessness and rashness, suffering, as the right hon. Gentleman, I think, charitably intimated, perhaps from indisposition, had written what he called a note. We hear despatches now called "letters," and now a despatch is not even a "letter," but becomes a "note;" and an inadvertency of this kind by the late Lord Clarendon is the cause of all this confusion, and the sole foundation for this charge against the Liberal Party—namely, that they pursued exactly the same policy as their successors.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Pardon me, for interrupting you, but I made no allusion to any possible indisposition of Lord Clarendon. I believe I spoke of a "letter" instead of a "note," and distinctly stated that I believed he had written a letter—a despatch contrary to what he had written in 1856; for he was so absorbed in the endeavour to put down the slave trade, that he forgot for the time the principle he had formerly advocated with regard to fugitive slaves.

MR. DISRAELI: Well, I do not think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman has materially changed the view I was conveying to the House. The right hon. Gentleman has put it to the House that there was an inadvertent letter by Lord Clarendon expressing opinions of which he could not approve, and similar to those now followed by Her Majesty's Government. Who would have supposed from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that, instead of a single letter, this despatch was part of a serious diplomatic Correspondence—part of a series of important diplomatic incidents? Who would have supposed that not merely that commanders of Her Majesty's ships were subject to Courts of Inquiry; but communications were held with European Courts, apologies even made to European Courts, and letters received from European Courts to say they were satisfied with those apologies. Who would have supposed from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that events of this kind had occurred? And yet we all know, from documents before us, that such are the facts of the case. At this hour and at this time of the debate I will not venture to read any extracts to the House; but they will see in pages 54 and 55 of the proceedings some of the final despatches, and they will perceive that they cover a considerable period of time. Yet Lord Clarendon was mentioned to the House as a person who wrote a letter without communicating it to his Colleagues, and that it was the indiscretion of an individual. But I find, in looking into those Papers, Lord Clarendon writing on the 31st of May, 1870, to the Portuguese Minister—

"I trust that His Most Faithful Majesty's Government will agree with that of Her Majesty that the circumstances of the case are sufficiently met by the disapproval of Captain Sullivan's conduct, which has been made known to that officer; and I beg leave to add that instructions have been recently issued to the Commanders of Her Majesty's cruisers on the East Coast of Africa regarding the reception of negroes on board their ships which will, it is hoped, prevent the recurrence of the proceedings of which your Government have complained."

I doubt not he was justified in writing that, and he received from the Portuguese Minister in London a letter saying—

"In compliance with your Excellency's request I shall not fail to make known to my Government the contents of your Excellency's letter, and I have no doubt they will be considered as a new proof of the friendly feelings towards Portugal of Her Britannic Majesty's Government."

That is the Correspondence referred to by the right hon. Member for Bradford as a casual letter written without the knowledge of his Colleagues. Unfortunately, the country lost the services of

Lord Clarendon; and, though I was not a follower of that noble Lord, every Gentleman who knew that distinguished man felt that he was a great ornament to the public life of England. But what follows? An order was prepared in 1871 for the East Indies Station—[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No.] No! I have it here—embodying this instruction—

"Art. 147.—Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships-of-war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles of the shore, should be returned to the owners."

[An hon. MEMBER: Read on.] I am reading on, and I do not know why the hon. Gentleman should object. I must vindicate the Friend whom you have deserted, and the ornament of your Party whom you have left in the lurch. I must call your attention particularly to this East Indies Station Order of 1871, because it embodies in it all the instructions and sentiments of Lord Clarendon in his despatches on this subject. But Lord Clarendon, according to the right hon. Member for Bradford, acted without communicating with his Colleagues. Now I think I have proof that one at least of Lord Clarendon's Colleagues—and he no mean Colleague—was aware of what he was doing. The Lord President of the Council became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—that distinguished nobleman who, we are now told, is the Leader of the Liberal Party—and it is he who sends these instructions to the East Indies Station. It is Lord Granville who sends this Article 147, announcing that

"Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships-of-war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles from the shore, should be returned to the owners."

Look at this short despatch—I will not venture to call it a letter—

"Earl Granville to Sir C. Murray.—I transmit to you for your information copies of a correspondence, respecting the result of an inquiry into certain proceedings complained of by the Portuguese Government, of Captain Sullivan, of Her Majesty's ship "Daphne," off the coast of Mozambique. The particulars of this case will be found at pages 98 to 101 of Class B of the Slave Trade Papers laid before Parliament last Session. I am, &c., GRANVILLE."

Mr. Disraeli

[An hon. MEMBER: That has nothing to do with it.] It is the whole business. It shows that Lord Granville sent the whole of the correspondence on the subject of Captain Sullivan, of the Daphne, to our Minister at Lisbon, without a single syllable of disapprobation. He sent it freely, with his sanction and approval. Well, I think I have at last vindicated Lord Clarendon, who, we have been told, never communicated with his Colleagues. But the note was taken up by another distinguished Member of the late Government—the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). He followed the cry; the right hon. Member for Bradford gave the note, that Lord Clarendon acted without any communication with his Colleagues. The note is caught up by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, who states that Lord Clarendon's despatches were kept secret from the House of Commons, who were free from the knowledge of any wickedness of that kind. But the noble Lord who has just addressed the House has fully vindicated the character of Lord Clarendon in this matter, because he has referred to the Papers, which I myself was prepared to quote if necessary, relating to the slave question, which were laid upon the Table of this House in 1871, in which those despatches may be found. What, therefore, becomes of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman and of the hon. and learned Member—first of all, that Lord Clarendon acted without communicating with his Colleagues; and, secondly, according to the hon. and learned Member, that he so acted without the House of Commons having the slightest inkling of what he was doing. And yet these are the two Gentlemen who have formed the opinion of the country during the Recess. These are the two Gentlemen who have been parading England and inveighing against the retrograde policy of the horrible Tory Party—the horrible Tory party—who certainly have not yet written any despatches to the effect that they have decided that slaves coming on board our ships when within the territorial jurisdiction of a slaveholding country shall be returned to their owners. [MR. WHITWORTH: The first Circular does so.] The remark of the hon. Member reminds me of the question of the noble Lord—and I always like to answer his questions—whether,

when the first Circular was drawn up, I was aware of the Act of 1873? I may say that I had nothing to do with the drawing up of the first Circular. I am, of course, officially responsible for it, and if it had not been withdrawn and a Motion had been made in this House in reference to it, I should have been ready to take the consequences of my misfortune—I will not say my fault. But the truth is that I never heard of the first Circular until it was denounced with the glowing eloquence of the right hon. Member for Bradford, and his companion in rhetoric, the hon. and learned Member for Taunton. I think I have shown, without troubling the House too much on this head, that the opinions expressed in the first and second Circulars are not novelties, and that they are mere continuations of the policy which was carried out by the Government of this country, and that they originated in no mean ideas or motives. It is all very well for us, especially under the present circumstances, to feel convenient indignation, and while painting almost with the brush that portrayed the horrors of slavery in the time of Pitt, to forget all that has occurred in the interval. It is very well to criticize Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon, or those who are sitting on this side of the House, but we must remember that the abolition of the slave trade was not carried merely by tumultuous acclamations. It was the work of immense labour. During the active life of Lord Palmerston, who was always at work, and who was more capable, perhaps, of work than any English Minister of our time, if there was any one subject to which he devoted his energy it was to the abolition of slavery. At that he worked for years when, so far as the public were concerned, the question was dead and uninteresting; but there was no subject that more entirely engrossed the attention of that remarkable man. The result of this was that there was a series of Treaties; but there was not a Treaty obtained that was not the result of negotiations by statesmen; and to induce the Powers, some of them great, some of them petty chieftains, to enter into these Treaties, various considerations were held out, but in all there was this general condition—that their territorial waters should be respected, and that the institution of domestic slavery should single letter, this despatch was part of a serious diplomatic Correspondence—part of a series of important diplomatic incidents? Who would have supposed that not merely that commanders of Her Majesty's ships were subject to Courts of Inquiry; but communications were held with European Courts, apologies even made to European Courts, and letters received from European Courts to say they were satisfied with those apologies. Who would have supposed from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that events of this kind had occurred? And yet we all know, from documents before us, that such are the facts of the case. At this hour and at this time of the debate I will not venture to read any extracts to the House; but they will see in pages 54 and 55 of the proceedings some of the final despatches, and they will perceive that they cover a considerable period of time. Yet Lord Clarendon was mentioned to the House as a person who wrote a letter without communicating it to his Colleagues, and that it was the indiscretion of an individual. But I find, in looking into those Papers, Lord Clarendon writing on the 31st of May, 1870, to the Portuguese Minister—

"I trust that His Most Faithful Majesty's Government will agree with that of Her Majesty that the circumstances of the case are sufficiently met by the disapproval of Captain Sullivan's conduct, which has been made known to that officer; and I beg leave to add that instructions have been recently issued to the Commanders of Her Majesty's cruisers on the East Coast of Africa regarding the reception of negroes on board their ships which will, it is hoped, prevent the recurrence of the proceedings of which your Government have complained."

I doubt not he was justified in writing that, and he received from the Portuguese Minister in London a letter saying—

"In compliance with your Excellency's request I shall not fail to make known to my Government the contents of your Excellency's letter, and I have no doubt they will be considered as a new proof of the friendly feelings towards Portugal of Her Britannic Majesty's Government."

That is the Correspondence referred to by the right hon. Member for Bradford as a casual letter written without the knowledge of his Colleagues. Unfortunately, the country lost the services of

Mr. Disraeli

Lord Clarendon; and, though I was not a follower of that noble Lord, every Gentleman who knew that distinguished man felt that he was a great ornament to the public life of England. But what follows? An order was prepared in 1871 for the East Indies Station—[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No.] No! I have it here—embodying this instruction—

"Art. 147.—Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships-of-war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles of the shore, should be returned to the owners."

[An hon. MEMBER: Read on.] I am reading on, and I do not know why the hon. Gentleman should object. I must vindicate the Friend whom you have deserted, and the ornament of your Party whom you have left in the lurch. I must call your attention particularly to this East Indies Station Order of 1871, because it embodies in it all the instructions and sentiments of Lord Clarendon in his despatches on this subject. But Lord Clarendon, according to the right hon. Member for Bradford, acted without communicating with his Colleagues. Now I think I have proof that one at least of Lord Clarendon's Colleagues—and he no mean Colleague—was aware of what he was doing. The Lord President of the Council became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—that distinguished nobleman who, we are now told, is the Leader of the Liberal Party—and it is he who sends these instructions to the East Indies Station. It is Lord Granville who sends this Article 147, announcing that

"Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships-of-war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles from the shore, should be returned to the owners."

Look at this short despatch—I will not venture to call it a letter—

"Earl Granville to Sir C. Murray.—I transmit to you for your information copies of a correspondence, respecting the result of an inquiry into certain proceedings complained of by the Portuguese Government, of Captain Sullivan, of Her Majesty's ship "Daphne," off the coast of Mozambique. The particulars of this case will be found at pages 98 to 101 of Class B of the Slave Trade Papers laid before Parliament last Session. I am, &c., GRANVILLE."

[An hon. MEMBER: That has nothing to do with it.] It is the whole business. It shows that Lord Granville sent the whole of the correspondence on the subject of Captain Sullivan, of the Daphne, to our Minister at Lisbon, without a single syllable of disapprobation. He sent it freely, with his sanction and approval. Well, I think I have at last vindicated Lord Clarendon, who, we have been told, never communicated with his Colleagues. But the note was taken up by another distinguished Member of the late Government—the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). He followed the cry; the right hon. Member for Bradford gave the note, that Lord Clarendon acted without any communication with his Colleagues. The note is caught up by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, who states that Lord Clarendon's despatches were kept secret from the House of Commons, who were free from the knowledge of any wickedness of that kind. But the noble Lord who has just addressed the House has fully vindicated the character of Lord Clarendon in this matter, because he has referred to the Papers, which I myself was prepared to quote if necessary, relating to the slave question, which were laid upon the Table of this House in 1871, in which those despatches may be found. What, therefore, becomes of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman and of the hon. and learned Member—first of all, that Lord Clarendon acted without communicating with his Colleagues; and, secondly, according to the hon. and learned Member, that he so acted without the House of Commons having the slightest inkling of what he was doing. And yet these are the two Gentlemen who have formed the opinion of the country during the Recess. These are the two Gentlemen who have been parading England and inveighing against the retrograde policy of the horrible Tory Party—the horrible Tory party—who certainly have not yet written any despatches to the effect that they have decided that slaves coming on board our ships when within the territorial jurisdiction of a slaveholding country shall be returned to their owners. [MR. WHITWORTH: The first Circular does so.] The remark of the hon. Member reminds me of the question of the noble Lord—and I always like to answer his questions—whether,

when the first Circular was drawn up, I was aware of the Act of 1873? I may say that I had nothing to do with the drawing up of the first Circular. I am, of course, officially responsible for it, and if it had not been withdrawn and a Motion had been made in this House in reference to it, I should have been ready to take the consequences of my misfortune—I will not say my fault. But the truth is that I never heard of the first Circular until it was denounced with the glowing eloquence of the right hon. Member for Bradford, and his companion in rhetoric, the hon. and learned Member for Taunton. I think I have shown, without troubling the House too much on this head, that the opinions expressed in the first and second Circulars are not novelties, and that they are mere continuations of the policy which was carried out by the Government of this country, and that they originated in no mean ideas or motives. It is all very well for us, especially under the present circumstances, to feel convenient indignation, and while painting almost with the brush that portrayed the horrors of slavery in the time of Pitt, to forget all that has occurred in the interval. It is very well to criticize Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon, or those who are sitting on this side of the House, but we must remember that the abolition of the slave trade was not carried merely by tumultuous acclamations. It was the work of immense labour. During the active life of Lord Palmerston, who was always at work, and who was more capable, perhaps, of work than any English Minister of our time, if there was any one subject to which he devoted his energy it was to the abolition of slavery. At that he worked for years when, so far as the public were concerned, the question was dead and uninteresting; but there was no subject that more entirely engrossed the attention of that remarkable man. The result of this was that there was a series of Treaties; but there was not a Treaty obtained that was not the result of negotiations by statesmen; and to induce the Powers, some of them great, some of them petty chieftains, to enter into these Treaties, various considerations were held out, but in all there was this general condition—that their territorial waters should be respected, and that the institution of domestic slavery should not be interfered with. Therefore, those who would have interfered rashly with the institution of domestic slavery would have prevented Lord Palmerston from availing himself of those very Treaties by which the abolition of slavery was secured. I venture to refer to this matter because, from the statements made on the other side of the House, one would be inclined to think that nothing had ever been done towards the abolition of slavery since the days of Wilberforce, until the right hon. Member for Bradford and the hon. and learned Member for Taunton made their speeches. It may be said—"It is all very well; but what are these but the despatches of Ministers and the regulations of offices? We have a certain object to attain; we do not care for these despatches, or for these regulations and these Circulars. We are resolved to come to a decision that in the territorial waters of a State a slave shall be free if he finds himself, somehow or other, in an English ship. We do not care in the least for any other object, and we will make our law stronger than any other influence." Well, can we do that? Is that the way to set about the business if you want to succeed? I will not remind you—you have been reminded before, if not in this debate on other occasions—that a vote of the House of Commons cannot change the Law of Nations; but it is very well to remember it, because on that saying much depends. But without entering into that subject which, however, interesting, must at this time have acquired more interest from the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), I would remind you of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War reminded you on Tuesday, that there was one thing certainly which a Resolution of the House of Commons cannot do—it cannot alter the laws of this country. You may say what you like about the law of 1873; but not a single observation has been made upon it since it was first noticed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War that touches in the least the point and pith of the inference that he drew from it. What was the answer given to me by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) in reference to this Act? He said it was a Consolidation Act. I do not care whether it is a Consolidation Act or an Act of recent invention. All I know is that under the Act of 1873 you can institute Vice Admiralty Courts and you can restore and surrender slaves. That is the law; and you must get rid of that law before you can effect a change on this subject by a vote of the House of Commons. I understand that a very passionate appeal was made to me in my absence, and I very much regret I did not hear it, by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy). He adjured me to be equal to the situation, and said the effect of this vote would be to make a new law. He acquitted past and present Ministers and all public men of all blame arising from the present state of affairs in connection with slavery, but he said what the House of Commons had to do to-night was to carry a new law. Well, but that is a thing which the House of Commons cannot do, and the hon. and learned Gentleman, before he gives that fervid advice, should remember that we cannot affect International Law and municipal law by a mere vote of the House of Commons. I heard with great pleasure that this was not a Party question, and from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, who I believe is a judge of that subject. I was prepared for that statement by the ingenious and ingenuous speech—for it deserves both epithets—by which this subject was introduced by the hon. Member for Bedford. He said "the House will observe that my Resolution does not merely include the Circulars of the Government; I am entirely impartial. I have gone back and included all the Circulars and instructions. It is equally condemnatory of those on my own side. What I would do would be to appeal to independent Members, first on my own side, to consider that this is not a Party question, and ask them for their votes, and then I would also make an appeal to independent Members on the other side, and ask them for their votes." Thus in a manner that is ingenious and ingenuous, not being a Party question, I think we may be able to put Her Majesty's Ministers in a minority. This is still a young Parliament, and there may be some young birds in it. I am not to be caught exactly in that way. It is rather a sorry sight in the House of Commons to find a great Party ready to cast away with scorn the reputations of the greatest men they have ever produced in our times, merely to catch a vote and to put opponents in a minority. The fame of Lord Palmerston, the reputation of Lord Clarendon—statesmen to whom Gentlemen on the opposite benches owe their position and prestige in the country—these are to be entirely cast away. These distinguished persons are to be treated as mere vile bodies in order that a very petty and hypocritical triumph may be gained. I have sometimes succeeded in divisions; perhaps oftener failed; but I never, when I struck at my foe, pretended that it was not a Party question; and I cannot believe that such dastardly schemes can ever succeed in a House composed of English Gentlemen. ["Oh!"] I do not apply that expression to any one Gentleman in particular. I apply it to schemes which would obtain a Party success by sacrificing the reputation of your distinguished Predecessors. If the word I have used be considered too strong I will recall it. But that, in my mind, is not the way in which the House should come to a decision. We have proposed to you what this debate proves, I think, the country ought to have recourse to. If there is anything proved by this debate more than another by the speeches which have been delivered, by the references which have been made to the opinions of eminent men on both sides—men on that (the Opposition) side who have always been held up as models and examples, and who, we are now told, were entirely in the wrong in their views and in their practice—if anything is demonstrated more than another by this debate it is the wisdom and expediency of submitting this question to the investigation and the judgment of a Royal Commission. That Royal Commission has wide powers. I know not of a Commission that ever had wider. It is not merely to ascertain what are our engagements under Treaty. That might be attained without a Royal Commission. It is not even to ascertain the principles of public law which are involved in these discussions. Although the Report of such a Commission would be received with great authority, such consequences might be realized without it. But they are permitted under the Commission which has been issued to suggest any changes that might bring about a result on some points which it might be desirable and in some respects so satisfactory to secure. They are to inquire whether by negotiation these results may not be obtained. It is impossible to deny that a state of affairs so strange as the relations between free nations and a slave population cannot always depend on exactly the same principles and the same practice. They must change with the changing fortunes and accidents of the world, and there may be modifications and enlargements of principles and practice of which we may avail ourselves without danger; nay, with great advantage. I think that no one who has listened to this debate can for a moment pretend that we can come to any satisfactory conclusion at this moment on the points which have been raised. The hon. Gentleman who brings forward the Motion is struggling at the same time with public law and municipal law, and with no greater weapon, even if he succeeds, than a vote of the House of Commons. He himself must feel the weakness and the unsatisfactory nature of the position in which he has placed himself. I do not think he will succeed. I think the House will rally round us. I believe, notwithstanding all that has been said, that the calm opinion of the country approves the course we recommend; and I think that the vote which the House of Commons will give to night will be one satisfactory to the country and lead, I hope, to a satisfactory conclusion.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I am not disposed to give a silent vote on this question, and I intend to vote with the Government. I think, and I hope sincerely, that Her Majesty's Government will not be disconcerted by the attempt—the Party attempt—which has been made to throw odium on them. I know something—not much, but a little—[laughter]—hon. Members are welcome to their amusement; but I know a little with respect to the coast which is concerned more immediately in this matter of slavery. I have not gone up so far, I may say, as the North of Madagascar or Zanzibar, but I have gone some 2,000 miles along the eastern shore of South Africa; and from my observation I have discovered that on those shores there are about three parties living. There are the Kings of the country, the Chiefs of the country, and the people of the country. I always found that the people of the country were perfectly ready to grant to their superiors a certain degree of servitude, which is called in England slavery, but which is not so at all; in fact—if I may use the expression—I believe there is no such thing on earth as indigenous slavery. I thoroughly believe that if the White man never interfered the Black men would get on for thousands of years most admirably with their masters. [Interruption.] I know my excellent friends the Whigs will try to put me down to-night; but I can assure them they shall not do so. I am aware that I stand here at some disadvantage when I get up to speak after right hon. Gentlemen, and I would have risen before, but I really had not the opportunity. But whether I speak before, or whether I speak after, I will certainly claim my right. I shall speak in favour of Her Majesty's Government, and in favour of the poor slave; and I say most distinctly that until the poor slave was invaded by the White man he had nothing to complain of with respect to his master. Now I wish to ask the House this question with respect to officers commanding Her Majesty's ships on the East Coast of Africa—What are they to do when they are invaded by a number of fugitive slaves? Has any hon. Member got up on this side of the House to tell us what number of slaves are to get on board a frigate? Are they to be one, or are they to be 500? It is an important question; for if one man has a right to go on board, it is incontestably the right of 500 men in a similar position. What is the commander of a frigate—perhaps a small one—to do with those 500 men, who possibly had swum off from the shore to place themselves under the protection of the British flag? What is he to do with them? That is a difficult question to answer, I think; and I do not find that any attempt has been made to answer it on the part of my dear friends the Whigs. Of course, he will treat them to the best description of food, and possibly ply them well with dry champagne. Then, when they have been on board for a few days, he might perhaps be inclined to ask them whether they have any objection to work, and to that question the reply of the first he tried would probably be that given by Mickey Free—

"I never was given to work,

It was not a plan of the Brady's;

But I'd make a most elegant Turk,

For I'm fond of tobacco and ladies."

In addition to that, he will make a further inquiry—"Am I not a man and a brother, and are not you a Whig?" Who are the Gentlemen who bring forward this question with respect to slavery, and are so anxious to put a stop to slavery all over the world? Are they not the men who sat on the same side of the House with Lord John Russell when he forgot to detain by two hours the Alabama when she went out to plunder on the high seas? Did she not do so? For what purpose did she go? Let me ask this great House, did not that ship go out with dozens of others on the same errand? For what purpose did she do it? She did it for the purpose of crippling the power of that nation which determined at the first moment to put down that which these Gentlemen seem to detest—slavery. That is what was done with respect to that and kindred ships; and it was supported by those Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, many of whom I dare say have made large fortunes not only by sending ships such as those to sea, but by sending others. Who are those Gentlemen who—[Interruption—] I demand to be heard. Who are those Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, and who permitted me to go alone into the Lobby for taking the part of the veriest slave in this country—Sir Roger Doughty Tichborne?

Major O'Gorman

MR. SULLIVAN rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is travelling beyond the scope of the discussion. He must address himself to the question before the House.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I will bow to your decision, Sir. I certainly must say, Sir, that those Gentlemen on this side of the House who got up for the purpose of condemning slavery have a very poor case indeed to bring before this House. I regret exceedingly that you have obliged me to depart from that line of argument. With all due deference to you, Sir, I think I should be allowed to make use of it. However, I will only declare that the Government cannot possibly do their duty unless they give the strictest orders to the officers commanding every squadron, particularly on the East Coast of Africa, as to the mode in which they shall treat slaves on board their ships. It is absolutely necessary that that shall be done, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will do it.

MR. SULLIVAN: I will detain the House with but one sentence. I hope the House will allow me to say, on behalf of my country—Ireland—that I trust my Colleagues will not go into the Lobby with my good Friend the last speaker, the last supporter of the Slave Circular.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 293: Majority 45.

AYES.

Acland, Sir T. D.
Adam, rt. hon. W. P.
Allen, W. S.
Amory, Sir J. H.
Anderson, G.
Anstruther, Sir R.
Antrobus, Sir E.
Backhouse, E.
Balfour, Sir G.
Barclay, A. C.
Barclay, J. W.
Bass, A.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.
Bazley, Sir T.
Beaumont, Major F.
Beaumont, W. B.
Bell, I. L.
Biddulph, M.
Biggar, J. G.
Blake, T.
Bolckow, H. W. F.
Brady, J.
Brassey, H. A.
Brassey, T.
Briggs, W. E.
Bright, J.
Bright, rt. hon. J.
Bristowe, S. B.
Brocklehurst, W. C.
Brogden, A.
Brooks, M.
Browne, G. E.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord E.
Burt, T.
Butt, I.
Callan, P.
Cameron, C.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.
Carington, hn. Col. W.
Carter, R. M.
Cartwright, W. C.
Cave, T.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Cavendish, Lord G.
Chadwick, D.
Chambers, Sir T.
Cholmeley, Sir H.
Clarke, J. C.
Clifford, C. C.
Clive, G.
Cole, H. T.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Collins, E.
Colman, J. J.
Corbett, J.
Cotes, C. C.
Cowan, J.
Cowen, J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.
Crawford, J. S.
Cross, J. K.
Crossley, J.
Davies, D.
Davies, R.
Dickson, T. A.
Dilke, Sir C. W.
Dixon, G.
Dodds, J.
Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Downing, M<sup>C</sup>.
Duff, M. E. G.
Duff, R. W.
Dunbar, J.
Dundas, J. C.
Earp, T.
Edwards, H.
Egerton, Adm. hon. F.
Ellice, E.
Errington, G.
Eamonde, Sir J.
Evans, T. W.
Fawcett, H.
Fay, C. J.
Ferguson, R.
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Fitzwilliam, hon. C. W. W.
Fletcher, I.
Foljambe, F. J. S.
Forster, Sir C.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Forsyth, W.
Foster, W. H.
French, hon. C.
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
Gladstone, W. H.
Goldsmid, Sir F.
Goldsmid, J.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gourley, E. T.
Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Grieve, J. J.
Hankey, T.
Harcourt, Sir W. V.
Harrison, C.
Harrison, J. F.
Hartington, Marq. of Havelock, Sir H.
Hayter, A. D.

Henry, M.
Herbert, H. A.
Herschell, F.
Hodgson, K. D.
Holland, S.
Holms, J.
Holms, W.
Hopwood, C. H.
Howard, hn. C. W. G.
Ingram, W. J.
Jackson, Sir H. M.
James, Sir H.
James, W. H.
Jenkins, D. J.
Johnstone, Sir H.
Kenealy, Dr.
Kensington, Lord
Kingscote, Colonel
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Knatchbull-Hugessen, rt. hon. E.
Laing, S.
Lambert, N. G.
Laverton, A.
Law, rt. hon. H.
Lawrence, Sir J. C.
Lawson, Sir W.
Leatham, E. A.
Leeman, G.
Lefevre, G. J. S.
Leith, J. F.
Lloyd, M.
Locke, J.
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Lubbock, Sir J.
Lusk, Sir A.
Macdonald, A.
Macduff, Viscount
Mackintosh, C. F.
M<sup>c</sup>Arthur, A.
M<sup>c</sup>Arthur, W.
M<sup>c</sup>Kenna, Sir J. N.
M<sup>c</sup>Lagan, P.
M<sup>c</sup>Laren, D.
Maitland, J.
Marjoribanks, Sir D. C.
Marling, S. S.
Martin, P. W.
Martin, P.
Massey, rt. hon. W. N.
Matheson, A.
Meldon, C. H.
Middleton, Sir A. E.
Milbank, F. A.
Monk, C. J.
Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.
Moore, A.
Morgan, G. O.
Mundella, A. J.
Muntz, P. H.
Murphy, N. D.
Nevill, C. W.
Noel, E.
Nolan, Captain
Norwood, C. M.
O'Brien, Sir P.
O'Byrne, W. R.
O'Callaghan, hon. W.
O'Clery, K.
O'Connor, D. M.
O'Connor Don, The O'Donoghue, The O'Keeffe, J.
O'Reilly, M. W.
O'Sullivan, W. H.
Palmer, C. M.
Parnell, C. S.
Pease, J. N.
Peel, A. W.
Pender, J.
Pennington, F.
Perkins, Sir F.
Phillips, R. N.
Playfair, rt. hon. L.
Potter, T. B.
Price, W. E.
Ralli, P.
Ramsay, J.
Rashleigh, Sir C.
Rathbone, W.
Redmond, W. A.
Reed, E. J.
Richard, H.
Robertson, H.
Roebuck, J. A.
Russell, Lord A.
Rylands, P.
St. Aubyn, Sir J.
Samuda, J. D<sup>a</sup>.
Samuelson, B.
Seely, C.
Shaw, W.
Sheil, E.
Sheridan, H. B.
Sherlock, Mr. Serjeant
Sheriff, A. C.
Simon, Mr. Serjeant
Smith, E.
Smyth, R.
Stacpoole, W.
Stafford, Marquess of Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
Stanton, A. J.
Stevenson, J. C.
Stuart, Colonel
Sullivan, A. M.
Swanston, A.
Tavistock, Marquess of Taylor, D.
Taylor, P. A.
Temple, rt. hon. W. Cowper-Torrens, W. T. M<sup>c</sup>.
Tracy, hon. C. R. D. Hanbury-
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Vivian, H. H.
Waddy, S. D.
Walter, J.
Ward, M. F.
Waterlow, Sir S. H.
Watkin, Sir E. W.
Weguelin, T. M.
Whalley, G. H.
Whitwell, J.
Whitworth, B.
Whitworth, W.
Williams, W.
Wilson, C.
Wilson, Sir M.
Yeaman, J.
Young, A. W.
TELLERS.
Ashley, hon. A. E.
Whitbread, S.

NOES.

Adderley, rt. hn. Sir C.	Dalrymple, C.	Holmesdale, Viscount	Pemberton, E. L.
Agnew, R. V.	Davenport, W. B.	Holt, J. M.	Pennant, hon. G.
Alexander, Colonel	Deakin, J. H.	Home, Captain	Peploe, Major
Allen, Major	Denison, C. B.	Hood, hon. Captain A.	Percy, Earl
Allsopp, C.	Denison, W. E.	W. A. N.	Phipps, P.
Allsopp, H.	Dickson, Major A. G.	Hope, A. J. B. B.	Plunket, hon. D. R.
Anstruther, Sir W.	Digby, E. H. T.	Hubbard, E.	Plunkett, hon. R.
Asheton, R.	Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Hubbard, rt. hon. J.	Polhill-Turner, Capt.
Astley, Sir J. D.	Douglas, Sir G.	Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.	Powell, W.
Bagge, Sir W.	Dyott, Colonel R.	Isaac, S.	Præd, C. T.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Eaton, H. W.	Jervia, Colonel	Præd, H. B.
Baring, T. C.	Edmonstone, Admiral	Johnson, J. G.	Price, Captain
Barne, F. St. J. N.	Sir W.	Johnston, W.	Puleston, J. H.
Barrington, Viscount	Egerton, hon. A. F.	Johnstone, H.	Raikes, H. C.
Barttelot, Sir W. B.	Egerton, Sir P. G.	Jolliffe, hon. S.	Read, C. S.
Bates, E.	Egerton, hon. W.	Jones, J.	Rendlesham, Lord
Bateson, Sir T.	Elliot, G. W.	Kavanagh, A. MacM.	Repton, G. W.
Beathurst, A. A.	Elphinstone, Sir J. D. H.	Kennard, Colonel	Ridley, M. W.
Beach, rt. hn. Sir M. H.	Emlyn, Viscount	Kennaway, Sir J. H.	Ripley, H. W.
Beach, W. W. B.	Estcourt, G. B.	Knightley, Sir R.	Ritchie, C. T.
Benett-Stanford, V. F.	Ewing, A. O.	Knowles, T.	Rodwell, B. B. H.
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.	Fellowes, E.	Lacon, Sir E. H. K.	Round, J.
Bentinck, G. W. P.	Fielden, J.	Lawrence, Sir J. T.	Russell, Sir C.
Beresford, G. de la Poer	Finch, G. H.	Learmonth, A.	Ryder, G. R.
Beresford, Colonel M.	Floyer, J.	Lee, Major V.	Sackville, S. G. S.
Birley, H.	Folkestone, Viscount	Legard, Sir C.	Salt, T.
Blackburne, J. I.	Forester, C. T. W.	Leigh, W. J.	Sanderson, T. K.
Boord, T. W.	Fraser, Sir W. A.	Leigh, Lt.-Col. E.	Sandon, Viscount
Bourke, hon. R.	Freeshfield, C. K.	Leighton, S.	Sclater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
Bourne, Colonel	Gardner, R. Richard-	Lennox, Lord H. G.	Scott, Lord H.
Bousfield, Major	son-	Leslie, Sir J.	Scott, M. D.
Bowyer, Sir G.	Garnier, J. C.	Lindsay, Col. R. L.	Scourfield, Sir J. H.
Bright, R.	Gibson, E.	Lloyd, S.	Selwin-Ibbetson, Sir
Brise, Colonel R.	Gilpin, Sir R. T.	Lloyd, T. E.	H. J.
Broadley, W. H. H.	Goddard, A. L.	Lopes, H. C.	Shirley, S. E.
Bruce, hon. T.	Goldney, G.	Lopes, Sir M.	Shute, General
Buckley, Sir E.	Gordon, Sir A. H.	Lowther, hon. W.	Sidebottom, T. H.
Bulwer, J. R.	Gordon, rt. hon. E. S.	Lowther, J.	Simonds, W. B.
Burrell, Sir P.	Gordon, W.	Macartney, J. W. E.	Smith, A.
Buxton, Sir R. J.	Gore, W. R. O.	Mac Iver, D.	Smith, F. C.
Cameron, D.	Gorst, J. E.	Majendie, L. A.	Smith, S. G.
Campbell, C.	Grantham, W.	Makins, Colonel	Smith, W. H.
Cawley, C. E.	Greenall, Sir G.	Malcolm, J. W.	Smollett, P. B.
Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.	Greene, E.	Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.	Somerset, Lord H. B. C.
Chaine, J.	Gregory, G. B.	March, Earl of	Spinks, Mr. Serjeant
Chaplin, Colonel E.	Hall, A. W.	Marten, A. G.	Stanhope, hon. E.
Chaplin, H.	Halsey, T. F.	Merewether, C. G.	Stanhope, W. T. W. S.
Chapman, J.	Hamilton, Lord C. J.	Mills, A.	Stanley, hon. F.
Charley, W. T.	Hamilton, I. T.	Mills, Sir C. H.	Starkey, L. R.
Christie, W. L.	Hamilton, Lord G.	Monckton, F.	Starkie, J. P. C.
Churchill, Lord R.	Hamilton, Marquess of	Montgomerie, R.	Steele, L.
Clifton, T. H.	Hamilton, hon. R. B.	Montgomery, Sir G. G.	Stewart, M. J.
Clive, hon. Col. G. W.	Hammond, C. F.	Moore, S.	Storer, G.
Close, M. C.	Hanbury, R. W.	Morgan, hon. F.	Sykes, C.
Clowes, S. W.	Hardcastle, E.	Morris, G.	Talbot, J. G.
Cobbett, J. M.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.	Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.	Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
Cobbold, T. C.	Hardy, J. S.	Mulholland, J.	Tennant, R.
Cole, Col. hon. H. A.	Harvey, Sir R. B.	Naghten, Lt.-Col.	Thornhill, T.
Conolly, T.	Hay, rt. hon. Sir J. C. D.	Neville-Grenville, R.	Thwaites, D.
Coope, O. E.	Heath, R.	Newport, Viscount	Thynne, Lord H. F.
Corbett, Colonel	Hermon, E.	Noel, rt. hon. G. J.	Tollemache, hon. W. F.
Cordes, T.	Hervey, Lord F.	North, Colonel	Torr, J.
Corry, hon. H. W. L.	Heygate, W. U.	Northcote, rt. hon. Sir	Tremayne, J.
Corry, J. P.	Hick, J.	S. H.	Turnor, E.
Cotton, rt. hn. W. J. R.	Hildyard, T. B. T.	O'Gorman, P.	Twells, P.
Crichton, Viscount	Hinchingsbrook, Visct.	O'Leary, W.	Verner, E. W.
Cross, rt. hon. R. A.	Hogg, Sir J. M.	Onslow, D.	Wait, W. K.
Cubitt, G.	Holford, J. P. G.	Paget, R. H.	Walker, T. E.
Cunninghame, Sir W.	Holker, Sir J.	Palk, Sir L.	Wallace, Sir R.
Dalkeith, Earl of	Holland, Sir H. T.	Parker, Lt.-Col. W.	Walpole, hon. F.
		Pateshall, E.	Walpole, rt. hon. S.
		Peel, rt. hon. Sir R.	Walsh, hon. A.
		Pell, A.	Watney, J.

Wallealey, Captain	Wyndham, hon. P.
Wethered, T.	Yarmouth, Earl of
Wheelhouse, W. S. J.	Yorke, hon. E.
Whitelaw, A.	Yorke, J. R.
Williams, Sir F. M.
Wilmot, Sir H.	TELLERS.
Wolff, Sir H. D.	Dyke, Sir W. H.
Woodd, B. T.	Winn, R.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships,'—(Mr. Hanbury,)—be added,—instead thereof."

MR. FAWCETT moved as an Amendment, to insert after the word "desirable," the words

"Provided that the Circular of the 5th day of December 1857 and the East Indies Station Order of 1871, on the subject of Fugitive Slaves, shall not continue in force."

The hon. Gentleman said, the proposition embodied in this Amendment was a most important one, upon which the country was exceedingly anxious there should be a distinct and authoritative expression of opinion, raising as it did a perfectly legitimate question upon which the electors were anxious to have the most authentic information. As regarded the views and opinions of their constituents, Government, having proclaimed that at the time of the issue of the second Circular they were not fully acquainted with the law of the subject, were bound in common sense to accept this Resolution.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To insert, after the word "desirable," the words "provided that the Circular of the 5th day of December 1875 and the East Indies Station Order of 1871, on the subject of Fugitive Slaves, shall not continue in force."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. DISRAELI said, that this was a fragmentary part of the question, and it was impossible that the Amendment could be agreed to, as it would not be known in what state the law would be left, except that so far as he could judge the orders of the Indian Government in the Persian Gulf would still be in force. He had that objection without reference to other subjects; and after what had taken place it was asking the House of Commons too much to cancel its recent determination. He therefore trusted that the House would at once agree to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury).

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 245; Noes 290: Majority 45.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to raise any sum of money, not exceeding Four Million and Eighty Thousand Pounds, by issue of Exchequer Bonds, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding Three Pounds Ten Shillings per cent. per annum, and to be paid off from time to time at par."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

1. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to raise any sum of money, not exceeding Four Million and Eighty Thousand Pounds, by issue of Exchequer Bonds, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding Three Pounds Ten Shillings per cent. per annum, and to be paid off from time to time at par.

2. Resolved, That, towards meeting the principal and interest of such Exchequer Bonds, during the currency thereof, an annual sum not exceeding Two Hundred Thousand Pounds, be charged upon and issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or the growing produce thereof.

3. Resolved, That the interest of such Exchequer Bonds shall be payable half-yearly out of the said sum of Two Hundred Thousand Pounds, and that the residue of the said sum shall be appropriated to the payment of the principal of the said Bonds.

4. Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, the sum of Four Million and Eighty Thousand Pounds be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Sixth Schedule of 'The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1875.'"—(Mr. Salt.)

And, on February 26, Committee nominated as follows:—Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH, Lord HENRY THYNNE, Mr. BEACH, Mr. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT, Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, Mr. WILBRAHAM EGBERTON, Sir HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, Mr. CLARE READ, Mr. SPENCER STANHOPE, Mr. GEORGE CLIVE, and Mr. SALT:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to inquire and report to the House under what conditions, with reference to the rate of interest, expenses of management, maintenance of road, payment of debt, and term of years, or other special arrangements, the Acts of the Trusts mentioned should be continued.—(Mr. Salt.)

COLONIAL MARRIAGES BILL.

On Motion of Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS, Bill to remove doubts with reference to certain Colonial Marriages, ordered to be brought in by Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS, Dr. CAMERON, and Mr. YOUNG.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 87.]

House adjourned at a quarter
before Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 25th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
United Parishes (Scotland) * (18).
Second Reading—Appellate Jurisdiction * (5).

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.

THE DEBATE IN THE COMMONS.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships' forbearance on a personal question. It would not have been necessary, if as I am informed, my Colleagues had not been constrained to remain silent last night by the Parliamentary custom of allowing the Prime Minister to have the last word—a custom which is convenient to the House, and certainly is not without advantage to the Government, but which imposes a greater responsibility as to the statement of facts upon which the immediate division is to be taken. It has happened on two occasions on the debate on the Address—one last year and one this—that I appealed to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India and the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies, as to whether they did not disclaim the particular grounds on which their administration had been praised by the Prime Minister. Out of mere consistency I must therefore refuse any compliment such as that which has been paid to me in the other House by the Prime Minister, and which was grounded, as it appears to me, on a misapprehension of facts. I have read a report of the Prime Minister's speech in the debate which closed this morning. I do not wish to give the slightest cause for a debate on the matter, and I will not refer to that speech further than to say that the greater part of it appears to have consisted in a just and eloquent tribute to Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon in respect of their course in regard to fugitive slaves, and who, it was claimed, had furnished the precedents that justified the policy lately pursued by Her Majesty's Government. I will not go into that question now; though I trust that an opportunity may occur when I hope to show that those precedents are not so apt and so continuous as may be supposed, and that none of them apply exactly to the present case. For the present, I will confine myself to some allusions which the right hon. Gentleman made to me in very courteous terms, and in which he did me the great honour of associating me with Lord Clarendon and claiming me as a supporter of the present policy of the Government. Mr. Disraeli is reported in The Times to have said, and one or two gentlemen have assured me that the report is not inaccurate—

"I must call your attention particularly to this East Indies Station Order of 1871, because it embodies in it all the instructions and sentiments of Lord Clarendon in his despatches on the subject."

It embodied, and at the same time simplified, but that is nothing. Mr. Disraeli proceeded—

“But Lord Clarendon, according to the right hon. Member for Bradford, acted without communicating with his colleagues. Now I think I have proof that one at least of Lord Clarendon's Colleagues”—

I shall spare your Lordships' ears and my own blushes by not reading some expressions complimentary to myself—

“was aware of what he was doing. The Lord President of the Council became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, . . . and it is he who sends these instructions to the East Indies Station. It is Lord Granville who sends this Article 147, announcing that ‘Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships of war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles from the shore, should be returned to their owners.’

Look at this short despatch—I will not venture to call it a letter:—

“Earl Granville to Sir C. Murray.—I transmit to you, for your information, copies of a correspondence, respecting the results of an inquiry into certain proceedings, complained of by the Portuguese Government, of Captain Sullivan, of Her Majesty's ship ‘Daphne,’ off the coast of Mozambique. The particulars of this case will be found at pages 98 to 101 of Class B of the Slave Trade Papers laid before Parliament last Session. I am, &c., GRANVILLE.”

That shows that Lord Granville sent the whole of the correspondence on the subject of Captain Sullivan, of the Daphne, to our Minister at Lisbon without a single syllable of disapprobation. He sent it freely, with his sanction and approval. Well, I think I have at last vindicated Lord Clarendon, who, we have been told, never communicated with his Colleagues. But the note was taken up by another distinguished Member of the late Government—the hon. and learned Member for Taunton. He followed the cry; the right hon. Member for Bradford gave the note that Lord Clarendon acted without any communication with his Colleagues. The note is caught up by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, who states that Lord Clarendon's despatches were kept secret from the House of Commons, who were free from the knowledge of any wickedness of that kind. But the noble Lord who has just addressed the House has fully vindicated the character of Lord Clarendon in this matter, because he has referred to the Papers, which I myself was prepared to quote if necessary, relating to the slave question, which were laid upon the Table of this House in 1871, in which those despatches may be found. What, therefore, becomes of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman and of the hon. and learned Member, first of all that Lord Clarendon acted without communicating with his Colleagues, and secondly, according to the hon. and learned Member, that he so acted without the House of Commons having the slightest inkling of what he was doing? And yet these are the two Gentlemen who have formed the opinion of the country during the Recess. These are the two Gentlemen who have been parading England and inveighing against the retrograde policy of the horrible Tory Party—the horrible Tory Party—who certainly have not yet written any despatches to the effect that they have decided that slaves coming on board our ships when within the territorial jurisdiction of a slave-holding country shall be returned to their owners.”

My Lords, I may remind your Lordships that I stated to the House in the debate on the Address that it had never happened to me to hear the subject of the regulations as to slaves coming on board Her Majesty's ships brought before the Cabinet, and that I had never been called upon officially to give an opinion on the question. Your Lordships will remark from the extracts which I have just read that the grounds on which I was complementarily associated with Lord Clarendon were—first, that I was aware of what Lord Clarendon was doing; secondly, that I sent Lord Clarendon's correspondence to Sir Charles Murray freely with my sanction and approbation; and, thirdly, that it is I who sent instructions to the East Indies Station, I who sent the Article 147, the contents of which you have heard read. With regard to the first ground of compliment, I have to state that privately I never knew at the time that any such correspondence was going on. It was not likely I should, and for this you must take my word. But I have the authority of all my Colleagues for asserting that it never was brought before the Cabinet. As to the second, it is true that I signed the routine despatch formally transmitting the correspondence of my Predecessor on a closed case to our Minister at Lisbon for his information. The noble Earl opposite will, I think, bear me out in saying that hundreds of such routine despatches are sent from the Foreign Office every year, which the Secretary of State issues without making himself fully and intimately acquainted with their contents. I can, however, discover no trace of sanction and approbation unless it is meant to show that my disapproval of a past correspondence—which I believe I never read—on a subject which was closed I was to keep our Minister ignorant of what had passed between Lord Clarendon and the Portuguese Minister.

As to the third ground of compliment, with respect to my having sent the Instructions to the East Indies, and to my having sent the now well-known Article 147, I can only say that the Instructions were sent by my Predecessor; that I never sent any Instructions at all; and that the Order issued by the Admiral on the station never came back to the Foreign Office during my time; and I never heard of it till some three months ago, when a gentleman whom I do not know sent it to me as an extract from an Indian paper. My Lords, I think I have stated enough to show that there is not the slightest ground for compliments intentional or unintentional, nor any ground for praise or blame, in connection with my part in this matter. As to Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon, I never knew two persons more anxious for the total abolition of slavery. It is one of my proudest reflections that I was introduced to public life by Lord Palmerston, and that my relations with him closed only with his death, and that I was politically and personally associated with Lord Clarendon, one of the ablest, most popular, and successful Foreign Ministers who have ever filled office in this country.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of raising any controversy on the large subject of the regulations regarding slaves coming on board Her Majesty's ships. I think it was reasonable in my noble Friend (Earl Granville) to wish to make a personal explanation. If he had confined himself to that—if he considered that any statement was made, here or elsewhere, which affected him, and which did not accord with his own recollection of transactions in which he had been himself engaged—nothing could have been more natural than that he should take the earliest opportunity of correcting what he regarded as a misapprehension, and of placing the matter in what appeared to him to be the proper light. But I think that no one, either here or in the other House of Parliament, would have considered what was said in the other House of Parliament last night as any reflection on the noble Earl. What I understand the noble Earl to state is, that the Circular which has been referred to in "another place" never was discussed in the Cabinet of which the noble Earl was a Member, and never came under his personal notice. The noble Earl goes on to deny having any knowledge of Lord Clarendon's Correspondence; on that point I, of course, accept his statement; but I do not understand that the noble Earl denies that he transmitted in October, 1870, to Sir Charles Murray, an official Correspondence containing that expression of opinion, in consequence of which the instructions which have been referred to were issued. I think, therefore, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) was justified in saying that the noble Earl had at least official knowledge of the Correspondence in question: since he forwarded it for the information of our Minister at Lisbon. The noble Earl says that he sent that Correspondence in his despatch of October, 1870, without having personally acquainted himself with its contents. That is an explanation I can well understand; but still I think, in the face of that despatch, my right hon. Friend was perfectly justified in assuming that the noble Earl had knowledge of the contents of the Correspondence. If the noble Earl says—"Officially I had something to do with it, because I had to forward it, though I did so without approval or comment; but personally I was not acquainted with it, because I did not look at or read the Papers," that is an explanation we accept, and the accuracy of which we do not doubt; but it is an explanation founded on a circumstance which could have been only within the knowledge of the noble Earl himself, and with which my right hon. Friend could not possibly have been acquainted.

EARL GRANVILLE: I thank the noble Earl; but he has not said a word as to the assertion of my having sent the instructions to the station on which the Station Order was founded.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I fully admit that the Station Order was issued by the Admiral on the station, and not by the Admiralty; and that it was founded on instructions issued in the time of Lord Clarendon, and before the noble Earl was connected with the Foreign Office. In that matter of detail my right hon. Friend may have been misled; but his general argument was correct—because whether or not the noble Earl was cognizant of the instructions, yet they had been issued by the Admiralty; and had my right hon. Friend substituted for the name of the noble Earl the name of the First Lord of the Admiralty, he would have been correct in detail as well as in principle. The argument of the noble Earl is that the act was Lord Clarendon's alone, and not that of the Cabinet. We contend that it is one for which the Cabinet of which the noble Earl was a Member must be held responsible, inasmuch as two Members at least of that Cabinet personally concurred in it.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

[NO. 5.] SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."

—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD SELBORNE said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of the Bill. He did not doubt that under the circumstances in which his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor was placed he had done the best he could. His (Lord Selborne's) own estimate of the scheme, compared with the schemes proposed in former years, was that it did not come up to the best thing possible; but it was due to his noble and learned Friend to say, that if he (Lord Selborne) had been compelled to frame a measure under the conditions imposed upon his noble and learned Friend, he did not think he could suggest anything better, as far as it went, than the scheme now before the House. He took it that his noble and learned Friend had before him certain postulates from which he could not relieve himself. His noble and learned Friend, when introducing the measure, quoted a passage from a speech of the late Lord Derby in which he was sure all their Lordships would concur. It was to the effect that in the consideration of every question relating to the Tribunal of Final Appeal, the due administration of justice ought to have the first place. Criticizing the scheme now before their Lordships, and comparing it with those which were proposed in 1873 and subsequently, upon grounds entirely independent of its connection with their Lordships' House, he found that it established two distinct Courts of Appeal absolutely and completely separate from each other. There was the first or Intermediate Court of Appeal, and the second or Final Court of Appeal. Counting the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, there would be three different Courts of Appeal. The Intermediate Court was, for the present and for a period which might be considerable, to be constituted as provided by the Act of last year: with regard to the two Final Courts, they were to retain their present names and form, but were subjected to various changes and modifications. Between the present scheme and those embodied in the Act of 1873, and in the Bill of 1874, there was a difference of the greatest possible importance. The opinion on which he had acted when framing the Act of 1873, was that the best Court of Appeal was that which would concentrate and bring to one focus all the highest judicial elements available, so as to obtain the greatest possible economy, both of time and of power, and also the greatest possible weight of authority for all the decisions of the Court. He thought in 1873, and he still thought, that, whether there were to be two appeals or only one, the Court should be one, every Member of which should be available for all the appellate business, whether the decision on it was to be intermediate or final, and which should have the power not only of deciding appeals brought before it, but of reviewing and reconsidering any judgment of its own which might appear proper to be so dealt with. Such a Court of Appeal seemed to him a better constituted one than one which divided the judicial elements, and rendered one portion of them unavailable for the most numerous, and not the least important class of appeals. His (Lord Selborne's) Bill of 1873 provided that there should be one Appeal Court of undivided authority; but power was given to the Judges to have the first decision of that Court reviewed if they thought it expedient. His noble and learned Friend in his Bill of 1874, instead of constituting one undivided Court, constituted a Court with a First Division to review the decisions given on first appeals by the Second Division: but he did not by that plan destroy the unity and integrity of the Court, because every Judge of the Court of Appeal was still made available, in case of need, for sitting in either Division. By either of those arrangements there would have been an economy of judicial strength in the hearing of appeals, similar to that which his noble and learned Friend had shown to have already produced such satisfactory results in the High Court of Justice established by the Judicature Act. In the Bill now before their Lordships a different plan was adopted. He thought it was to be lamented that this Bill made two Courts of Appeal instead of one, in a way which would prevent any interchange of judicial power. The Court of Appeal of their Lordships' House must always have much less business to do than the First or Intermediate Court of Appeal. The business of the latter must always be very large in quantity, and very important in quality—much larger than that of the Final Court of Appeal, and in his opinion not less important in quality. By dividing the Court of Intermediate Appeal from the Court of Final Appeal, as was done by this Bill, all the Judges who were required for the Court of Final Appeal would be excluded from the First Court. The Lord Chancellor would be practically excluded from the First Court, because he must always preside in the Court of Final Appeal, which would be sitting throughout the legal year. The four Lords of Appeal to be appointed under the Bill, and all ex-Chancellors, would also be excluded from that Court. Under the Act of 1873, all ex-Chancellors who were able and willing would have been effective Members of the Court, by which the whole Appeal business of the country would have been disposed of; because he could not believe that any man who had filled the office of Lord Chancellor, after signifying under his hand to the Crown his willingness to sit as a Judge of Appeal, would have neglected to do so. On the other hand, by this arrangement, the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron, unless they were hereditary Peers, would all be excluded from the Court of Final Appeal. Next, with regard to the authority of the Court. The mere fact of Finality was enough to give authority, even if the constitution of the Court was not the best imaginable: but this authority, under the Act of 1873, would have belonged to all the decisions of the single Court of Appeal. Under the plan of the present Bill, the Intermediate Court, which would necessarily dispose of by far the larger part of the business, must lose considerably in point of authority—certainly until the postponed arrangement of his noble and learned Friend came into operation, which would put an end to the fluctuating attendance of Puisne Judges from the different Divisions of the High Court of Justice. By the Bills of 1873 and 1874 no elements were introduced into the Court of Appeal from the Courts of the First Instance except fixed elements and those of the highest dignity—the Chiefs of the Common Law Courts and the Master of the Rolls. Under the Bill now before the House there would continue to be an undefined number of variable Puisne Judges assisting in the Intermediate Court of Appeal, as there were at present under the Act of last year. This arrangement might be called temporary, in view of his noble and learned Friend's plan of eventually strengthening the Court of Intermediate Appeal from another source; but it was likely to last a considerable period, and, during that period, it might tend in no slight degree to discredit the working of that Court of Appeal. He had the less scruple in speaking plainly on this subject, because down to the present time it was admitted, on all hands, that the Appeal business had been well done, and by some of the ablest and most experienced of our Judges. Somebody must select the Puisne Judges of the Courts of First Instance who from time to time would be required to sit in the Court of Intermediate Appeal: and nobody could possibly say that out of so large a number of Judges all could be strictly equal in judicial skill, experience, and learning, or that all would possess equally, for the purposes of appeal, the public confidence. In the constitution of any Court of Intermediate Appeal it would manifestly be desirable to have Judges of the most proved learning, ability, and experience, and those in whose judgment the public at large would have the greatest confidence. But see how invidious it must be to make a selection among the Puisne Judges on that principle, which was the only right one. Having himself filled the office of Lord Chancellor, he knew that it would be impossible for the Lord Chancellor to proceed merely on his own personal opinion. What was the alternative? For the Courts themselves to select the members of their own Divisions who were to attend in the Court of Appeal. This must ultimately result in a system of rotation, which would send every Puisne Judge in turn to serve in each Court of Appeal: or else the Judges of Division must select among themselves; and this would probably be done with regard to the general convenience of their business, rather than with a view to any man's especial fitness. The noble and learned Lord had said, when introducing this Bill, that eventually under his scheme there would be a reduction of the number of Judges of the First Instance; but he (Lord Selborne) confessed that he did not look forward with confidence to the fulfilment of that expectation. The provision for that purpose, which was expressly made by the Act of 1873, was absolutely repealed by the Act of last year: and he found no provision whatever, for any reduction of the number of Judges, in any event whatever, in this Bill. He regretted that his noble and learned Friend had not seen his way at once to a reduction of the number of Judges of the First Instance, which would have enabled him to take some of the more experienced members of the present High Court of Justice, and place them, subject to the obligation of still going on Circuit, when necessary, in the position of permanent Members of the Intermediate Court of Appeal. He might thus have effected at once and in a most satisfactory way the reduction which he anticipated at some future period. He regretted also that this Bill did not, like the Act of 1873, contain distinct provisions for diminishing the expense of the final appeals. Those expenses were, in his opinion, very extravagant, and any system which did not diminish them was to be condemned on that ground. The printing de novo of volumes of matter which had been already printed in the Courts below was most unjustifiable and most oppressive to suitors. As to the fees paid to counsel, he was aware that their Lordships could not undertake to prescribe to parties what they should voluntarily pay to their own counsel—at all events, as long as the fees of counsel were not recoverable by law. If they had been recoverable by law, he did not see why they should not be taxed; as they were not, the House could not prevent parties from paying what fees they thought fit; but their Lordships might limit the sum beyond which the losing party could not be mulcted at the option of the successful party. He should not be satisfied with the working of any appellate system which left these enormous expenses unreduced. Another point, which would inevitably acquire hereafter a greater degree of importance than it had at present, was that relating to the place where the final appeals were to be heard. In this Bill there was a provision enabling Her Majesty to assemble the Court of Final Appeal during the dissolution of Parliament, and it was provided that when assembled it was to sit in the House of Lords. As they were to sit in that House at such a time, it might be taken that they were not to sit in any other place at any other time. At present the inconvenience of such an arrangement might not be much felt by the Bar; but the time was approaching when there would be a general assemblage of all the Courts in a single building remote from the House of Lords; and he anticipated that when that time came all branches of the legal profession would feel the great inconvenience of attending at Westminster, and there would be a demand for the transfer of the Final Court to a more convenient place. It ought also not to be overlooked that the connection of the Supreme Court of Appeal with their Lordships' House might, in other respects, prove an impediment to arrangements in themselves desirable. The case of Ecclesiastical Appeals was an example in point. In respect of Ecclesiastical Appeals, he did not say that any system would be satisfactory to all persons concerned in such appeals; but the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was open to the objection that it consisted of a large number of Members, of whom those only who were summoned for the hearing of the particular case could take part in the decision of any Ecclesiastical Appeal. If all the Members were summoned, and attended, the tribunal would be one of inconvenient magnitude. Either that must be done or there must be some selection. Of late, all had been summoned; but it must still depend on accidents, varying with each particular case, who might attend. For that, and some other reasons, there was a great deal to be said in favour of the transfer of Ecclesiastical Appeals to their Lordships' House, where the number of Judges was small, and the Judges would be of authority high as would be found anywhere else. Another reason in favour of such a transfer was, that a purely Civil Tribunal was insisted upon, in 1873, in the interest of the Church and the Clergy. He did not himself propose in 1873 to interfere with those Ecclesiastical Appeals: but their Lordships knew that it was then forced on him. A strong argument might, therefore, be made for transferring Ecclesiastical Appeals to the House of Lords, but for a difficulty to which he would briefly refer. It seemed now to be thought best, on the whole, that Bishops should not sit as Judges in Ecclesiastical Appeals; and, accordingly, the present Bill proposed to repeal the clause in the Church Discipline Act, which gave them a place on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in cases arising under that Act, and to substitute a provision, like that in the Act of 1873, for enabling them to be summoned as assessors in such cases, whether members of the Privy Council or not. This struck him as being an insuperable difficulty in the way of removing Ecclesiastical Appeals to their Lordships' House. The Bishops, as Lords of Parliament, had the right of voting in that House, and could not sit as assessors in a Court where their powers, by virtue of their position and rank, were those of Judges: and, in this particular class of cases, it might be difficult for them, if they were legally Judges, to reconcile a voluntary renunciation of the judicial office with their sense of duty, as the lay Peers had done in cases which they had no special aptitude to understand. He had now sufficiently dwelt upon the circumstances which in his view made their Lordships' House not the best Court of Final Appeal; and, as this was the last occasion on which he should think it necessary to address their Lordships upon this subject, it had been his wish, while acquiescing under protest in the present Bill, to place his opinion once more, and finally, on record. On the political part of the question, his words should be few. He supposed that—whether rightly or wrongly he should not express an opinion—political considerations had had much to do with the present Bill. He had admitted that, if the jurisdiction of their Lordships' House were to continue, the proposals contained in the Bill might, on the whole,

Lord Selborne

be the best that could have been devised; but, at the same time, he could not dissemble his belief, that the House would not advance its authority, or power, or dignity as a great constitutional Assembly by the arrangements proposed in the Bill of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. It was proposed that a certain number of lawyers should be constituted Peers by Act of Parliament, during the time in which they continued to act as Judges, and that if they, from any reason, ceased to perform judicial functions under the Bill, they might retain their titles, but should lose the power of sitting or voting as Peers. To these Peers by Act of Parliament, chiefly, from the beginning, and perhaps in the end altogether, the power of administering justice in their Lordships' name, whether their Lordships were in Session as a House of Parliament or not, was to be committed. The illusion of a connection, once real, but now unreal, between this branch of the Legislature and the administration of justice, was sought to be perpetuated by a new Parliamentary Court, presided over by a new species of Peers, the creation, not of the Royal Prerogative, but of the Statute law, which would represent not their Lordships' traditions and immemorial privileges, but this entirely novel legislation of 1876. He would not dwell upon some minor questions, which the Bill, as it stood, did not solve, but which required solution. Were these new Statutory Peers to retain their offices and salaries, if they should be made hereditary Peers? Could they, while holding those offices, be made hereditary Peers, under a Bill which so exactly defined the kind of Peerage which they were to have, and said, that it should not descend to their heirs? What was to be the status of their children, by whom their honours could not be inherited? Why, if there was to be any such new class of official Peers, was the tenure of their Peerages made different from that of the only existing official Peers, the Bishops, who ceased to be Peers altogether, and for every purpose, when they resigned their offices? All these questions might seem unimportant in themselves: but they were not unimportant with respect to the operation of a Bill like this upon the political position of their Lordships' House. Whether such legislation as this would be satia-

factory to those, whose zeal for their Lordships' privileges had now succeeded in setting aside the settlement of 1873, remained to be seen: his own view was, that their Lordships' dignity and political importance could not gain, but might possibly lose, by such legislation. He had himself voted for a similar measure, not without reluctance, but under the pressure of the wish to provide for the due administration of justice with as little disturbance as possible of the associations connected with their Lordships' House, more than 20 years ago, in the House of Commons. Twenty years, however, could not pass by, and leave the state of such a question as this unchanged: it was one thing to attempt in vain to make an imperfect step in advance, and another, to make the same step backwards many years afterwards. Still, as the experiment was now to be tried, he could only say, that he desired, as much as any man, that it should succeed. The Court, which was to be now established under the name of the House of Lords, would not, in his opinion, be the best possible; still, he did not doubt, that it would be a powerful and a good Court: and if it administered justice well, the respect and reverence which the people of England were always ready to show, even under far less favourable conditions, to the administration of justice, would gather round it, and it would be strengthened, from day to day, by the authority and finality of its decisions. He did not yield, even to his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, in the earnestness of his hope—since the plan which he thought better had been overthrown—that the arrangement now proposed might fulfil the expectations, which his noble and learned Friend had formed of it, and give satisfaction, for many years to come, to the House and to the country.

LORD DENMAN said, he was surprised that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) had not proposed Amendments in Committee to this Bill. He had truly said that the Bill in 1856 had led to no results; and he (Lord Denman) wished to prevent the House from repeating its concessions. In his speeches against the Bill he had advised that the creation of Lord Wensleydale should be made hereditary; that Lord Kingsdown, then Mr. Pemberton Leigh, who had twice refused a Peerage, should receive one. Both these steps were adopted. He had also dimly shadowed forth the advice that Sir William Erle should receive a Peerage. It was true that the Lord Chief Justice (Tenterden) would not receive a Peerage till the salary was fixed at £10,000 a-year. It ought never to have been reduced, as all patronage was abolished, and he himself might have now been Chief Registrar of Deeds in Middlesex, if Sir Thomas Denman had not voted, in 1830, for a general registry. He, when Attorney General, in 1832, proposed that the retiring pension of Chancellors should be £6,000 a-year, and it certainly would be an anomaly if two Peers for years who might never have been on the Bench should receive £6,000 a-year for services, whilst a retiring Chancellor, even if sitting daily in the House of Lords, had received only £5,000, and a retiring Lord Chief Justice or Lord Chief Baron would receive even less. He disapproved of the system of only one spokesman delivering judgment in the Privy Council, which, though strong, was like a powerful steam engine—which had only one whistle.* There were already two powerful Courts, and errors of the Privy Council could be corrected by Act of Parliament, and any discrepancy in the law be corrected. There was no danger of any lay Peer being allowed to vote, and he mentioned having been on a Committee of the Whole House, and having tried to vote on a case of Bain against Fothergill, he had read the opinions of the Judges, and also since a correspondence between an eminent counsel, Mr. Rand, in the United States, and the opinions of Lord Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Story were quoted. The Judges in England had been divided in opinion. The case of Bain v. Fothergill almost authorized any person to offer an estate for sale, knowing an insuperable obstacle to the completion of his title. Lord Eldon had said—"But you must look to principles, if cases had not entirely obscured them."—[See Campbell's Lives, v. 7, p. 644.] He (Lord Denman) was convinced that the lay element was of the greatest importance, and referred to Sir J. Stuart's and Lord Romilly's opinions. He mentioned also that the expense of appeals had been mentioned, but that the entire kingdom of Scotland were content to incur that expense rather than change the tribunal.

It had been said by The Times that the new Appeal Court would no longer be the House of Lords. In Ireland a preference was given to it as an Appeal Court. And he mentioned a case in which a poor man had thought himself much aggrieved, his former counsel, Lord Romilly, had said he would support the case if brought by some Peer before the House—he inquired of a gallant officer then aged 85, who was mentioned by the appellant, and found that it was not Sir John (then Colonel Aitchison,) but a Committee of the Guards who had removed the mess from his hotel. And he had also seen the venerable Lord St. Leonards, who assured him that everything had been perfectly regular, and that he had abstained from voting or influencing any Peer to support his judgment as Chancellor of Ireland. Though present, Lord Romilly did not say a word, and Lord Selborne said that he thought the case had been treated with discretion. The appellant had wished that the late Bishop of Llandaff (Dr. Copleston), attending on the appeal, as well as the present Lord Blantyre, had taken part in the proceedings. He (Lord Denman) was glad that he had taken this opportunity in the lifetime of those venerable personages of ascertaining the truth. He hoped that the sons of noble Lords would be brought up to a study of the laws, and be able, if they heard the whole of a case as they ought, to decide between any two Law Lords who were bound openly to give their reasons.

LORD HATHERLEY desired to state his reasons for entering his protest against the mode in which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack proposed to constitute the Court of Final Appeal under the present Bill. He might mention that he and Baron Bramwell were among the first to suggest the fusion—not of Law and Equity, but the fusion of the Courts which administered Law and Equity, and they had heard on the highest authority that the new system had worked satisfactorily. Now, what would be one of the consequences of retransferring to the House of Lords the final Appellate Jurisdiction? It would be this—that they would have two Courts of Final Appeal—this House and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Well, the latter dealt with appeals from all parts of our Colonies, including those where the law was identical with that of England. That being so, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council might come to one conclusion on a point of purely English law, and the House of Lords on identically the same point might come to an opposite conclusion; and this, though it might not be productive of any great evil at the present time, could not be regarded as a satisfactory state of things. The next points with reference to the jurisdiction of their Lordships' House had reference to the difficulty of at all times finding an adequate Quorum for the administration of justice—the difficulty of securing continuous sittings—and that arising from the question of expense. With regard to those several difficulties the first two were dealt with by the Bill, but not, he thought, in such a manner as should make them feel very proud of retaining their jurisdiction in name. The first was met in this way—a new variety of Peer was to be created; and the second by a provision that the Final Court of Appeal should be at liberty to sit during a prorogation and after a dissolution of Parliament. If such a Court was to be called the House of Lords, if that would please everybody, and if they could thereby secure a good tribunal, he confessed he was ready under protest to accept such a substituted jurisdiction of the House of Lords; but what was to be the nature of the Peerages to be created? Two Peers were to be appointed for life; but with this extraordinary distinction—that the moment their judicial career ceased their political career was to cease also. Now, he had heard a great deal of late as to the inexpediency of mixing up the judicial and the political functions; but here the two were to be indissolubly entwined, and the moment the person who exercised them ceased to be fit to be a Judge he ceased also to be fit to be a politician; as soon as his judicial thread was spun he was to collapse into a chrysalis state of Peerage. That seemed to be an extraordinary provision, and he did not think it was calculated to add to the dignity of their Lordships' House. Then, again, it was provided that after a dissolution if Her Majesty should be so advised the Lords of Appeal might be called together to deal only with judicial matters—the House would be precluded from sitting—and yet this was to be called the House of Lords! But supposing that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were in time to be merged in the proposed Final Court of Appeal, this result would happen—that the Court would have to hear and decide upon appeals from the Colonies. But the Colonies might reasonably be dissatisfied at their Lordships' House legislating as to how their appeals should be heard. It would be difficult to transfer the cases coming before the Privy Council to their Lordships' House. The next point was as to the expense attending upon appeals. Much of that which was printed was matter which had been already printed in the Courts below; and why should it be reprinted in order that fresh copies might be given to those who heard the appeal in their Lordships' House? It might be thought that it would not be in accordance with the dignity of their Lordships' House to read the documents which had been printed for the use of an Inferior Court, and that, therefore, it was necessary that all this expense should be incurred over again. A suitor in a case before the Vice Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls instructed counsel; and sometimes it happened that the same counsel a week afterwards, when an appeal was determined upon, had the same identical brief handed to him, with, of course, an additional fee by way of payment. The printed matter, in like manner, when the case came before their Lordships' House, would be the same as in the Inferior Courts, and would be equally available if it were not regarded as so august a tribunal. The sitting of their Lordships in that House on appeals would make a great difference in increasing the cost of appeals. It was necessary at present to take counsel from the Courts in which they might be practising; and the fees to counsel did not altogether depend upon the particular counsel engaged, because if a brief were given to a barrister who was only called yesterday, he received a "refreshing" fee for every day that he attended at their Lordships' Bar. The result was that the cost of an appeal before their Lordships might be taken to be about 50 guineas a day. A great deal of this expense might be avoided if counsel were not taken from the neighbourhood of their own Courts;

but when a member of the Bar was taken from Lincoln's Inn and brought down to Westminster a higher scale of fees was naturally adopted. He confessed he should very much like to see the final appeals brought before one Court, and that Court the Privy Council. It was only an act of justice to the Judicial Committee to state that when the present Court was constituted there were about 380 causes waiting for hearing, and an accumulation of 80 or 90 causes year by year. Since, however, the four salaried Judges were appointed these 380 causes in the nature of arrears had wholly disappeared, and the ordinary Paper of Causes was got through without any of the former delay to suitors. He believed that if the Judicial Committee were made the final appellate tribunal everything that their Lordships desired would be secured. He bowed, however, to the course which their Lordships appeared to be inclined to adopt. He hoped to see one Final Court of Appeal appointed, and he could only regret that it was, in the opinion of the noble and learned Lord, only to be secured by this somewhat attenuated phantom of the House which was to hear and determine the final appeals in their Lordships' House.

LORD MONCREIFF: My Lords, I naturally look upon this matter from a somewhat different point of view to that which has been taken by my two noble and learned Friends. If this question related simply to the establishment of the best tribunal in this country, I should have had great diffidence in expressing my opinion, seeing that there are many noble Lords who have more experience in matters relating to the law here, and especially regarding the fact that there are in this country various elements for the formation of a good Court of Appeal from among the existing tribunals. But such elements for the formation of a Court of Appeal do not exist in Scotland. At the time of the Union it was thought necessary to provide against this difficulty, and in the Act of Union there is a special clause that there should be no right of appeal from Scotch Courts to any English Court. The proper Court of Appeal, therefore, for Scotland is to your Lordships' House. I cannot, my Lords, refrain from saying that the Profession in Scotland have been very well satisfied with the administration of appeals in your Lordships' House; and although many of those who hear these appeals are not versed in the system of Scotch law, yet there is so much attention, so much anxiety, and so much deliberation shown in the investigation of Scotch causes that although there may have been a slight miscarriage of justice now and then, yet, upon the whole, the way in which Scotch appeals have been investigated has given the greatest satisfaction. Perhaps if we had some security that the same care, attention, and deliberation would be given to Scotch appeals in Courts of Law constituted outside this House, it might be that the same satisfaction would be felt; but then I do not see how the difficulty with respect to the clauses of the Act of Union are to be got over. It is the opinion of those in Scotland who are conversant with this matter—I do not say the unanimous, but it is the general opinion—that it is not desirable that we should interpose any objection if the matter only referred to the hearing of English appeals. It was quite competent, of course, for your Lordships to abandon your privileges, and constitute a Court for the hearing of English appeals; but in the present state of matters we very much prefer that your Lordships should have acted as you have done, and have kept in the House the power of hearing appeals from Scotland; and it is unanimously admitted that it would not have been a wise policy to have deprived yourselves of the privileges of hearing English appeals, and have retained that privilege for the purpose of Scotch or Irish appeals alone. On that question opinion in Scotland is, I may say, almost unanimous. It is not for us to suggest how these difficulties should be encountered; but after all the statements which have been made, I must say that I very much prefer the proposition of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to any other which has been suggested in previous Bills. It may be true that so far as the jurisdiction of the House in legal matters is concerned, your Lordships have retained but a shadow or phantom of jurisdiction; but even shadows and phantoms are sometimes not without their force. My Lords, the very atmosphere of your Lordships' House is filled with phantoms and shadows of important constitutional principles long established in this country; and although it may be true that the Appeal Court of the future may be the child of the Legislature, it will nevertheless remain the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords, and will continue faithfully to administer justice in the same manner and with the same satisfaction to the people of Scotland as your Lordships have hitherto administered it.

Lord Moncreiff

LORD O'HAGAN said, they owed thanks to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for the promptitude and decision with which he had addressed himself to this subject. The reduction of the fees of that House, the place in which it ought to sit for judicial purposes, and other points which had been mentioned in the conversation, might very well be discussed in Committee; and he did not propose at this stage to discuss the merits of a measure, which was a graceful concession to the general opinions and desires of the Three Kingdoms whose highest interests it would so materially affect. It was right in principle and sustained the time-honoured jurisdiction which their Lordships somewhat rashly consented to part with; and the changes proposed would give to this House sitting judicially a permanence, efficiency, and continuity of action such as it never before possessed. All previous authority was in favour of the principle of the Bill. The Reports of the Committees of 1856 and 1872 suggested the practical modifications which it aimed to effect; and he believed the measure was worthy of the acceptance of the House and the approval of the country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that to judge from the number of vacant seats and the tenour of the conversation the Bill was likely to pass without serious opposition, and he was pleased to think it should be so. He thanked his Predecessors on the Woolsack who, still retaining their original views as to the best form of a Supreme Appellate Court, were willing to suggest improvements in this measure, and to accept it as a good one, if its principles must be endorsed. Having on a former occasion explained the principles of the Bill, he would notice only one or two objections which might mislead the public. As to ecclesiastical appeals, the Bill simply embodied a clause which, after great consideration, was passed by this House, and he believed accepted by the other House in a former year—a clause which altered the Clergy Discipline Act, and provided that, while Members of the right rev. Bench might be present during the deliberations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as Assessors in ecclesiastical cases, they should no longer form part of the tribunal; and he had done nothing more than take that provision and apply it to the altered circumstances. There was not, as had been suggested, a power to borrow an indefinite number of Primary Judges to form an Intermediate Court of Appeal. The Act of last year gave power to borrow one Judge from each Common Law Division; but practically it had never been exercised, and he hoped it never would be, beyond the extent of borrowing one Judge from two Divisions at the same time; and in practice there was no invidiousness in making a selection, because it was arranged to take the Judges in rotation according to seniority, unless that arrangement were varied by agreement as a matter of personal convenience. As to the time when the arrangements contemplated by the measure would be realized, that depended upon the time—which he hoped would be considerable—that the four salaried Members of the Judicial Committee would continue to hold office; he could not well anticipate their removal in this Bill, and he must leave the matter to be dealt with by the Government at a future time. He had himself stated that the expense of appeals to the House ought to be considered with a view to their reduction. The fees were so inconsiderable as to contrast favourably with those of any other Court, and the real sources of expense were printing and the fees of counsel attending at the Bar. It was not the case that all that was printed for this House had been printed for the Court below. In many cases the bulk of what was printed for this House had not been printed previously. There were many documents that were not printed for the Court below unless the suitors chose to print them; and although the rule of the Court of Chancery was to print evidence, there was a great deal of evidence in those Courts, as well as in the Common Law Division, that was not printed for those Courts, and was, therefore, printed for the first time for this House. What did his noble and learned Friend propose? That the prints used in the Court below should be used here. What would be the result? There were from 1,000 to 2,000 cases heard in the Primary Courts to one which was appealed to their Lordships' House, and if the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend were adopted, it would lead to a considerable number of extra copies of prints in every case, whether an appeal was brought or not. He agreed that if any expense could be saved in the matter of printing it ought to be saved; but the cardinal point must be attended to, that the whole subject-matter, with the evidence, should be in print. With respect to professional fees, his noble and learned Friend had gone into calculations as to what those fees amounted to. All he could say was they could not, by rule, prevent suitors from giving large fees if they were so inclined. They might say that the losing party should not have entailed on him fees on a larger scale than would fairly recompense business done; and it would be for the Committee to be appointed to consider what rule should be adopted and what limitations should be imposed in that matter. But he owned he was surprised to hear his noble and learned Friend suggest that some enactment should be contained in the Bill with reference to this point. Then, with regard to the place of sitting, he could not conceive why, if they retained the jurisdiction of their Lordships' House, they should not continue to sit in the House of Lords. To remove to another place would destroy one of the elements of the dignity and prestige of hearing appeals in that House. As to the building for the Courts of Law, which it was said by his noble and learned Friend was advancing to completion, he should like to have asked him, if he were now present, whether he considered that there was any room in that building available for such a purpose. He very much doubted whether every possible accommodation was not already fully pre-occupied. He would, however, say this—that just as regarded the question of expense, so also with regard to locality, if this measure received the assent of Parliament he trusted one thing would be done with regard to the House. He could speak from sad experience. There never was anything more inconvenient than the Bar of that House for counsel and those who assisted them, and he trusted, if this measure became law, their Lordships would think it necessary to call for some structural arrangement, in order that counsel might be better accommodated than at present. He thought that could easily be done. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Hatherley) had asked what would be the social status of the children of the life Peers. He could only give this answer—No doubt their social status would be duly and properly considered. Then he was asked what would happen if a life Peer received a hereditary Peerage? Why, he would not cease to be a Baron, but he would enjoy all the dignities of his hereditary Peerage notwithstanding. The limitations of his life Peerage would not be transferred to his hereditary dignity. Then it was said, if a life Peer resigned, he should cease to be a Peer. He was made, in the first instance, a Peer for life, but his writ of summons to sit and vote would run only for the time he filled his office of Lord of Appeal. His noble and learned Friend had also said that if this Bill became law it would not be the old jurisdiction of their Lordships' House. He, on the other hand, maintained that, not only would it be the old jurisdiction, but the true and primitive jurisdiction of that House.

Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday the 3rd of March next.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 25th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Philip Wroughton, esquire, for Berkshire.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Turnpike Acts Continuance, nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—Resolutions [February 18] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Resolutions [February 24] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000)*; Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000)*; Poor Law Guardians Elections (Ireland)* [88].

Committee—Report—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders* [71].

The Lord Chancellor

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

Mr. SAMUELSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he would suggest to the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents the publication of the Evidence on Accidents in England, without waiting for the close of the inquiry in Ireland?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, he had written to Lord Aberdeen, who was Chairman of the Commission on Railway Accidents, and was now carrying on the inquiry in Ireland, to ask him what his opinion was as to the propriety of publishing the evidence on accidents in England without waiting for the close of the inquiry in Ireland, but he had not yet received an answer. He declined to suggest this course to Lord Aberdeen, because he did not think it expedient to make a partial and incomplete Report.

NAVY—THE TROOP-SHIP "ORONTES." QUESTION.

Mr. PALMER asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the "Orontes" has been lengthened and repaired under the usual custom of tender and contract based upon Estimates; and, if not, under what arrangements the work had been done, and how much it has cost?

Mr. HUNT, in reply, said, the Orontes had been lengthened and had had new engines put into her under the usual custom as mentioned by the hon. Member, and the cost had been £66,500—namely, lengthening the ship 50 feet, £33,000, and cost of new compound engines, and placing them on board, £33,500. In addition there had been other alterations under a schedule of prices approved by the Admiralty, the cost of which had been £53,500.

MUNICIPAL PRIVILEGES BILL AND THE BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND) —SIGNATURE OF PETITIONS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BUTT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that an official of the Board of Works has presented to the clerks of that establishment, while engaged in their offices, a petition for signature against the Municipal Privileges Bill; and, if so, whether this has been done with the sanction of the Commissioners or the Government?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I am informed by the Commissioners of Public Works that they find on inquiry that a Petition for signature against the Municipal Privileges Bill was brought into the office of the architect of their Department by a private gentleman, handed to the architect, and, having been signed by him, was handed to other members of the architect's staff, who also signed it. The members of the staff in the other branches of the Department deny any knowledge of the matter. The Commissioners themselves were entirely ignorant of it until they saw the Notice of the hon. and learned Member's Question; and I need hardly add that it was not sanctioned either by the Commissioners or by the Government.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

OUR MILITARY FORCES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. J. HOLMS, in rising to call attention to the state of our Military Forces; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the British Army is most unsatisfactory, and its cost extravagant; that our present practice of retaining men in barracks for Home Service longer than is necessary to make them efficient and thorough soldiers is vicious and immoral; and that, having regard to the efficient defence of the Country, it is inexpedient to maintain two rival paid forces in the United Kingdom," said, that the present unsatisfactory condition of the Army, and the probable announcement of another great scheme of Army Organization being made to Parliament, had induced him to submit to the House two plain and simple propositions which indicated a definite policy in relation to our Military Forces, that would, in his opinion, bring our Army into harmony with our present requirements and modern ideas. The discussion of them, moreover, would, he thought, promote a due appreciation of any measure which Her Majesty's Government might have to submit. The two propositions to which he would call attention were such as the people at large would perfectly understand. He had submitted them to various large constituencies throughout the country, every one of which gave them a unanimous and most hearty support. These propositions were, that our present practice of retaining men in barracks for Home Service longer than was necessary to make them efficient and thorough soldiers was vicious and immoral; and that, having regard to the efficient defence of the country, it was inexpedient to maintain two rival paid Forces in the United Kingdom. He would first advert to the second point before dealing with the other. In spite of all the money we might expend upon our Military Forces, the inefficiency and waste which we at present witnessed would continue until, like reasonable people, we put an end to that unseemly rivalry which was carried on with almost unexampled vigour between the recruiting sergeants of the Militia and the recruiting sergeants of the Line. At the present moment the Army was starving for men, and in India, unfortunately, the Army was recruited by too many boys, yet the recruiting sergeants of the Militia were encouraged to enlist every possible man in the country, and they had the advantage of offering an extra bounty of 10*s.* to every recruit they obtained, whilst the recruiting sergeants for the Line could offer no bounty. He did not impute blame to the men or the officers of the Militia, but he complained of the system, which was at once demoralizing and costly. He believed that many hon. Members of the House were not acquainted with the exact state of the Militia. Speaking of the relative conditions of our Army and our Militia, he maintained that if the former was discontented and wanting in discipline, it was superior in both respects to the latter. With regard to recruiting and training, some doubt had been thrown on his figures out-of-doors, but the objections to them had been made in so general a way, that he had no opportunity of correcting them if they were erroneous, which, however, he did not admit. Still, in dealing with a question so large and so full of detail, it was almost impossible for any man, however careful, not at times to be misled; and, if the figures he adduced could be shown to be inaccurate, he would be glad to be corrected.

Those which he was about to quote were derived from official sources. In November, 1870, certain questions were sent to the commanding officers of Militia in the United Kingdom, with the view of securing accurate information, and one of them related to the number of recruits they then obtained annually. He took the average in Great Britain only during the three or four years previous to 1870, because the recruiting and training in Ireland were in those years both irregular. Previous to 1870, then, in Great Britain the average number of those recruits was 16,290 each year. The number of privates who came up for training, according to the War Office Returns in March, 1870, was 69,995. Taking the four years after 1870—namely, 1871-2-3-4, the number of recruits obtained on the average was 21,030; and the number of privates who attended training in 1874 was 63,857. Therefore, while the recruits obtained after 1870 were 4,700 more than they were before 1870, the number of men who came up for training was 6,000 fewer as compared with previous years. In 1872, the measure for the localization of the Forces was passed with a clear understanding that it was expressly to benefit the Militia. The desertions from the Militia, taking the years 1869 and 1874, showed a marked and extraordinary increase. The figures he would use were for the United Kingdom. The number of deserters advertized for in 1869 was 3,836; in 1874 it was 10,500; and that number was not diminishing, for in 1875 it was 10,800. Of the 63,857 men who appeared for training in 1874, 22,000 were from the Militia Reserve—a force not quite so shifting as the Regular Militia, being engaged for five years at an annual retaining fee. So that 42,000 was the whole outcome of the 21,000 recruits they obtained annually for the Militia. When they remembered that so large a proportion of the Militia officers as three-fourths were amateurs, unacquainted with military affairs, how could it be expected that the men to be led and instructed by them should have the same confidence in them as in officers who had been made well acquainted with military training? No doubt, some of the men who joined the Militia would not join the Regular Army, but the great mass would do so, for it should be remembered that during the Crimean War 71,000 men volunteered from the Militia for the Regular Army, and, further, during the only time this century when recruiting for the Militia ceased—in 1807, under Mr. Wyndham's Act—the result was highly satisfactory. The Duke of Cambridge stated in June, 1866, before the Royal Commission on Recruiting, that the moment they recruited for the Militia as they did for the Line, there was no doubt that the Militia interfered to a great extent with the Army, because many a man who now enlisted for the Militia would go into the Army. The Militia, then, was not a "feeder" for the Army, but exactly the reverse. He now came to his second proposition—namely, that the present practice of retaining men in barracks longer than was required to make them efficient soldiers was vicious and immoral. We now kept Infantry soldiers at least six years in barracks, and the Cavalry and Artillery eight years. We took recruits from 15 and upwards, when they were incapable of hard drill until they had been fed and nursed for two or three years. The late Lord Raglan had expressed a very strong opinion upon the subject. They were paying for the feeding and clothing of these recruits for six or eight years, when, under a sound system, they need only keep them two years in barracks. If they got a good recruit at 20, he ought to make a good soldier in less than two years; but the fact was, as he had said, that they kept him there for six or eight years instead of two, a system productive of idleness and mischief, it being patent to all that a long barrack life was pernicious. The best trained troops in Europe were not kept more than two years in barracks, and would any one say that it was necessary for the defence of the country that they should have soldiers trained better than the best troops in Europe? Was it necessary to have such men to fight the Maories in New Zealand, the Ashantees in West Africa, or the Kaffirs at the Cape? It might be said that the British officer could not turn out a good soldier in two years with the present material, and perhaps he could not: but with good material why could he not do so as quickly and as well as the Prussian officer now did? He had lately received two letters from military men on this question. One of them, who had served eight years, partly in India, said he had long been of opinion that our Army was a very costly and exceedingly antiquated machine, and on the whole he was pretty sure that 14 months of continuous training at high pressure would make an Englishman a thorough Infantry soldier as to the drill and the use of his weapon; while the Cavalry and the Artillery would require a somewhat longer training. He (Mr. Holms), however, did not think that quite so high pressure was necessary. The other correspondent, who had been connected with the Army in the Crimea, said officers took little or no part in the real teaching of the men—which in Prussia was considered of great importance—their time being mostly taken up with a number of trivial duties which had nothing to do with their proper business of fighting. Now, he had no doubt English officers, if we gave them the opportunity and the materials, would turn out as many and as good soldiers as any other officers in Europe. He was not arguing on a mere theory; the superiority of the Prussian system of administration was practically demonstrated. For every 10,000 men that Prussia obtained annually, she had at the end of seven years an accumulated force of 60,000 between 20 and 27 years of age, and at the end of 12 years 90,000 between 20 and 32 years of age; and during the whole of that time there were never more than from 18,000 to 20,000 privates in barracks at once. The principle of the Prussian system was accumulation, while that of ours was dispersion. The Prussians taking 100,000 recruits a-year, or just double the number of men per year that we raised for the Army and the Militia, were able to bring 940,000 into the field in the Franco-German War. In the four years—1871-2-3 and 4—we had obtained 197,000 men. He ventured to say that only three-fourths of that number, taken under a proper system of administration, would have given us a much larger and better Force than we now had. In Prussia, where conscription prevailed, everything possible was done to reduce the evils of barrack life, and why in England should we not make similar efforts in that direction? Our system in respect of morality was as barbarous as it could well be. The House ought to regard the interests of the private soldier a little more than it did. We should hear in that House any number of propositions for the social improvement of the people, and that it was a sacred duty of the State to do all it could to advance the moral well-being of society; but attention ought to be directed to the moral condition of our Army, which was hourly corrupting our people, and was a standing reproach to the country. We were at the present moment keeping 80,000 or 90,000 men in enforced celibacy in barracks, while by letting our men go home at the end of two years we need never have more than 40,000 or 50,000 men in barracks at one time. As to the demoralizing effects of long subjection to the present barrack system with respect to married soldiers, they had ample evidence in the letters which had appeared in the newspapers, including letters from officers at Aldershot and other military stations. They saw the actual operation of the system, and when three or four married families had to use and live in one common room, without any separation, it was impossible that even the commonest decencies of life could be observed—the result must be of a depraving character. A major, writing from Aldershot, gave his experience on this point, and said the whole of the scandal might be removed by giving each married non-commissioned officer and his wife and family separate lodgings at 3s. 6d. a-week. The Secretary of State for War, while interposing in the matter, had admitted the evils of the present system, but did not indicate any clear remedy for them in this civilized and Christian country. The present Government was expressly pledged to promote the social and moral progress of the people, and that progress, he would remind them, depended even more upon moral than upon material conditions. With regard to the short service he advocated, he would, no doubt, be told that it was incompatible with our Indian and foreign requirements; but the more that objection was examined, the more fallacious it would be found to be. Both as regarded going out and coming home, the truth was that the present system was most hurtful both to the Home and the Foreign Service. Battalions going to India were frequently composed of men who were too young or too old to go there, and many of the men who came home from India were so enervated as to be incapable of the hard work that was required of them in this country. Under our present system of neither short nor long service, every now and then it would be found that a battalion had a great number of men whose term of service was within a year or two of being run out, and that it would not pay to send them to India, so that a large proportion of the whole must be kept at home. What we should do was, to give up the practice of sending men abroad in time of peace and give the men their choice of Home or Foreign service. This course would greatly improve the character of the recruits offering, and would not in the least degree interfere with the service. If there was not the liability to be sent abroad at any moment, many would enlist under the short reserve period he proposed, and pass into the Reserve if they did not feel fitted for, or desirous of, service abroad. Many would also, who wished for adventurous life, volunteer for foreign service, and the result would be that soldiers would be found ready to go abroad to India, or the Colonies, without forcing unwilling or unfit men. Sir John Burgoyne in 1869 said—

“One great difficulty in enlistment for a short period is that it is quite incompatible with the East India and Colonial service, but, perhaps, it might be met by enlisting men expressly for that service. Such a system would perhaps also tend to induce many a valuable recruit to enter the service.”

Many working men, indeed, had told him that, no matter what price was offered, they would have nothing to do with military service so long as they were subject to be sent anywhere in time of peace. He had been told that one half of the desertions arose from the circumstance of there being no choice of service, and at the present time there was a man suffering imprisonment with hard labour who deserted because his regiment was not going to India. He enlisted for the purpose of going to India; he was not permitted to exchange, and so he deserted from his own regiment, but re-enlisted, and was sent to a regiment that was about to go to India, but he was apprehended as a deserter, and was suffering hard labour really because he wished to choose his service, thus showing that the theory and practice of exchanges were not understood in the case of the common soldier. On the other hand, men were sent to India who did not wish to go. He recently received a letter from one of his constituents, who complained that his son, having been enlisted at the age of 14 years and 11 months, was about to be sent to India at the age of 15 years and 8 months, and that he had vainly tried to obtain his discharge. The recruiting sergeant, according to the boy, had told him not to give his proper age. It was true that this was a one-sided statement, and that from inquiries he had made at the War Office it appeared the sergeant denied the boy's story; but the case illustrated the evil side of the present system of foreign service. He had had some correspondence with the War Office on the matter, and they said they would get this youth back from India. The father offered to pay £30 to get his son off, but this was refused, it being said that the lad could be bought off in India. The father of this lad had another son in the Army, who was enlisted at the age of 14, and taken out to India under 17. “But,” said the letter he had from the boy's father, “I need not trouble you about him, as his health is so broken down that he is coming home.” In 1871 an opinion was expressed by that House, -on the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), that no soldier should be sent to India under 20 years of age, “if practicable,” the two latter words being added at the suggestion of the Minister for War; but, as he had shown, very young men were still sent out, and some who were unwilling to go. Previous to our taking over India, out of 20,000 soldiers sent between 1850 and 1858, only four were under 18 years of age, and these four were discovered to be band boys for the Governor of Bombay. This was a question of great importance to India as well as to ourselves. The Army in India cost no less than £16,000,000 a-year, and he contended that it stood more in need of reform than our Army at home. It was time to think not only how a reduction of expenditure could be made, but how our ranks could be better filled, and he regretted to learn from some remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the other day, that the time was yet far distant when that might be expected. If they did not choose to look at the condition of the Army in India, he could assure the House that the people of India were looking at and speaking and writing about it, in proof of which he would quote from an article in The Bombay Gazette of October 25 last year, stating that the interests of military and civil wire-pullers in England were opposed to the formation of a local Army for India, the result being that India had boys for soldiers, who were buried by thousands, when she ought to have men. That showed the subject was not escaping notice in India. He was not in favour of a local army; but unless some reforms were instituted he, for one, was prepared to vote for it in preference to the present system. What, however, he said was that there should be a choice of service. He thought the present system was eminently dishonest towards India. If India was to be recruited for by our War Office, we ought to give up recruiting for the Militia; or, if not, allow India to recruit for herself. He believed the Indian and Colonial Military Service might be made the most attractive the world ever saw by giving the soldiers some change, as was given, for example, to telegraph clerks. A gentleman connected with a Telegraph Company informed him that it had been found that five years in India was as much as could be imposed on a clerk having regard to his health, and that clerks were changed from India to Gibraltar, Malta, and Ceylon, thus giving them a choice of service which made it attractive to them. As to the Indian Army, its position had been greatly changed since the Mutiny. Before that, the proportion of English troops to the Native Army was 42,000, as against 268,000; whereas now there were 60,000 English to 120,000 Native soldiers. The question arose, how they were to get their men? They should get them much in the same way as Cromwell got his men. His army was composed upon what he called "his new model." Cromwell said—"I want good soldiers and good men—honest, sober Christians, who expect to be used like men." Cromwell gave fair pay, but placed treatment and terms before everything. They might raise their pay as much as they liked; until they changed their treatment and their terms, it was all no use. In Cromwell's time the agricultural labourer was paid 4s. a-week, and the artizan 6s. a-week; Cromwell offered 7s., and he had the choice. They had had many changes in the Army lately, and he thought it had become worse and worse. They should begin by securing better men by changing the whole system, and by increased pay, and if they carried out the plan he proposed, they would not have so many men in barracks as they had at present. As to the cost of obtaining men, any hon. Member could calculate it for himself; but if they had 40,000 or 50,000 less men in barracks, the saving in food, clothing, and pay would be considerable. There would be a saving of £1,200,000 in the abolition of the Militia, and there would be a great reduction in the cost of hospitals and prisons, and in the amount paid in pensions. Taking into account all these reductions on the existing expenditure, if they gave to the soldier pay equal to what they paid the police or the commoner class of railway servants, he believed they would have a large profit on the present system. He wished, in the next place, to say a few words with respect to the Amendment which the hon. and gallant General opposite (General Shute) was about to propose. From its wording one might suppose that our barracks were most admirable schools of discipline and morality, and that "sweetness and light" at once descended on any bad character who might enter them. Facts, however, he thought, proved that such an idea was delusive; for at the very moment the hon. and gallant Member was handing in his Notice of Amendment the Inspector General of Military Prisons was giving in his Report for 1874. It appeared from this Report that whilst the average number of our Army at home was 93,000, there were during 1874 no fewer than 9,114 sentences by courts martial, and minor punishments by commanding officers to the amount of 162,484. If reform did not come after all these punishments it was very remarkable; but it would appear there were still some incorrigible characters in the Army, although he found by the Report that in six years 10,525 men had been discharged as bad characters; under these circumstances, it could, in his opinion, hardly be fairly contested that the barracks of the United Kingdom were good schools of morality and discipline. The hon. and gallant General, he might add, went on to state that the fact of our having varied forces tended to utilize for military service a larger proportion of the population than would otherwise be found available, but he had entirely left out of sight the Reserve, which was the force to which the nations of Europe were mainly looking to year after year. He was quite prepared to agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman if the Militia were left out of the List, and the Reserve put in their place. In conclusion, he could only thank the House for the patience it had shown in listening to him, and would move the Resolution which stood upon the Paper in his name.

Mr. J. Holmes

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the British Army is most unsatisfactory, and its cost extravagant; that our present practice of retaining men in barracks for Home Service longer than is necessary to make them efficient and thorough soldiers is vicious and immoral; and that, having regard to the efficient defence of the Country, it is inexpedient to maintain two rival paid forces in the United Kingdom,"—(Mr. John Holms),—instead thereof.

GENERAL SHUTE, who had the following Amendment on the Paper, which the Forms of the House prevented him from moving—namely,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the admirable regimental discipline carried out in the barracks of the United Kingdom has tended to reform the intemperate and immoral habits of any bad characters who may have been occasionally recruited for the Army; and that in this country, where military service is entirely voluntary, the fact of having varied descriptions of force, such as the Regular Army, Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry Cavalry, tends to utilise for military service a larger portion of the population than would be otherwise available," said, that so far as he could understand from the speech of the hon. Gentleman, his desires were to see maintained a very small and expensive, and, therefore, as he argued, a very good, Army. He (General Shute) thought, however, that he should be able to show that any additional money which the country might be disposed to incur in that direction could be better laid out than in the way which had been suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who proposed to dispense with the oldest and most constitutional force we had, and that which was the very basis of our military system—the Militia. That was a policy which, he felt assured, the House would never sanction; for although the Militia in some degree interfered with the recruiting market, yet in cases of emergency the Army was fed from that force. It was said that Wellington in his last campaign in Belgium fought with young men, and fought well. It was true it was a young Army as regarded soldiers, but not as to men; because they were drawn from the Militia, and in a great measure Waterloo was won by Militia soldiers. Into the question of recruiting he would not on the present occasion enter, because he thought the Resolution was premature; and, besides, he hoped to hear the views of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War upon it when he brought forward the Army Estimates. He had given Notice of the Amendment which, by the Forms of the House, he was precluded from moving, chiefly because he did not think it advisable that the extreme terms of the Resolution which had just been laid before the House should remain unchallenged. In that Resolution it was implied that our barracks were schools of vice and immorality, but in making such a statement he could, as an old commanding officer, assure the hon. Member that he was entirely in error. If barrack discipline was in the state the hon. Member for Hackney described, the prejudice of parents against their children enlisting would be fully justified, and police magistrates would be only discharging their duty in reprimanding young men for enlisting, and the owners of concert halls and theatres would do right in preventing non-commissioned officers from occupying reserved seats in their places of amusement. There was no subject in which the commanding officer of a regiment was more interested than in the recruiting of his men and their after conduct. They were not only taught their duty as soldiers, but everything was done to improve their social character, and in a great many cases these endeavours were attended with success. It was too much the fashion of those who had never served in the Regular Army to think that when recruits were brought up before the commanding officer for trivial offences, they were sworn at and punished; but so far from that being the case, it was the invariable rule at first for the colonel to advise them and endeavour to get them out of their bad ways by persuasion and advice before punishing them. He himself remembered when as the result of various alterations which were made at the time, he found that he had in his regiment 120 new men who kept bad hours, and who frequented music-halls and public-houses. He found the reason was that they were led away by their old boon companions in Manchester, where the regiment was quartered, and he therefore sent them in small batches as they were dismissed their drills to Northampton, where a squadron of the regiment was stationed, exchanging them as far as possible with older soldiers who had been enlisted in the South of England, and the result of the change was that so good an effect was produced upon them, that others appealed to him to be sent there out of the way of temptation, and they from being very loose characters had become thoroughly reformed and good soldiers, and therefore he had some doubts as to the success of the localization system recommended by a Committee of clever men, but although it was a regimental matter, not one of them had commanded a regiment. Indeed, a regiment ought, he contended, to be a school of social reform as well as of military discipline. As to the Prussian soldiers, he denied that they had ever been more highly disciplined than the English. He had been at the Prussian Manœuvres three times, and had narrowly watched them, and he must emphatically deny that the discipline was in any way superior to that of the old and present Armies of England. They were, however, very finé men, and were able to march and work well. How long did the hon. Member opposite think it took to make an efficient soldier? The hon. Gentleman was right as regarded drill. Drill, especially foot drill, was, with some intelligent men, a matter of a few weeks, but discipline was a matter of habit, and was not to be acquired in a day. Moreover, discipline was less easily acquired in a free country like England than it was in a despotic country, where the inhabitants were comparatively slaves. In proof of what he said concerning discipline he might refer to the Circular lately issued by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. That Circular, if justifiable, would never have been necessary in the old days of our long service soldiers. The petty insubordination of which he warned the House last Session had been entirely consequent on youth in the Army. He did not, however, mean to say that he did not advocate short service in some way—except for the Cavalry—because the great desideratum was an effective reserve, and this we could not have without short service. As regarded recruiting, he hoped no theories would induce the House to part with our Militia. We ought rather to endeavour to utilize the various forces we possessed. The Militia might interfere with the recruiting market; but, in an emergency, the Militia would feed the Army. There was an immense number of men who would serve in the Militia, but who would not serve in the Line, and who would therefore be lost to the country for military service in case the Militia were abolished. Again, there were many Volunteers who would not serve in the Militia or in the Line, and it was desirable to retain their services in a military capacity; while, with regard to the Yeomanry Cavalry, there was not a man among them who would serve except as a mounted yeoman. Many people depreciated the Yeomanry Cavalry; but if the recommendations of the Committee of last Session were attended to, it would become a most admirable Force of rifle light Cavalry. The system of short service would cause us to require a vastly increased number of recruits, and therefore the Service ought to be rendered more attractive. In the case of the Army as he had said on a former occasion we must be prepared, either in purse or person, to pay largely, and if the latter course was adopted it must be by a revised Ballot Act, in which the rich and the poor man must be equally treated. With respect to the employment of more money, he would repeat the following suggestions which he made in the House last Session. Increased pay would at first only increase temptation, and the Government would still be outbid in the market by the great employers of labour. Then there must be no uncertainties, for these the men especially detested. A man must not merely have a really free kit and a free ration, but as he became a more practised soldier he must have a considerable increase of pay from year to year, and this had better be reserved pay. This would be done on the principle of paying for skilled labour. Non-commissioned officers should have a decided increase of pay, and a further annual increase up to 12 years' service. Then more fuel and more light should be allowed for barrack rooms, so that the men might have warmth combined with ventilation. When men or non-commissioned officers were allowed to go on furlough they should have full pay, and ration money while absent, and a warrant to go and return free of expense. At present many soldiers returned to their friends as paupers, instead of being examples of the advantages of military service, and from not having money to pay their way back remained absent without leave, and perhaps finally deserted. Another of his suggestions was, that every man who had faithfully served the Queen should at the age of 65 receive a pension of not less than 1s. a-day, receiving it one year earlier for every year he had served with credit in the Army, so that if he had served five years he would get it at 60, and so on; for nothing had a more discouraging effect on enlistment than the fact of men who had been soldiers and who were past work being reduced to the workhouse. Last, not least, if we wanted to get recruits of 20 or 21 years of age, the Army must be made a stepping-stone to civil employment. With reference to the choice of quarters, he would suggest that the men should be at liberty to choose their battalions, instead of being obliged to enlist in linked battalions, and thus not knowing whether they would be required to go abroad or serve at home. Desertion was a fraud on the public, and in the United Kingdom it ought to be treated chiefly by the civil magistrate. Soldiers ought no longer to march handcuffed deserters about the country. If, however, the power of the purse should fail, then we must come to the person. Supposing that England were the most despotic country in the world we could not adopt conscription. No doubt it was the duty of every man in case of necessity to defend his hearth and home, but you could not say that he must go to India or garrison our Colonies. However, in case of necessity, we might ballot for the Militia under a revised Ballot Act, the present one being cumbrous, useless, and most unjust. If the Militia did not give its quota to the Line, a Ballot should be taken; but this, of course, would only be done in time of actual warfare. At present, a substitute was easily procured by a rich man, whereas a poor man had no power to obtain one. The true principle was, that he who possessed most wealth should contribute most in some form or other to the defence of the country. In conclusion, for the sake of recruiting if not from higher motives, he would appeal to hon. Members not to speak in disparaging terms of an Army which, in cases of emergency, had ever served the country gallantly and well.

SIR RICHARD GILPIN said, that a large number of men who entered the Militia had never any intention of going into the Regular Service. There were also men who joined the Volunteers without any view of entering the Army, but who took a liking to soldiering and afterwards went into the Line. The hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Hackney had been stumping the country as a great military reformer; but when he undertook to enlighten public opinion he should be careful as to his language and accurate as to his facts. The hon. Gentleman had declared that the Militia was a gigantic sham and a toy for country gentlemen. Now, the Duke of Wellington, speaking upon the Militia Bill in the other House, testified to the value of Militia regiments in the Great War, and declared that they were as fit for service and in as high a state of discipline as any he ever saw in his life, even among Her Majesty's troops. The Duke of Wellington had Militia regiments volunteering bodily for the field. During the Crimean War, from January 1, 1854, to December 31, 1858, the number of volunteers from the Militia into the Regular Service was nearly 40,000, while several Militia regiments volunteered for foreign service, and thus released our Mediterranean garrisons for service in the field. No man did more to convert the raw material of the Militia into the manufactured article than General Knollys, and when examined before the Royal Commission respecting the general efficiency of the Militia regiments as to drill and conduct in camp, he stated that they were in as high a state of efficiency as it was possible for Militia regiments to be, and were as good as they could be both as to efficiency and conduct. This was the service which the hon. Gentleman called a gigantic sham, while the officers, he said, were military amateurs. Now, when men did not know much of a profession, they were called quacks. He did not use the word offensively or apply it to the hon. Member alone, but to others who fancied they knew a great deal about a Service to which they had never belonged, and about which they really knew little. Within the last few years, whether for good or for evil, our Service had been revolutionized, and, having spent a large sum upon the alteration, we were compelled to give it a fair trial. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would consider only what was most for the advantage of the Service, and would not adopt the nostrums of these gentlemen, for if he did he would certainly destroy the patient.

Mr. PEASE said, he wished to comment on the assertion of the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) that regimental discipline had tended to reform the immoral habits of many bad characters. For his own part, he saw nothing in the Returns which had been placed in their hands within the last few days which bore out that allegation. That Return showed that on an average, there were 186,000 men in the Army, of these 161,000 men were rank and file. That was the average during the year 1874; of this number there were men of whom any country might be proud. The Returns showed that the men who had good-conduct badges or medals were no fewer than 88,227 men, leaving 72,000 rank and file who had not received good conduct badges, or medals, or gratuities. What was the condition of the rank and file of those 72,000 men? He perfectly agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton, who said that the officers for many years past had been devoting a great deal of time to their men, and that the Army and the country had a great deal to thank the officers for in supplying the wants and necessities of the men, and adding to the comforts of their families. But what he was going to say was this—that in spite of all this there were 72,000 men who were not classed as good-conduct men. Of the 72,000 men, 19,900 had been before a Court-martial; 11,000 men, or 16 per cent had been actually in prison; and they had had 1,800 degraded from the ranks. Therefore, 27 per cent of these 72,000 men had been tried before a Court-martial, and they had had in this state of the Army 11,000 imprisoned, or 16 per cent. Then, again, of these 72,000 men they had 24,000 of them fined for being drunk, or 44 per cent; and 49,700 fines for being drunk had been levied on 24,000 men, or, on the average, each man was fined twice for being drunk in the course of the year. It therefore appeared that one-third of the non good-conduct men had been fined for being drunk. Then they had got 255,000 minor offences, but many of these were very trivial, and he was sorry that they should have appeared in the Returns to give an exaggerated idea of the want of discipline. In 1871, there were 35,000 men fined for being drunk; in 1872, there were 26,000 men; in 1873, there were 23,000 men; and in 1874, there were 24,000 men. He did not see how the House could go with his hon. and gallant Friend in saying that the morals could be improved by barrack life. Of the 17,000 men who joined in 1872, 4,500 had deserted, or 19 per cent; in 1873, 33 per cent deserted; and in 1874, 27 per cent. Out of the 30,000 men who had enlisted during 1874, only 20,000 men had passed into the lines. That showed the class of recruits, when one-third of the men who offered themselves for enlistment were wanting in those physical qualities to fit them for entrance into the ranks. Then, out of the 30,000 men 2,500 had paid "smart" money, or one guinea, in order that they might get away from the Army, into which they had been entrapped or led into unawares by the persuasions of recruiting officers. His hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) was perfectly justified when he said that the condition of the Army was most unsatisfactory. What was the reason of this condition of the Army? He had endeavoured once or twice to urge that they were keeping up large armies in time of peace, when there was no inducement to men to join, as a man must join the Army for two reasons—for patriotism or for a living. In time of peace patriotism could not be the inducement. If they expected a man to join for the sake of a living, then the pay was quite insufficient. But the country was not prepared to keep a large and extravagant Army, and they were driven to the necessity of getting men for the national defence, or to be sent abroad who were not such as could be relied upon. They recruited from a low class of the population, and when they got them they were put into barracks, and those barracks were the centre, not of virtue and innocence, but of immorality and crime. The statements in the Blue Book showed that the condition of these men was most deplorable, and hon. Members could see every night as they left the House of Commons that the barracks were far from being a place where men were likely to improve their morals. With regard to that branch of the Service which the hon. and gallant Member for Bedfordshire (Sir Richard Gilpin) had so often taken up the cudgels for—namely, the Militia, he had to say that so far as the majority of the Militia regiments were concerned, that he believed that they suffered most from being let loose in towns. He knew that there were some very distinguished exceptions; but in many places where they went to the time of their being quartered there was a time which the decent inhabitants looked forward to with dread, and the breaking up of the regiments made the place “a perfect hell upon earth.” This was a phrase he had heard made use of many times in reference to the Militia, or he should not have used it. The Army was in an unsatisfactory condition, and no hon. Member could assert the contrary with any truth. He knew that his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was desirous of freeing the Army from these faults and vices, but they knew the difficulties with which he had to deal. His own opinion was, that the system must be utterly wrong which produced such a state of things. He laid these facts and figures before the House in the hope that they might lead to something being done in this matter to produce a more satisfactory state of things.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, that both the House and the country were indebted to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) for having brought this Motion forward at the present time. He did not concur in the suggestion which had been made that the hon. Member should have waited until after the Army Estimates had been introduced; because, had he done so, he would not have had the same fair opportunity of stating his opinions on the subject, which he conscientiously believed to be correct ones. He could not say that he concurred in the statement of the hon. Member that the people throughout the country adopted his views; it was the general rule that meetings passed all the resolutions which were submitted to them. He was bound to tell the hon. Member that he had failed to make out his case in two material points—in the first place, he had failed to show that the Army, although perhaps not exactly in the condition it ought to be in, imperatively needed the particular changes in its constitution proposed by him; and, secondly, he failed to show that the country was prepared to abolish the old constitutional force of the Militia, which had rendered such service in times gone by. The hon. Member relied mainly on two points—that to keep men for home service in barracks longer than was necessary was a bad and immoral principle, and that it was inexpedient to maintain two rival Forces in the United Kingdom. But when the hon. Member attacked our present Army system, he should remember that that system was just now in a transition state, and we must wait to see what effect those reforms so lately introduced would have upon our system. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, had, with the fairness that distinguished him, endeavoured to carry into effect the new system introduced by his Predecessor, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman was even going a step beyond the lines that had been laid down for his guidance. For his own part, although he had originally opposed many of the proposals which had been carried out, he felt bound to bow to the decision of the majority, and he should now do his best to facilitate the reforms so determined upon being carried out in the Army. The right hon. Gentleman, acting upon a similar principle, was doing much to ameliorate and to better the condition of the Army. If he rightly understood the new Army Estimates, the right hon. Gentleman was going to increase the pay of the non-commissioned officers, who were the main support of the Army, and to give deferred pay to the men, so that when they left the service they would have a little money wherewith to start in life. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) had, in the first place, demanded increased pay for the men, and had then proceeded to complain of the increase of drunkenness in the Army. The conclusion at which he (Sir Walter Barttelot) had arrived was that, while it was desirable that the pay of the soldier should be increased, it would be most mischievous to give him increased pay while he was soldiering, and therefore the best form in which he could receive it was in that of deferred pay. The right hon. Gentleman was moving on in these lines, and therefore he must to a certain extent be satisfying the hon. Member for Hackney. Another and a very important proposal which the right hon. Gentleman was going to bring forward was to increase the force of the regiments ready to embark for foreign service. He would ask the hon. Member for Hackney, who was so anxious to have a very small number of men in our barracks, what would happen if the men who formed the Army of Reserve were not forthcoming in the hour of danger and emergency, if we had not a certain number of regiments ready to go to any part of the world at a moment's notice. The hon. Member for Hackney was most anxious that we should have an Army formed of a superior class of men, who would be free from the restrictions that were imposed upon soldiers. On that subject he could do no better than refer the hon. Member to the letters written by Archdeacon Wright, one of the Chaplains to the Forces, setting forth the grievances of the soldiers, which were well worth the serious consideration of the Secretary for War. The hon. Member thought men should not be enlisted unless they were of a certain age—20 he believed was the hon. Member's favourite age; and a very distinguished authority—a gallant Lord who had seen much service and had written a most able article in a Review—said that men should not be enlisted until they were 21; that they should learn a trade first, and then go into the Army; and, having served their proper time in the Army, should then return to their trade. That was a point which he (Sir Walter Barttelot) wished to be argued in the House of Commons, because that was a place in which opinions could be expressed as to the effect of such a proposal. He served 14 or 15 years in the Army, and he knew well what class of recruits came during that time. He had turned his attention for the many years he had been in that House to Army matters, and he ventured to assert that if we said no man should be received in the Army till he was 21, we should signally fail to get any recruits whatever. His firm belief was, that when a man was once established in a business or a trade he would not give up that trade or business for the small pay and allowances that were got in the Army. Could it be thought that a man who had been his own master till he came of age would be able to learn that discipline which was so essential and which had never failed in the Army in whatever situation it was placed? He hoped that the Resolution to which the House had come, that soldiers should not be sent to India until they were at least 20 years of age, would be strictly carried out; but in this country younger men must be accepted, or the House must be prepared to pay for the Army an amount which the country would never sanction. The hon. Member said that a man should be at liberty to choose whether he would serve in India or in England, and that the men should be able to exchange from one regiment to another, just as the officers did. He (Sir Walter Barttelot) had not the slightest objection to such choice being given; but he had every objection to a soldier, after he had joined one battalion, and went to a place and found he disliked it, being at liberty to get himself transferred to some other place which he thought he might like better. To go beyond giving a man his choice to serve at home or abroad would be detrimental to the interests of the Army. We heard some time ago of dual government in the Army. That was discussed in the House, which was not content till it had established the Secretary of State for War as supreme with regard to the Army at home. Why should not the Secretary of State for War be supreme also with regard to the Indian Army, instead of having to refer everything to the Secretary of State for India, when often between the two authorities great injustice was done to the soldier? Nor had he altered his opinion that it would be better in the interests of the Army that troops should be sent to India for five or six years, instead of being kept there so long as 12 years. That arrangement would {preserve the esprit de corps of the Army in India, and it could be more easily carried out, now that we had got the Suez Canal. As to the present condition of the Army, he observed, by a recent Return, that it was only 425 below its Establishment strength, taking all the services. The Cavalry were 474 above their Establishment strength, the Infantry of the Line 928 above, the Artillery 1,000 below, and the Foot Guards 400 below their Establishment strength; notwithstanding the difficulty of recruiting, especially for the Foot Guards and the Artillery, occasioned by the use of large guns, which required taller and bigger men than formerly to handle them. With reference to the Militia, if that Force were abolished one of the main sources of recruiting would be abolished with it. There were a class of men that would not in the first instance go into the Army, but would go into the Militia. The Returns from the Depot Centres showed how largely the Army was recruited from the Militia. From one of the Depot Centres between June, 1873—when it was established—and December, 1875, 661 recruits were passed. 423 of those men were enlisted on the spot, and 238 came from the Militia. That showed that the Militia was doing its work with regard to the recruiting of the Army. He did not agree with what fell from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Brighton (General Shute) about the Ballot. We were not prepared for the Ballot. The noble and gallant Lord who wished to send men to India, at the age of 21 was in favour of the Ballot. He (Sir Walter Barttelot) was bound to say that, unless some extraordinary circumstance arose, he believed that neither that House nor the country would in any way support the Ballot. In case of necessity, our soldiers should be liable to serve at home or abroad. He exceedingly regretted not to see in his place a noble Lord who strongly advocated the Ballot for the Militia. But in advocating that he said, "Let the Volunteers no longer receive anything from the State." The noble Lord knew perfectly well that if we had the Ballot for the Militia, and continued to pay the expenses of the Volunteers, it would be as in the olden times—every one would go into the Volunteers. That would not do. He wished to make a remark with regard to the return to this country of men in the Indian service. The country had recently manifested great interest on behalf of slaves, but it was not equally excited in the interest of men who had served it in all parts of the world. It was discreditable to this country that the reliefs from India were so badly treated. Some of them absolutely died from the way in which they were dealt with when they arrived at home. They had heard lately of the chain of military posts which we possessed in Malta, Gibraltar, and elsewhere, and he thought that if men coming from a hot climate were stationed for a time in those places, something might be done to prevent their catching those diseases which they now often suffered from when they came home. He was sure the Secretary of State for War would not neglect a matter of that kind, when the interests of the English soldier were at stake. He would only add that he was satisfied the right hon. Gentleman would do his best, as he was bound to do, not to increase the expenditure on the Army, for that expenditure, as they knew, was extremely heavy, although it was an insurance and the price this rich country paid for that which was the greatest blessing in the world—an Army voluntarily enlisted; and also to see that our Army, though costly, was yet effective, and ready to be used whenever necessary. Prussia—to which the hon. Member for Hackney had referred—was suffering from the loss of strength she had sustained and from the emigration resulting from that compulsory service which her sons would not stand; and he asked this free country whether it was not worth while paying any amount of money to keep ourselves out of such a difficulty as that.

Sir Walter Barttelot

CAPTAIN W. E. PRICE said, that in none of his speeches and writings on the subject had the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) alluded to the Landwehr in the Prussian Army, although he had described at some length the German military system generally. The hon. Member seemed to have forgotten that the Landwehr was not a Reserve at all, but an auxiliary force like our Militia. The Militia was well suited to the country, and recent experience had shown the value of a military system, combining an Army, a Reserve, a Militia, and Auxiliary Forces, and he believed that it would be a great mistake to attempt to upset it, and to substitute for it merely a local Army, instead of endeavouring to improve it as much as possible. He knew that many men joined the Militia because, as they said, it was the cheapest method of getting change of air and healthy exercise. He admitted that it was not as perfect as it might be, but it could be made so easily and cheaply.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) had not thrown much light on the subject before the House. What the hon. Member's proposals were likely to produce was a maximum of expense and a minimum of efficiency. If his plans were adopted, the effect would be that they would either have no Army at all, or an Army so costly that everybody would cry out against it. The scheme of the hon. Member, who had studied the subject as a civilian, and not as a soldier looked at it, reminded one of the old saying that old maids' children and bachelors' wives were perfection. He (Colonel Leigh) was entirely opposed to the Ballot. Our Army was the only one in Europe that was kept up entirely by voluntary enlistment, and the introduction of the Ballot would be utterly opposed to English feeling. The French proverb "You cannot make omelettes without breaking eggs" was applicable to the point. If you wanted soldiers, you must pay for them. Good pay would make the Army attractive. If we were attacked the chances were we should have something better than the Ballot—namely, the universal rising of an enormous number of men who knew something about military duties from having been in the Army, the Militia, and the Volunteers. One admirable measure that loomed very near was an increase of the pay of the non-commissioned officers—a most deserving class of men, who were now very inadequately rewarded. He would go further, and add pensions to those non-commissioned officers who had served a certain number of years. With regard to the Militiamen, they supplied many to the Regular Army, and many of them volunteered for the Crimean War, and fought well there. He hoped that body would not be destroyed, but that it would be improved. He remembered an old Militia-man coming to re-enlist, who, in answer to his question why he wished to join again, said soldiering was good for his health, and that he did not get drunk more than once a month while in the service. He would admit, however, that some men joined who did not show a taste for the occupation. It was quite news to him that boys were sent to India. The old plan he remembered was, that every man underwent inspection by the surgeon, and unless he was found quite sound in wind and fit for a hot climate, he was not allowed to go to India. Barracks in India had been put in wrong places, and due care had not been taken of the health of the troops. He had seen the Army improved in regard to officers, men, and every arrangement since he joined as a boy, although when he then joined things were thought to be perfect. They were still improving in every sort of way; and, whatever Government was in, the head of the Army never neglected it. If a mistake was made it arose from chance, not from wilfulness. As to the suggestion that regiments should be brought home from India complete in five years, it should be remembered that many men got accustomed to India and their constitutions adapted to its climate; and such men were worth a dozen soldiers whom they might send out. The hon. Member for Hackney asked why the Government of the country kept up so large a standing Army, and the answer was, we could not do otherwise. Our business was to look carefully at every expense incurred for the Army, but never to treat it with a sparing hand. If we did, the fault would recoil upon ourselves, for it must be remembered that we did not possess the appliances which Continental countries did for raising their enormous Armies. With a great country like India depending upon us, there must necessarily be a large draw upon our resources of men, but that should be willingly met in order to keep up our connection with that great and glorious possession.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he was glad his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) had brought forward the question at an early period of the Session, before the Government introduced the Army Estimates. At the same time, he should be compelled to divide against the Motion, because he could not assent to the proposition that our system was vicious and immoral, or to the suggestion that, having regard to the efficient defence of the country, it was inexpedient to maintain two rival paid Forces in the United Kingdom. His hon. Friend had disclaimed all military knowledge; but he was at all events master of that part of the military art which consisted in changing his ground, for there was a considerable difference between the speeches he had delivered in the country and the moderate statement he had made to the House. In many particulars, however, his arguments were still open to question, and he should endeavour to bring his hon. Friend back to the question. His hon. Friend compared our military system with that of Prussia, but any comparison between the two was impossible, for it must be remembered that conscription was resorted to in that country, whereas our Army was filled by voluntary enlistment. Then, as to the question of amount, his hon. Friend said that the Prussian Army was maintained at one-eighth of the cost of ours, but he did not tell them of the keep and pay of the Prussian as compared with the British soldier. This was a subject which had long occupied his (Sir Henry Havelock's) attention, and he had also been making recent inquiries on the subject—indeed, he was as well acquainted with the details of their system as of our own. The cost of the keep of the Prussian soldier was 4½*d.* a-day, as compared with 1*s.* 6*d.* a-day on the part of the British soldier. Beyond that, our soldiers received plentiful rations, which might perhaps in some respects be improved, but which, at all events, were sufficient to keep them in vigour. The Prussian soldier had an allowance of only one meal a-day, and that comprised no more than two-thirds of what was given to our men. For the rest of his food the Prussian soldier was maintained principally by the contributions of his friends, and that was an indirect tax on the country of which it was difficult to calculate the amount. It was true that his hon. Friend had addressed audiences in the country which had shown themselves favourable to him; but they were totally incapable of forming an opinion upon the facts brought under their notice. The hon. Gentleman compared disadvantageously the position of our Army now with what it was in 1870. His (Sir Henry Havelock's) observation led him to a totally different result. The supply of men was not so great as he should like it to be, but in other respects the position of our Army was decidedly better than it had been. We had more battalions at home, and they were in some respects stronger. We had a Reserve of 35,000 men. As to our Artillery it had been not less than doubled—he might almost say that it had increased two-thirds. There was a diminution of crime and of desertion, and in every respect there had been material and great improvement. In comparison with that, the Prussian Army had lost an enormous number of men by desertion in one year, many of whom had never returned. Again, the hon. Member's comparisons between the Prussian Reserve and our own were fallacious. If the Prussian authorities paid for their Reserves what we had to pay for ours, the cost to them would be something more than £8,000,000 a-year. As to the competition in recruiting between the Militia and the Line, no doubt they did compete, but not to the extent represented. One-half or two-thirds of the men in the Militia were earning good wages, and went out for training as a sort of holiday, but they could not devise any means which would bring these men into the Regular Army. There were consequently about one-third of the men in the Militia who might be induced to transfer their services to the Line. That idea had already been put in practice, and met with considerable success. He therefore thought it would be a most injudicious thing to interfere with the existing Militia, unless they were prepared with something to take its place. He could not concur in the statement that the Militia was a useless toy. When the Militia were embodied some of them were almost equal to the Line. There was scarcely a perceptible difference between the men of the Militia and of the Line when they were brigaded together. Between 1805 and 1815 the Militia contributed 110,000 men to the Line; during the Crimean War they had contributed 71,000 men; and they had since contributed a fair quota. The Militia had an important function to discharge in time of war, besides supplying recruits to the Regular Army, for if emergencies arose our highly-instructed Regular Army would be ready to be transferred abroad or to the Colonies, and then the Militia would to a great extent come into their place. He could find no confirmation of the statement which the hon. Member for Hackney had advanced in his book, that the function of the Militia was practically gone, because the Volunteers were fit to take their place. The Volunteer Gazette, the best authority, perhaps, that could be quoted on the subject, did not take that view of the fitness of the Volunteers to replace the Militia, but had pronounced a different opinion. We had some 160,000 Volunteers, of whom he wished to speak with every term of respect and admiration, but that Force would not enable the Militia to be dispensed with. The Militia supplied a most important intermediate force between the Regular Army and the Volunteers. He gave his hon. Friend credit for his wish to reduce expenses as far as possible, and he had contended that if his suggestions were followed, there would be a great diminution of expense. But he (Sir Henry Havelock) could not assent to some of the views put forward by his hon. Friend, such, for instance, as the proposal to reduce the standing Army at home to 68,000 men, and if they came to examine the way in which it was proposed that these should be distributed, they would come to some remarkable results. One result would be that the battalions would be so reduced that when the attempt should be made to enlarge them, the far greater portion of the men would be entirely new to the work. Neither could he agree with the hon. Member in the apprehensions with which he looked upon the condition of the Army in India, his own information having led him to an entirely different conclusion. He should prefer that our Forces in England and in India were a little more equally balanced, but the hon. Member had spoken of a state of things which had now ceased to exist. He could not concur in the Motion of his hon. Friend. If his hon. Friend could convince any considerable portion of the House that the results would be realized which he anticipated from the measures he proposed, he should be prepared to give them his cordial support, but having subjected them to the most thorough investigation, he could not in the slightest degree follow his hon. Friend.

Sir Henry Havelock

Mr. ANDERSON said, the hon. and gallant Member for Mid - Cheshire

(Colonel Egerton Leigh) had spoken of bachelors' wives and old maids' children, but the hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to forget that we had a civilian at the head of the Army now, and so long as that was the case no one could fairly object to civilians' criticism. Indeed, the Army itself might now, in the hon. Member's sense, be regarded as an old maid's child, seeing that it had a civilian at the head of it. An institution was never greatly reformed from within except after free criticism from without, and the Army was no exception to that. As a rule, the greatest reforms in the Army had come either from civilians or from civilian criticism. He had been glad to hear the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) speak so strongly and so decidedly against balloting for the Militia, and so far he had exactly expressed the feeling of the country on that point. The country was not ripe for the Militia Ballot, for the country knew that when that system was in force it never was a fair and proper thing. In fact, in the old days, when we had Ballot for the Militia, those who could escaped, and nine-tenths of the men who served were substitutes. It was, therefore, a Ballot—not for those who were to serve, but for those who were to escape paying for a substitute. It was practically taxation by Ballot, and for a return of that system he was sure the country was not ready. The hon. and gallant Baronet had said further that to abolish the Militia would take away a great field for recruiting, and had shown that the Militia was such a field at present; but it did not follow that the case would remain the same under his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney's scheme, which gave a totally different inducement to men to recruit. Still he (Mr. Anderson) did not advocate the abolition of the Militia. He did not even think that the abolition of the Militia was necessary for his hon. Friend's scheme. He thought that scheme would be very perfect and complete without it. At the same time, he had some fault to find with the Militia. He thought it was not a very efficient Force. It was only drilled for one month in the year, and worse than that, it was never taught to shoot at all. There was no pretence made to teach the Militia to shoot, and what was the use of the soldier who could not use his rifle? [Sir RICHARD GILPIN said, the Militia went through a course of musketry instruction every year.] He could produce some proof of what he had stated, for in the Army Estimates which had just been laid upon the Table, he found that the numbers of the Volunteers were 169,000 men, and the numbers of the Militia were 140,000 men; so that there was not a very great difference in point of numbers between the two services; and yet, while the amount expended for small arms ammunition for the Militia was just £5,913, the amount expended for small arms ammunition for the Volunteers was £51,374, or nearly 10 times as much for a Force which was only stronger by 20,000 men. That showed the difference between an Army that was taught to shoot and an Army that was not taught to shoot. There was one other fault he had to find with the Militia, and that was, that it was made a sort of back-door for the admission of incapable officers into the Army. That, he thought, was one of the worst features about our selection of officers for the Army—that men who entirely failed to pass examinations and thus to earn commissions in the regular way would by this sort of back-door means gain commissions in the Army which they were known to be utterly incapable of earning in the regular way. Still, he would prefer to see the Militia reformed to seeing it abolished. As to the questions of recruiting and desertion, the getting of suitable men instead of boys was simply a matter of money and inducements. While we paid only the price for boys we would only get boys. Under the scheme proposed by his hon. Friend, we should get a different class of men, and if the inducements were greater, we should not have the immense amount of desertion which we had at present. There was not the same amount of desertion from the police force, because the men were well paid; and it was only by paying men well, and making them comfortable, that we could get rid of so much desertion. No doubt, there were certain bad men who went about from regiment to regiment re-enlisting, and getting their kits over and over again. They used to be called “bounty jumpers” in the old days of bounty, and certainly the practice ought to be checked. He remembered that he was one of those who very strongly advocated the abolition of branding or marking deserters. The reason why he did so was that branding affixed an indelible mark of disgrace for an offence which was not a criminal offence; but a suggestion had been made which might greatly tend to check the practice of desertion, and that was, that instead of affixing a brand of disgrace, a brand of honour should be used instead. He understood that a man on entering the Army was always vaccinated. Would it not be possible to make the vaccination mark in the form of a broad arrow?—and that would not be a mark of disgrace, but it would show that the man had been in the Service, and therefore serve the same end of preventing repeated desertion. As to reducing the length of time that men were to be kept in barracks, he heartily concurred with his hon. Friend's view. He thought that if we kept a much smaller number of men in barracks than 80,000 or 100,000, and passed them more quickly into the Reserve, we could well afford to give them much larger pay when on active service—a pay which would make them comfortable and happy. Then, we could pass them into the Reserve, and by that means, in a few years, we should have created a good Reserve. No doubt, our Indian requirements were an obstacle in the way of short service; but he agreed with his hon. Friend that there should be special volunteering for India; and then, when a man volunteered to go to India, his six years should date from the time he volunteered. That would save the expense of bringing him back after a very short service abroad.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that so far as the first part of the Resolution was concerned, which pronounced the state of the Army unsatisfactory, he was by no means disposed to take an unreasonably optimistic view of our Army, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War deemed it his duty to introduce any reforms with a view to its improvement, he could assure him his proposals would meet from him with no undue amount of criticism. He must, however, observe that the Returns which had been laid before Parliament showed that in almost every respect there was an improvement; or, at all events, that the position of the Army was being maintained, whether they looked at the number of recruits, their age, size, conduct, or their health. In every respect there was no symptom of that deterioration of which one heard so much out-of-doors. As to the cost of the Army, there was no doubt that a large amount of money was spent upon it; but it was difficult to find a standard by which to judge that expense. To compare it on that head with the Prussian Army was to institute a comparison which was entirely illusory, considering the difference between the composition of the two armies, and the manner in which they were raised, nor was it easy to prove that, under all the circumstances of the case, our military expenditure was extravagant. But the Resolution, proceeding from generals to particulars, said that their present system of detaining men in barracks for home service for a much longer period than was necessary to make them efficient as soldiers was vicious and immoral. If his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney had put that in a more general form, and had merely asked them to agree with him in stating their opinion that it was undesirable to detain men longer in barracks than was necessary to make them efficient and than was required by the nature of our varied service, then he for one would have been ready to agree with him, and one of the objects of short service, as now applied, was to obviate the evils of a lengthened residence in barracks. He thought that his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (General Shute) did not mean to stand by his Amendment, that long residence in barracks was good for the men. There was a general agreement that a system of short service was the best adapted to this country—a system under which men served a certain number of years in the Army and then passed to the Reserve to spend the rest of their service in it. It was, however, difficult to say what one meant by short service, because “short” was a relative term, and what to one man was short to another was long. Hence arose much difference of opinion, and the point about which it existed was what portion of service a man should spend with the colours, and what portion in the Reserve. He had found amongst the best friends of the short-service system very various views on this point, and even his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, who was never without confidence in the opinions which he entertained, at one time thought it would take three years to make an efficient soldier; but now he seemed to think that 18 months would be sufficient. The difficulty was this—that if we retained men only a short time with the colours we should have a large Reserve, but its discipline would be defective; and in this country, where men were somewhat free in their habits, a little longer time might be necessary than in other countries, for although drill might be learned in a few months, it took much longer to acquire those habits of obedience and discipline upon which the efficiency of a soldier depended. On the other hand, if we kept them too long with the colours, we should have either no Reserve or one that would be inadequate. We had, therefore, to discover, from experience, what term of service was most attractive to recruits, gave the best Reserve, and combined the minimum of active service with the maximum of efficiency. He would not attempt to lay down an iron rule on the subject, but perhaps the system we now had would be found to meet the requirements of the case as nearly as possible. We enlisted men for six years’ service in the active Army, and six in the Reserve, but this division of their total term of service was not rigidly adhered to. The Inspector General of Recruiting thus described the present practice in his Report of January, 1874—

Mr. Anderson

“Men enlisted for ‘Short Service’ may, at the expiration of three years’ service in the ranks, with their own free consent, and with the approval of their Commanding Officer, be permitted to pass at once into the 1st Class of the Reserve, and there complete the unexpired portion of their engagement in that force.

“And conversely, those men who have proved themselves to be good and efficient soldiers, or likely to become valuable non-commissioned officers, may, after three years’ Army service, be allowed, with the consent of their Commanding Officers, to continue and complete the unexpired portion of their engagement of 12 years in Army service, and thus become qualified for re-engagement and eventually for pension on the completion of 21 years’ service.

“By the operation of this system those men who have entered the Army, and have found the active duties of a soldier’s life distasteful, or who have seen openings in civil life more congenial to them, who wish to marry young, or who from any other cause are disinclined to go on serving, may, after a comparatively short service in the ranks, be released from their Army engagement, but they will leave their corps trained as soldiers, fit for duty if called upon, and ready to serve their country on the occasion of any emergency.

"On the other hand, those who show an aptitude for a military career may have their wishes gratified, completing their full term of service uninterruptedly. . . ."

It seemed to him that with a voluntary Army like ours, and in a country like ours, where they could not take hold of a man and thrust him into any arm of the service they chose and on any terms they chose, this system was best calculated to make service in the Army palatable and acceptable to the people. These considerations were sufficiently strong in themselves; but when they came to regard the foreign possessions of the country, especially the requirements of India, it was obvious they could not have applied to the whole Army any period of service shorter than six years. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who on this subject could speak with authority, knew very well that whatever extension might be desired in the opposite direction—in increasing the term of service of the men who had to serve in India—no term shorter than six years could be applicable to India. If they had a shorter service, they would be driven to support a local army in India, or to a system such as that advocated by the hon. Member for Hackney. But the system of his hon. Friend, while it had many disadvantages in itself, would be inapplicable to the complicated framework of any Army such as ours. It struck him as singular that in the scheme advocated in the pamphlet of his hon. Friend the service of the whole of our Indian and Colonial Army was to be a long one. The consequence would be that in the Reserve we should have none but home-service men. It certainly did not seem desirable that our Reserve should contain only men who had seen nothing but peaceable service at home, and that they should be destitute of that varied experience which would be acquired in Indian and Colonial service. A great deal had been said about the prospect of getting a better class of men provided the men were not kept so long in barracks. Now he was very desirous to have the best class of men we could in the Service, but he did not mean by this that we should go out of the class from which we at present recruited. If we went into the skilled labour market and competed with the wages of artizans, we should make a signal failure. In the first place, not being able to pay them sufficiently, we should not get the men; and in the second place we should have a smaller number to take our recruits from. Besides, if we drew skilled artizans largely into the Army, the country would be placed at a disadvantage in being robbed, to an unnecessary and wasteful degree, of its mechanical skill. On the other hand, there would always be found a certain number of the artizan class who, from a spirit of enterprize, would join the Army, and from whom our non-commissioned officers would be drawn. The last part of his hon. Friend's Resolution was that, "having regard to the efficient defence of the country, it is inexpedient to maintain two rival paid Forces in the United Kingdom." He did not agree in this with his hon. Friend. His belief was that the degree of competition for recruits between the Militia and the Army was not so great as had been stated, and that it would rapidly diminish. In the first place, a great number of Militia regiments were composed of artizans from the towns, colliers, and people of that class, who were willing to go out with the Militia for a change. He did not know whether there were any officers of the Ayrshire Militia present; but if there were, they would bear him out in saying that in Ayrshire, for example, the Militia was as fine a body as they could wish to see, and composed almost entirely of colliers and weavers, who would earn at their work large wages. These men joined the Militia that they might have an occasional holiday, just as hon. Members went to the Highlands and elsewhere at certain seasons for their pleasure. But those were not men who in any case would enlist in the Army. Then a large number of men passed from the Militia into the Line. The last Return he had seen put it at 5,000. The number was increasing, and a man who went into the Army after a year or two in the Militia was a better man than if we had got him for the Army at first. It must also be remembered that the recruiting both for Line and Militia was now under the charge of the Commanding Officer of the Brigade District, and it was his duty to see that there was no undue conflict between them. He trusted his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney would have the general sympathy of the House, not only with his effort to improve the state of the Army, but also with respect to one or two of those things he had brought before them. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could not, however, accept the terms in which his Resolution was put, and trusted that very few hon. Members would be willing to commit themselves to so rash an opinion.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that some years ago, if a man "went for a soldier," he usually came back the worse for it, but he absolutely denied that this was the case at present. The old-fashioned idea on this subject had a detrimental effect on recruiting for the Army. A soldier, being for many years under strict surveillance, became thoroughly disciplined; he was well fed, his health was cared for, and he was removed from the temptations to crime caused by want. He had a sufficiency provided for him, he associated for the most part with respectable persons, and was kept from social degradation. With the improvements which had been made of late years, and those to be made in future, the position of a soldier would become one to be envied; and he regretted that the advantages of a soldier's life were not better known among the class from whom our Army was recruited. If they were, there would be far less difficulty than at present in getting recruits, though, of course, at a time when the price of labour was rising throughout the country, there must be a difficulty in attracting men to the Service. Numerous civil employments were open to men who had served in the Army. His two brothers had commanded regiments, and he knew that there was a difficulty in preventing good men from purchasing their discharge, because there were so many temptations open to them in civil employments. The railway companies and mercantile firms afforded endless means of employment for soldiers who had behaved well while they were in the Service. These being the real facts, it was greatly to be deplored that an opinion should prevail among the classes from whom the Army was recruited that, when once they put on a red coat, they become a sort of Pariahs, and were shunned by the rest of the world. The truth was that a man had an opportunity of raising himself in the social scale by putting on a red coat and shouldering a rifle.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he should not have intruded himself into this debate but for the interest he felt for India, and he was afraid a great injustice might be done to our position in that country. The situation was this—this country had accepted the principle that they must change the old system of their Army, and instead of maintaining a fixed standing Army, that they must have a short-service Army with large Reserves behind. Looking at the attitude of Continental nations, he had very little doubt that was the right view; but they must remember that in this respect England's position was entirely different from that of Continental States, inasmuch as she had to supply not only her own needs, but also those of India. It seemed to him that this question of short service was drifting in a direction which would be detrimental to the interests of India, and the question of providing troops for India ought to be taken into consideration in discussing the short-service system; for otherwise we might ultimately discover that we had established a system well adapted for home purposes, but not applicable to India. The short-service system was not at present thoroughly settled, and consequently there was considerable difficulty in ascertaining what was the system actually in force in this country. He had ascertained that practically the conditional three years' service regulation was a dead letter. They must, therefore, assume that the ordinary service for which a man enlisted was six years, and he confessed he looked upon six years as an unhappy medium to be fixed upon. It was too long to be called a short service for home, while it was far too short to be of any good as applied to India. He would ask whether they believed that any man who did not wish to make the Army his profession would enlist upon the present condition, when he had before him not only the six years' service, but probably that he would have to take a turn of service in India? It was totally out of the question to talk of giving a short-service system a fair trial with the prospect of serving in India staring the men in the face. Under the 12 years' system of enlistment a soldier, on the average, spent under six years in India; under the six years' system, the average time spent in India would probably be less than three years. They must have two systems—one under which men would be enlisted for short service who did not look to the Army as a profession, but to qualify themselves as soldiers to retire to the Reserve, and then obtain certain pay and advantages as Reserve soldiers, becoming armed citizens, ready to come to the country's call when needed; and the other system that which had hitherto prevailed of inviting men to undertake service in the Army as a profession, and to devote the best period of their lives to it. What he wished particularly to impress upon the Secretary of State was that not only would the Indian Army cost more than it now did under short service, but that it would be infinitely less efficient than it now was. While in India he had seen a good deal of service with troops, and he had been immensely impressed with the difference between seasoned regiments and new regiments. The former were far better and more efficient soldiers, and were also experienced in the ways of the country, knowing how to make themselves comfortable. He feared that under the six years' system there could not be an efficient Army in India. The regiments there would consist of comparatively young and unacclimated men; and this would be a great evil. The Indian Army was not always stationed in the hot plains. Under the present system half the European soldiers were in the hills, in a climate quite as good as our own. What he thought they ought to do was to shorten the period of six years for enlistment for home service, and lengthen the period of enlistment to at least eight or ten years or more for India. Civilians were now required to pass eight years in India before they were entitled to a furlough; and until recently they were required to pass 10 years. The same time would not be too long for soldiers, with the proviso, of course, that any man whose health broke down should be sent home. The Indian Army must be composed of men who made the Army their profession; and he hoped that the Secretary of State for War would speedily settle the question of military service in India.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he should not have objected strongly to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) but for the unfortunate fact that it described the present practice of retaining men in barracks for home service longer than was necessary to make them efficient and thorough soldiers as being "vicious" and "immoral." He objected to these words as casting an undeserved slur upon officers who were Members of that House, and upon soldiers of all ranks who were beyond its walls. The speech in which the hon. Member had brought forward his Motion undoubtedly took the sting out of the words; but, at the same time, he hoped that a vote of the House would not be asked upon a proposal in which they were contained. In the chances of war he believed that the advantages would rest with the soldiers of a free nation; but the difficulty was that a free people could scarcely be induced in times of peace to prepare its Reserves, so as to be ready to take the field when war broke out; and he considered that the hon. Member had done an immense amount of good during the Recess in calling the attention and enlisting the interest of the country in the state of the Army. He might be very well contented with the interesting debate he had raised, and the admirable and valuable speeches that had been made on both sides of the House. The hon. Member in his speech urged the importance of adopting the short service system, and expressed an opinion that, on the whole, it would be advantageous to render still shorter the period of service with the colours and to lengthen the time which men would spend in the Reserve. It was not because men had been 12 or 14 years in the Army that, therefore, they were well disciplined. They began to think of pension about that time, and, therefore became, as it were, bound up with the Army. There was no reason why a man at the end of six years, or even of three, should not be thoroughly well disciplined; and it should be borne in mind that with a three years' service they could secure three times as large a Reserve as under a six years' service. Some time since the Secretary of State for War stated that, practically, we had a three year's service, as a man could, with the leave of his commanding officer, enter the Reserve at the end of three years. He should like to be informed to what extent that was made available, as the result of his inquiries led him to believe that, practically, that three years' rule was a dead letter. One difficulty which stood in the way should not be lost sight of—namely, the drafting of troops to India. The local Army there to a certain extent had failed, and they had tried a substitute of interchangeability between the Home and the Indian Army. A man's service was shortened by this system, but there was a simple solution of the difficulty—namely, that a man should to a great extent be allowed to choose where he would serve. Not that he should be allowed to select, say, between Plymouth and Portsmouth, but that he should be allowed to go to India when he liked and for a certain fixed period. Such men should not be allowed to return home, if the regiments which they joined were coming home, unless they had completed the term which they had agreed to, but should for the residue of that term be required to exchange into another regiment. He trusted that our home military system would not be subordinated to that of India, as the result might prove to be fatal to this country in the event of our Fleet collapsing.

Sir George Campbell

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME said, he considered that the question before the House was of the greatest possible interest to those who, like himself, might be called junior officers. The hon. Member who so ably introduced it (Mr. J. Holms) asked the House to say that the present condition of the British Army was most unsatisfactory; and he attributed the fact to the detention of the men in barracks, and to the vice and immorality which prevailed there. The remedy the hon. Gentleman suggested was short service and the abolition of the Militia. They must all admit that the condition of the Army was unsatisfactory. It could not be satisfactory to see battalions going abroad, having had to fill up their ranks with volunteers. The fact that Her Majesty's regiments of Guards were 100 short of their battalion strength was not satisfactory; neither were the facts that the Army was short of troops, and that recruiting was much below the desired mark. The great question was—Was that state of things to be remedied in the manner suggested by the hon. Member? The proposition put forward by the hon. Member was that the practice of retaining men in barracks longer than was necessary was vicious and immoral. Was it the hon. Member's opinion that if a recruit remained two years in barracks he became vicious and immoral; but that if he left before that time, he would be free from vice and virtuous. The hon. Member ought to be pretty sure of his case before he made an assertion which ought not to have been put forward without the most convincing proofs. Did the hon. Member mean to say that the soldiers of whom the Duke of Cambridge had publicly stated that he would go anywhere, and against any enemy with them, were deteriorated by vice and immorality? It was preposterous to say so. The assertion was sufficiently answered by the statement of the late Chaplain General, who, in his letter to the various Army Chaplains, spoke highly, after 62 years' experience, of the excellent qualities of our soldiers. One great omission in the scheme of the hon. Member for Hackney was that he had not said a word about the non-commissioned officers, who had been justly described as the backbone of the Army. If the men were only to remain two or three years in the Service where were the non-commissioned officers to come from? Even if they remained in the Service, still if the Army was to have nothing but short service men the task of the non-commissioned officers would be harder as time went on, and it would be more difficult to keep the Service in a proper state. From the speech the hon. Gentleman delivered at the meeting of the Social Science Association, it appeared that he had also forgotten another class—the old soldiers. From his experience as a troop officer, he (Captain Milne Home) could say that the old soldiers were the men to be trusted in barracks and in manœuvres, and they rendered valuable service in assisting the non-commissioned officers to teach the younger soldiers their duty. A system of entirely short service would be, therefore, a total mistake. The soldiers, no doubt, liked change. Hon. Members knew that it was the same in domestic service, and that servants would leave them for no reason whatever. In the same way many young men did not like to be bound down for six or ten years. Let them, therefore, combine the two, long service and short, if they pleased, by all means. The last assertion in the hon. Member's Resolution condemned the maintenance of two rival Forces, the Militia and the Line.

The hon. Member considered that to be one of the causes of the unsatisfactory state of the British Army, and suggested that if they abolished the Militia and introduced a Reserve of a somewhat fancy description they would be all right. He (Captain Milne Home) thought, however, they had heard enough that evening to show that the Militia was a most valuable Force, and one which the hon. Members sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House were by no means disposed to give up, because it was a remnant of the ancient feudal system, under which the owners of the soil were bound to protect the land they occupied. He had no wish to intrude any crotchets as to what ought to be done with the Army; but one thing was quite clear, and they would hear more about it when the Estimates came on for discussion—that in order to do away with desertion, and bring the recruits in greater numbers, they must receive not only additional pay, but other advantages. The Government must not give with one hand and take away with the other, but the soldiers must have a sufficiency of good food and something to look forward to—he would not say a pension, but perhaps deferred pay, so that if a soldier remained in the Service a certain number of years, he might have something to look forward to which might set him up in trade or assist him to gain his own living. If that were done, desertion would decrease. The late Government began, to use a popular phrase, at the “wrong end of the stick.” They abolished Purchase, but left their Successors to pay for it; whereas, instead of appropriating £8,000,000 for the officers, they would have done much better if they had begun by improving the condition of the private soldier. For these reasons, he should support the Amendment.

MAJOR BEAUMONT said, that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) laboured under this disadvantage—that it had been introduced before hon. Members knew what was the nature of the scheme of Army reform which the Secretary of State for War was about to introduce. There were, however, many portions of it which would recommend themselves to hon. Members on both sides of the House. He concurred with the hon. Member for Hackney that the condition of the Army was unsatisfactory and its cost extravagant. They had now expended £8,000,000 in getting rid of Purchase, and he thought Parliament stood pledged to go fully into the question of Army reform. To show that the cost of the Army was extravagant, it was unnecessary to do more than point to the fact that it was admitted on all hands that only one-third the amount voted went in the shape of direct pay to the Army, the remaining two-thirds going to pay the non-effective services. He believed our Force was as strong in numbers as was necessary, and that a great economy might be effected by reducing the expenditure on the non-effective services. As to the terms of the Resolution, he would have preferred that it should have spoken of retaining men in barracks longer than was necessary to make them soldiers as being “inexpedient,” instead of “vicious or immoral.” As the Returns showed that 20,640 men were enlisted last year, that there were 24,560 men fined for drunkenness, and that the number of fines were 49,733, either the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) must have under-estimated the number of bad characters in the Army, or else the “admirable regimental discipline carried out in the barracks” which he referred to must have failed to achieve the results he would credit it with. From a common-sense point of view, two systems of recruiting must be antagonistic. The Militia did not readily blend itself with the Army, because the circumstances of the two Forces were very different; we could have efficiency without simplicity of organization, and simplicity was incompatible with recruiting for two services. To make the Militia truly and properly efficient was the true key to Army reform; that led up to the principle of short service, and if we adopted it in its entirety we should have such a number of men passing so rapidly through the Militia that we should soon be unable to obtain them, unless we turned the tide of the Militia recruiting into the ranks of the Regular Army. And why should we not do so? We could not expect a Militiaman to be so efficient as a man who had passed through the ranks; and the noble Lord the late Secretary of State for War (Viscount Cardwell) could find no answer to the argument for making the Militia efficient by passing men through the Army into the Militia. The noble Lord said we could not get men without conscription, but that he (Major Beaumont) denied. Considering the smallness of the pay of a soldier, it was rather surprising that the services of so many men could be obtained. The great question was the sufficiency of the pay we chose to offer. The pay of soldiers was small compared with that of civilians, and we could readily get men if, instead of enlisting them for six years and offering 4*d.* a-day as Reserve pay, we enlisted them for three years' service and £12 a-year Reserve pay for 20 years. That would alter the circumstances of recruiting very materially, and remove any difficulty in the way of getting men; and he protested against the arguments which coupled conscription with short service. A great responsibility rested on any Administration which had to deal with the question of Army reform. The late Government, as far as the officers were concerned, took the Army out of pawn, and enunciated the principle of short service, which he wished had been carried further. The localization measure was a recruiting scheme, and that had been followed by the present Government's mobilization scheme, in which there was nothing either very valuable or much the reverse. It was easy to mobilize men if only you had them. He should be glad to support any scheme which would carry economy and efficiency still further.

Captain Milne Home

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, he fully concurred in the absolute necessity of giving an increase of pay to our soldiers; if it were given many existing difficulties would disappear, and he hoped the proposal shortly to be made would substantially do what was required by offering greater inducements to good men to enlist. He went a long way with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) in what he said with regard to the barrack system. He had always felt the considerable difficulty of locking up 400 or 500 men at 10 o'clock on a summer's night in barracks and, as it were, subjecting them to prison discipline. If they could raise the character of the men enlisted, they might at once be able to economize in various directions, and also do away with a great deal of that strict discipline which commanding officers now felt so painfully necessary. But while he said that he must also say a word on behalf of the class of men who were now enlisted. Even the drunkard, when brought into the Army, under the strict discipline which was imposed on him, did very good service. Though he had been a hard drinker, he became a hard-working man; he was not selfish, and, above all, he was not what soldiers call a lawyer. With regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney, he might, with all diffidence, say—and he hoped the hon. Member would take the remark as it was given, in good part—it was very different from the speeches he had made in the country, and he would gain considerably in the estimation of those who wished him well if, when he made statements on this subject to those who were not acquainted with it, he spoke to them in the same tone he had preserved in that House. The remarks which the hon. Member had made with regard to the Militia had rather a tendency to ruffle the feelings of those who knew what the Militia was, who had served with it, and had great respect for it. The hon. Member spoke of it as a toy in the hands of country gentlemen, and a mere sham. He entirely differed from the hon. Member. He admitted that it was not so efficient as it might be, and it ought to be made more efficient. What was wanted was an Army capable of rapid expansion and contraction, and the Militia was in that respect a most valuable auxiliary to the Army. For the amount of cost we paid for the Militia its services were very efficient indeed, and he should be glad to see more expansion given to it. So far from seeing it extinguished, it was to it we must look in a great measure for the Reserves which we required. He remembered when no fewer than 10 regiments of Militia, acting as Reserves, occupied the forts in the Mediterranean, and were ready to come to their assistance in the Crimea. He hoped, therefore, the Militia would not be forgotten. They had already done good service, and in the future might do still more.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was much obliged to the hon. and gallant Officer who had just spoken for what he had said with reference to the Militia. The Militia was a most constitutional and economical Force, and one which, from ancient usage, recommended itself as a valuable auxiliary to the Regular Army. Everybody who knew the Militia was aware that at least two-thirds of the men were those who would never join the Army, because they had entered merely for the sake of pastime and recreation. There were, however, many Militiamen who did volunteer for the Line, and became some of the best soldiers we had. In the French War they garrisoned our forts, while our troops were in the Peninsula; in 1815, when there was a sudden demand for men, a large number of the Militia volunteered to fill the gaps in the regiments, without whom the battle of Waterloo might not have been won; and in 1855 regiment after regiment went to Malta and Gibraltar. There were several regiments of the Militia at Aldershot in 1859, and they acquitted themselves so well there that an officer who had smelt a deal of powder had declared to him that if he had not known they were Militia he should certainly have taken them for men of the Line. Therefore, as a nursery for the Army he hoped the Militia would never be given up. With regard to the Resolution, he entirely disapproved it. He protested against the action of his hon. Friend with respect to this matter. People at a distance formed the most extraordinary notions of our Army, thinking that it consisted only of a pack of boys good for nothing. Did the hon. Gentleman reflect upon the consequences which might arise from foreign Powers thinking our Army useless? Why, the power of this country was enormous, and we were perfectly competent to maintain our rights. It had been said that there was immorality in barracks. No doubt there was; but, taking a large number of young men of any rank, he asserted that the soldier was just as moral a man as any other of the same class of life. Then his hon. Friend said that the best trained soldiers in Europe were those of Prussia, and that two years' service was sufficient. But what was the use of holding up the Prussian Army to us as a model, when the Prussian military system was founded on conscription, and every one knew that conscription could not be carried out in this country? Besides, it was not the men of two years' service that did the fighting in the late war. They were sent into garrisons, and the first Reserve was called out first, and then the second

Reserve, and these were the men who had gone through their whole training. Then it would hardly be believed that the desertions from the German Army amounted to 100,000 in a year, while those from our own Army were about 4,500. As far as he was concerned, he was not the least afraid to put his trust in the Militia and Volunteers if they were ever called upon to do their duty. The noble Lord the late Secretary of State for War (Viscount Cardwell), when in that House, proposed a certain system, which had been carried out frankly and honourably by the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War, who wished to give it a fair trial. Let us think carefully before we adopted anything, try it thoroughly before we changed it, and if it did not work favourably let us alter it. But it would never do to be chopping and changing. With respect to a painful letter about four or five married men and their wives living in one room he wished to say a word. When the depôt system was proposed by the noble Lord, he said he would insure that at the depôts married men should have separate quarters. He felt sure the right hon. Gentleman would do the same. He could not agree either with the Resolution or the Amendment, and the best thing that could be done would be that both should be withdrawn.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not agree with a good many of the remarks which had been made that evening with respect to the course taken by the hon. Member for Hackney. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman addressed the House to-night in a very different tone from what he had adopted in the country. But he took particular exception to the course followed by the hon. Member in one particular, which seemed to be the very worst kind of precedent, and calculated to bring discussion about the Army altogether into disrepute. The hon. Member called together political parties in two places, and addressed his remarks about the Army, not to the public in general, but to partizans of his own particular views. Such a proceeding as that seemed calculated to reduce questions of vital national importance to the level of mere Party squabbles, and tended to introduce complications and difficulties which it would be far better to avoid. The hon. Member had justified himself on the ground that the Conservatives had made the Militia a Party question, and that they had encouraged it simply for the purpose of securing places for the county families and obtaining for themselves county influence. A more extraordinary charge, or one less justified by the facts, he had never heard in the whole course of his life. He was sorry to say that the course which he thought it just to adopt with respect to Adjutants and others was not in accordance with the wishes of some of his Friends in the Militia; but that was what he thought the right course to make the Militia of use to the country, and he carried it into effect without regard to those feelings to which the hon. Member for Hackney had referred. When the hon. Member spoke of the Militia, he should remember that the same course had been taken by his own Friends, and it had never been made a Party question hitherto. The hon. Member was, he believed, the only man who, addressing himself to a public audience, had said the Army and Militia were made a Party question. He must also take exception to the language used by the hon. Member with respect both to the Army and to the Militia. In the volume published by the hon. Member, no doubt with great deliberation, were these words, which appeared to be utterly un-English—

“We could not find to-day, from all the crowds of men that we could muster in these islands, 50,000 who could be regarded, either as to age or training, equal to the soldiers of Prussia.”

Now, he protested against a statement of that kind. And if the hon. Member, even upon the footing on which he wished to place the Army, would look at the Returns for 1874 he would find that on the 1st of January, 1875, there were in the Army at home 13,906 men under 20 years of age; but that between the ages of 20 and 35 years, there were 59,975 men, or, in round numbers, 60,000. Would the hon. Member venture to assert that out of that 60,000 men we could not find 50,000 between 20 and 35 competent to meet any Army in the world? [Mr. HOLMS: I beg pardon, I said between 20 and 32, the ages in the German Army.] He would give the hon. Member the benefit of the three years, though, from experience, he did not think a difference of three years of age would make the men incompetent to fight. But taking them at 32 years of age, he still believed that 50,000 men would be found, and that only in home battalions. He made these remarks because he wished the question to be thoroughly discussed, and discussed in a manner not calculated either to give offence to the Army at home or to give encouragement to enemies abroad. The hon. Member who had just sat down had spoken in terms much more consonant with his own feelings upon this question. He (Mr. Hardy) was not prepared to say that the Army was in a most unsatisfactory state, nor was he at all disposed to say that the Army was maintained at an extravagant cost. He would not now enter into the special question of the cost, because it would be his duty to address himself to it on any early occasion. Any one asking the House to sanction expenditure for the Army must do so on the understanding that he was asking money for something worth the cost, and if the House was of opinion that what they got for the money was not sufficient, they would, of course, express that opinion by their votes. Hon. Members in all parts of the House had spoken as if some great measure of Army reform and organization were necessary. He would not go into the question of Purchase, because the debate had not turned on that subject, it having only been casually adverted to by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), although he feared that the House would find that promotion and retirement must be purchased at a much more extravagant cost in future than they had been in former days. The hon. and gallant Member said it was their business to turn and twist the material they had got into new shapes. He knew, however, that the Army and the country desired that the Army should have an understanding that they were proceeding on some intelligible basis, which was not to be altered without occasion—which was not to be altered without full notice, and that the conditions upon which they had agreed to serve their country would be observed to the letter, and would not be violated except for purposes of improvement or making such additions to the Army as might be necessary. He had been blamed because he had not hastily and without due consideration made great changes in the Army; but the more he considered what had been done the more he was convinced that it was his duty to give a trial of the fairest and most ample kind to the system set on foot deliberately by Parliament, and on which vast sums of money were being expended; and until that system had been fully tried he was not inclined to change. But in any case the present would be about the most inopportune moment for attempting to make any change in the system, because we had just arrived at the time fixed by his Predecessor for the Reserve to come into full operation. It was true that during the present year the Reserve would not be large, but next year we should probably have as many thousands of men in that force as we had hundreds this year. Could he, therefore, under those circumstances, do anything so absurd and so contrary to common sense as to adopt the revolutionary system advocated by the hon. Member for Hackney, and so throw everything into chaos and confusion just at the very moment when the new system was expected to come into operation? It was clear that for many years there had been a sort of uncertainty in the minds of both officers and men with regard to their position, and he was most anxious to disabuse them of that idea, and to satisfy them that, so far as he was concerned, the conditions which had been made with them would be kept. In the present condition of the Army he admitted that there were certain things which were unsatisfactory, and which, as in all human institutions, could be brought to greater perfection. Indeed, he was far from saying that the Army was in anything like a state of perfection. Still, notwithstanding there had been a diminution of the numbers of men recruited, the force, as a whole, was only 425 below its Establishment on the 1st of February last. He admitted that, with regard to the Guards and the Artillery, things were not in a very satisfactory condition, the Guards being 399, and the Artillery, taking the two branches, nearly 1,100, below their proper numbers. The Cavalry and the Infantry of the Line, however, were engaging supernumeraries, the former being 474 and the latter 928 above their Establishments. The desertions in the Army were about 1,000 fewer than in the year before, and when hon. Members wished to ascertain the proportions of desertion, they should compare the number of desertions, not with the number of recruits, but with that of the whole Army, because it was an error to suppose that desertion occurred among recruits alone. On comparing the desertions of one year with another, the curious fact would be discovered that, whereas the desertions among the class called skilled labourers who had enlisted was 58 per cent, desertion among the unskilled labourers amounted to only 34 per cent. The Chaplain to the Forces (Archdeacon Wright), in commenting upon that fact, explained that difference of 24 per cent between the two classes of deserters by supposing that the former were in the habit of earning wages which were so much above the average that it was impossible that they could be content for any lengthened period with the pay of a soldier, although circumstances had induced them to enter the Force for a time; and it was only by offering them a large money payment and other privileges that they could be got to remain in the Army. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had revived the suggestion that there should be some mode of marking everybody in the Army, both officers and men; and he (Mr. Hardy) thought there was a great deal in that proposal to commend it to the favourable consideration of the House. No man ought to be ashamed of belonging to the British Army, and he did not think any man need be ashamed of a tattoo, or any other mark not of a disgraceful character. He was confident that no one would object to such an expedient as might be absolutely necessary in order to check, not merely desertion here and there, but that abominable kind of desertion by which a man was continually selling his goods, enlisting in other corps, and carrying disaffection and treachery wherever he went. In his opinion, that was an offence that ought to be punished with the utmost severity. He was not disposed to agree with the remark uttered by an hon. and gallant Member that desertion ought to be looked upon as a crime of a not very serious description. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) had spoken of the contrast between good-conduct rewards and the stripes which men received for good conduct, and the number of men who had not received them. But those under two years' service could not receive them, so that the comparison was not unfavourable, especially when it was remembered that these stripes were taken away for slight causes, which would not be considered offences in civil life, and were purely military. He hoped, therefore, the House would not suppose that these 88,000 men who had been mentioned reflected discredit upon the Service. Of course, those offences which had to be dealt with by district or general Courts-martial were of a serious kind, and he wished they could be diminished, as well as the fines for drunkenness. Attempts were being made to find the men pleasant occupations in the evening, and steps were being taken with regard to regimental canteens. They would be very useful, because they would supply the requirements of the men, and in the canteens there would be far more watchfulness over the conduct of the men than there could be in places to which they resorted outside. With respect to height and chest measurements and physical qualities generally, he believed the comparison with former years would be favourable. One morning, without giving any notice, he went to the recruiting establishment in London, having been told by the "man in the street" that he should find men of a very inferior character. He was, therefore, surprised to find men, some of whom were extremely well-dressed, who were of considerable height and development of chest. There were very few whom he should have said were below the mark. They were quick and intelligent, able to spell their names with great rapidity, and to give an account of themselves readily. They were anxious to have their religions recorded, and were evidently aware of the character of the position on which they were about to enter. The Cavalry were a very remarkable class, and there were some whom he should not have expected to see at all. He was struck with the appearance of one young man. The officer in command—one of the most skilful of the recruiting officers—told the man he could hardly be 18, but the recruit replied that he was that age, and could bring his register to prove it. He was perfectly well-dressed, resembling a clerk, and well developed. The recruiting officer enlisted him, and believed he would make a good Cavalry soldier. He (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) mentioned these things to show that we must not allow our prejudices or statements made at random to make us believe that everything was going wrong. As to the complaint that men misrepresented their ages, that could not be prevented by fixing the ages at 20 instead of 18, for a man wanting to enlist would represent himself in such a way as to get enlisted. His attention had been called by the hon. Member for Hackney to the case of a boy of 14 who enlisted in the 14th Hussars. That recruit had been enlisted 10 months without any remonstrance from his father or family; but when the regiment was called upon to go to India, his father represented to the hon. Member for Hackney that the boy was only 14 years and 10 months old. He (Mr. Hardy) inquired who was the medical officer that could have passed a boy of 14 years and 10 months as a man of 18, and he was informed that he was one of the most careful and scrutinizing surgeons in the Army. The fact was, that the boy was of unusual physical development. He was a boy who would make a most capital soldier. All the officers became fond of him, and they were anxious that he should go with them. Having been only 10 months in the Army he could not then go to India. Afterwards, he was carefully examined by a medical man, who was of opinion that he had a constitution which was peculiarly fitted for the climate of India, and he went out. Having found out the boy's age he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) sent word out that if the boy expressed the least wish to come back, he should be returned but intimating that those who made false attestations about their age were liable to be dealt with by the regulations of the Service. A statement made by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) last year had directed his attention to this especial subject. The subject was one which he had considered, and on which he had communicated with eminent Indian medical officers, and it required to be dealt with only after great consideration. The matter was one, however, on which he felt that he ought not to move hastily, because if he did so he thought he should be acting in derogation of the statement he had made that the system which had been inaugurated by his Predecessor should receive a fair trial; and therefore he thought that security ought to be given that men who had served in the ranks should come back to take their places in the Reserve. He could not assent to the idea that the claims of such men should be forgotten, and that they should be treated on their return from such a responsible and dangerous service in a distant country as if they were used-up; on the contrary, he should wish that they might get an adequate return for their services. He did not agree with the hon. Member in his idea that soldiers should serve in India for eight or 12 years, for he thought that if they could get five or six years' service from the English soldier in India that was as much as they could expect from him, and it was far better that he should return from such a trying service before his strength was exhausted and his capacity to serve his country elsewhere greatly lessened or destroyed. He hoped that statement would prove satisfactory to the hon. Member who had raised this question, and that it would show him at least that he (Mr. Hardy) had not failed to give the subject the attention he had promised. As to the allegation of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), he (Mr. Hardy) was not prepared to accept the statement as to the degree of misery which had been occasioned owing to the reliefs from India coming back at the wrong time. He was told the other day that a number of these men were going about, in such weather as then prevailed, without their great coats. In order to ascertain the truth he had made special inquiries at Woolwich, and the report which he received tended to show the inaccuracy of the statements that had been circulated. It was found that the men's clothes had been lined with serge, that means had been taken to render the men more warm and comfortable; and he believed there was no general officer in the service who was more particular than was the officer in command at Woolwich to see that the men were provided with warm coats and clothing appropriate to their necessities. There was another point which had been raised in the discussion by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Brighton (General Shute) as to the Ballot. As to one thing he thought everybody would agree, and that was that the present system of Ballot under the Act of Parliament now in force was one which was wholly inconsistent with the present condition of things, and not in accordance with public opinion. He believed the people of this country would not approve of a system which admitted of a substitute. Besides, a great deal might have to be done before the Ballot could be brought into use, and before you could use the Ballot effectually much would require to be effected. He thought it incumbent that, at a very early period, the Ballot law should be brought into a state more consistent with the circumstances of the times in which they were living, and which would enable them, in cases of emergency, to fill up the Militia, and empower them to furnish that supply which was found to be necessary for the services of the country. There was another point which had been mentioned and to which he wished to advert, and that had reference to the men who returned to the Reserve. It was said that you ought to supply such persons with special appointments in the Civil Service. That had been very much urged by the Press and by public writers of various descriptions, and he really thought that a great deal of this feeling arose from the total ignorance as to the several employments for which such persons would be fitted. With respect to the one Department of the Post Office, he believed that an offer had been made of 2,000 places, but of this number not more than about 200 were taken. In dealing with the case of their military men it struck him very much that those who spoke of them as not fit to come back to their old employments did not scruple to consider that they might be fitted for some other occupation, which seemed rather inconsistent; because if after a few years' cessation of his labours a man was not fitted to support himself by the trade to which he had been brought up, it did seem rather a strange thing to put such a man into a position with the duties of which he was entirely unacquainted. The subject, however, required a great deal of consideration, and he had thought that the time might come when a Committee of that House might very properly give attention to the question, whether there were appointments which would be suitable for such men, and whether if they were offered to them, soldiers would be found ready to take them. He thought it would be right to put the question in such a way that both the soldiers themselves and the public also might really understand what was meant. It was of no use saying that there were 120,000 appointments which were open to soldiers, and to which they could be appointed if they desired it, because if you were to divide this by 10 you might come nearer to the truth. He was quite sure that the country was under a misapprehension as to these special appointments; and it would be unfortunate that these men should think themselves competent for positions for which they had not shown themselves particularly fitted. He was not aware that he had neglected to meet anything that had been said by any hon. Member. He had endeavoured, as far as possible, to notice the questions which had been put forward by hon. Gentlemen, and he now came to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Hackney. The hon. Gentleman seemed pleased with the great and satisfactory results of the meetings which he had addressed in the country, which passed unanimous resolutions in his favour. He feared that those resolutions, practically, were carried because the hon. Gentleman went in the room to address assemblies that were favourable to him, and that the persons composing those meetings did not know very much about the Army, and probably they might have been as ready to vote for the abolition of the Army as to support the hon. Gentleman in the new scheme which he had propounded, and which would go far to disturb the present condition of things. The hon. Member for Hackney said they ought to abolish the Militia in order to strengthen the Army. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), as well as many hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House, had spoken a good, an honest, and a true word on behalf of the Militia, which had been very much depreciated by those who probably did not know much about it. Seeing the constant attacks that were made upon it, he thought it desirable that he should have an independent and unbiased military opinion to assist him in the matter, and he therefore wrote to a gallant officer who had seen a great deal of the Militia—General Herbert, who, although unconnected with it, had had it under his command at Aldershot—and asked him for his independent opinion. General Herbert replied in a letter, which he would not read, but it stated that the marching quality of the force was very remarkable, and that the men were for the time of their training in very excellent order; and then he went on to mention certain regiments, to the number of 10, deserving of high praise. He (Mr. Hardy) would not mention the names of those regiments; but perhaps he might be allowed to refer to that which was under the command of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bedfordshire (Sir Richard Gilpin), which was one of the best in the country. General Herbert also mentioned two regiments, and there were many others, no doubt, which, in a short time—say two months—might stand in the field along with any in the Service. There was the authority of General Herbert, then, that with two months' training and manœuvring, the Militiamen would be ready to stand with their comrades in the field. That was the way in which such a high and unprejudiced authority spoke of a Force which had been so much run down. General Herbert had also taken great pains to inquire into the class of men who took service in the Militia, and he said that he quite disagreed with those who said that those men would enlist for the Regular Army if the Militia did not exist; that some of them might do so, but that the majority were of a different class from those who entered the Line, and would never bear arms either in the Volunteers or the Regulars; and that in the country he knew there were many people who did not object to their sons joining the Militia, but who would not hear of their enlisting in the Army. That quite agreed with what had been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham. No doubt it would be a very desirable thing if every recruit for the Army could be trained for two or three years in the Militia; but, unfortunately, it could not be done. Of course, he would rather have the partially manufactured article to work upon than the raw material; and if they could get men to serve in the Militia for three years and then go into the Army it would be a great gain, for which they might be willing to pay something extra; but it was impracticable. He must be forgiven for saying that it depended more upon the Colonels of the Militia regiments what number of men they could secure for the Army rather than upon anything else. In some regiments the Colonels gave 400 or 500 men to the Army; whereas in others, they could squeeze out but infinitesimal dribbles, not liking to diminish the numbers of their regiments. He could quite understand that Colonels of Militia looked on their regiments with pride, and wished to bring them up nearer and nearer to the standard of the Regular Forces; but he would like them to regard them as if they were the nurseries of soldiers for the Army, and he was sure that the gaps which might thus be created in their corps would be filled up, because it would be shown that the Colonels thoroughly knew their business, were appreciated by the men who served under them, and understood both the Auxiliary Force and the Regular Service to which it was joined. He would not now further detain the House. It would be his lot to address it again next week on the Army Estimates, and on many subjects connected with the Army, which he hoped would improve its position. He trusted that the hon. Member for Hackney would be content with the discussion he had raised, without pressing a Resolution that was not supported by anybody but himself in all particulars. It would be a pity that it should appear, by dividing the House, as if there was any difference between them about an object on which he wished to rely on the help of the hon. Member for Hackney, though disagreeing with him in many particulars, as well as on the help of hon. Gentlemen on his own side.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought they ought to approach the question entirely free from Party spirit. It was not in any way a Party question, and in dealing with it he hoped that defects in the Army, which were of old growth, would soon be removed, and the Service brought into a state of efficiency. He was sure the hon. Member for Hackney did not intend to cast any reflections on the morality of the Army or of its officers. The words to which objections had been raised were merely intended to indicate defects in the military system which were inherent in the mode in which their Army was organized and located, and which necessarily deprived the Army of the class of recruits which were needed for our military efficiency. He also cordially agreed with that hon. Member that as long as they allowed the Militia to compete with the Regular Army for recruits there was a danger that the latter force would be deprived of the men who were so much needed. The past history of their recruiting proved how difficult it was to obtain recruits in sufficient numbers to maintain both Army and Militia up to their establishment, and in spite of all their improvements in the soldier's position, yet the two forces were considerably below their fixed strength. The present difficulties would be greatly increased as soon as the vacancies occasioned by the transfer of the men of short service to the Reserves came into operation. In case of war they must then expect to have their recruiting difficulties greatly increased. In proof thereof, he might refer to the extreme difficulty that had been experienced in raising the Regular Army above the standard of the peace establishment at the time of the Crimean War, and also at the period of the Indian Mutiny, and that difficulty was one well deserving their serious attention. At present the Militia had a great many paper men on its rolls, as was evidenced by the large proportion who absented themselves from training, as also by the numbers of all ranks, including officers, who were wanting to complete, absent with leave, and otherwise inefficient. When they deducted these, and also the men who were liable to be called to join the Army, then the Militia Force dwindled down to a very low condition.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had endorsed the view that in the course of two months' training some regiments of Militia would be fit for active service. He (Mr. Parnell) wished to know if any of those efficient regiments referred to by General Herbert were in Ireland? He believed that, as a matter of fact, many of the men there were thoroughly unfriendly to, and wanting in confidence in, their officers, and otherwise dissatisfied. The year 1798 had been referred to, when English Militia regiments were of so much use to England. If he referred to Irish regiments of the same period, he would find that Lord Cornwallis said they could not be trusted. Could they be trusted to-day? In anything he (Mr. Parnell) had now to say he did not wish to be understood as reflecting in the slightest degree on the good intentions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy).

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Like many other English statesmen who had acted with the best intentions as regarded Ireland, he might be disappointed. He (Mr. Parnell) wished to refer to a reply sent from the War Office to a request from the Catholic Union of Ireland that Roman Catholic soldiers might be allowed to attend mass on certain holidays. The right hon. Gentleman gave a very proper reply, that the commanding officer should afford every facility for the attendance of soldiers at Divine service on the holidays referred to. But what was the result? Owing to ignorance on the part of the commanding officers of the intentions of the Secretary for War, hardly any Militiamen were allowed to attend Divine service on those days. The Rev. Mr. Behan, of the parish of Navan, and chaplain of the Meath Militia, having complained of this, he was met by the excuse that the rules of the service did not permit of such attendance. He (Mr. Parnell) should be sorry to say anything to arouse religious animosities, or make a handle of religion for political purposes; but he thought that Militia regiments consisting of Irish Catholics ought to be allowed by their commanding officers to fulfil their religious duties as their conscience dictated. In the present day, however, no Militia regiment was allowed to do so. Employers in Ireland did not prevent their employés from attending mass on holidays, and why should this permission be denied to Militiamen? As a Protestant he threw out these remarks, in the hope that Irish Catholics in future would be permitted to attend mass on holidays.

MR. J. HOLMS said, that after the speech of the Secretary of State for War, and the debate which had taken place, he was, with the leave of the House, ready to withdraw the Resolution.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.
CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £23,875, Patent Office, &c.

(2.) £23,651, Paymaster General's Office.

(3.) £22,509, Public Record Office.

(4.) £9,600, Public Works Loan Commission, &c.

(5.) £45,911, Registrar General's Office, England.

(6.) £489,635, Stationery and Printing.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, was the printing open to public contract; and, if not, was there any objection to allowing the matter to be open to contract?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, it was difficult to give a full explanation without going into detail. A portion of the Vote was for the printing of the House of Commons, which was under the control of the House and the officers of the House; a portion of it was for public Departments; a portion of it was for Returns ordered to be printed. Some reduction had already been effected, and, as far as he was concerned, no efforts should be spared to reduce the Stationery expenditure by competition when that could be done.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £26,284, Office of Woods, Forests, &c.

(8.) £38,865, Works and Public Buildings Office.

(9.) £24,000, Secret Services.

(10.) £6,225, Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland.

MR. ANDERSON asked, whether the new regulations with regard to the Queen's Plates in England applied to Scotland and Ireland? It had been promised that something should be done to improve the breed of horses. What had been done to carry out that promise?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he was not acquainted with what the new regulations were, but there were only £218 in this Vote to which they could apply. He should, however, be ready to answer the question upon the Report.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,672, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, of the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland."

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, he would move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £3,822, upon the ground that his constituents were very much dissatisfied with the Fishery Board for not making arrangements in reference to fishing on the coast. He thought their branding fees ought to suffice to pay the expenses of the Board, and the reduction he proposed represented the difference between those fees and the total sum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,850, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, of the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland."—(Sir William Cuninghame.)

MR. R. W. DUFF hoped the Committee would not consent to the Amendment. The change was not desired in Scotland. A Royal Commission, some years ago, proposed that the fishery grant should be increased. No attention had been paid to that recommendation, and he thought the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was entirely in the wrong direction. He would suggest that the surplus revenue produced by the brand should be handed over to the Fishery Board, to be expended for the benefit of the fisheries in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission. It was a considerable source of revenue, for upwards of £45,000 surplus money had been paid to the Treasury since its establishment.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, a strong feeling had lately grown up among persons interested in the Scotch fisheries that the Government brand was useless and unnecessary. It was formerly considered to be a guarantee of the quality of the fish, but was no longer so regarded, and the Continental buyers now insisted that the herrings should be subjected to an inspection on delivery there. He, therefore, thought it ought to be understood that in some few years' time the brand should be dispensed with. He saw that large sums of money were paid for cruisers and gunboats for services professedly rendered to the fisheries. He understood that the commanders of those vessels were not called on to interfere, except in cases of risk or danger to life. Instead of rendering the assistance they might they sailed from port to port, and passed the best part of their time in harbour. He hoped the first Lord of the Admiralty would inform the Committee what was the nature of the orders given to the commanders.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he would move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £350, the amount paid to the commanders of cruisers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,322, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, of the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

MR. HUNT said, a complaint was made last year from the North of Scotland that the commander of the Jackall did not set out to assist some fishing-smacks which were a considerable time out at sea, and about the safety of which some apprehensions were entertained; but it appeared that the commander was at the time watching the weather and did not think there was any danger. The duty of the cruisers was to protect the fisheries and keep order on the fishing grounds, and it was not intended that they should act the part of tugs to bring the fishing-boats home. Of course, it was their duty to render assistance in case of danger; but in the instance referred to the captain's conduct was justified by the fact that all the boats came home safely.

MR. PEASE said, that the Government paid £3,000 to £4,000 per annum in this Vote which gave no satisfaction to any one. He hoped the Government would revise the Vote before next year.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, a considerable portion of this money, as much as £3,000, was expended on public works, for the benefit of the fisheries, and for the protection of life. As the majority of the Scotch Members were in favour of the brand, it was not thought right to discontinue it. The charge upon the Exchequer was not more than £3,000, the revenue produced by the brand paying for the cost of the establishment.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that some time ago, as Chairman of a Commission appointed to inquire into the fisheries on the Scotch Coast, he frequently went on board the small cruisers which were engaged in the protection of the fisheries, and he found the commanders were zealous in discharging their duties, and gave great satisfaction to those interested in the fisheries. He believed that complaint was made of them now for the first time, and that it was founded on a misapprehension of the duties which they had to perform. He hoped the reduction would not be pressed.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE asked where was the corresponding Vote for the Irish fisheries? He hoped Scotch Members would support the Irish fisheries as the Irish Members would support them.

MR. BUTT said, as far as he could ascertain, the feelings of the Scotch Members and of the country were in favour of the maintenance of this Board, which was a great advantage to the fishing trade, and especially the herring trade, the expense of which was paid by a small fee for branding. But what he wanted to say was that Ireland had had no such advantage, and the Irish fisheries stood in a very different position. He should, however, vote for this grant, in the hope that a similar Vote would be proposed for Ireland before long.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked in which way the item of £3,000 in aid of piers was expended?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, it was an annual Vote under the Act 5 Geo. IV. sec. 54, and during the last two or three years the money had been expended in improving the harbour of Anstruther.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not understand the remarks of the First Lord of the Admiralty, as the votes specified certain sums paid to the commanders of the cruisers. He inquired what were the instructions given to the commanders of the cruisers? The difficulties which had occurred were due to a want of knowledge by the fishermen what duties the cruisers were expected to perform. He also wished to know what the duties of the Fishery Board were?

MR. ANDERSON said, he must press for information upon the subject.

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he would inquire into the question as to the duties and pay of the naval officers of those cruisers. No complaint had been made to him on the subject except in the case he had mentioned.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, the general opinion was that these cruisers on the East part of the coast should be withdrawn altogether.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(12.) £5,705, Lunacy Commission, Scotland.

MR. RAMSAY said, he would like an explanation. In England, the Commissioners in Lunacy were paid £1,500 a-year each. The three Masters had the same amount paid yearly, not by a Vote of that House, but under the statute by which they were appointed. He would like to know why the two Commissioners in Scotland, who were not in any way inferior to the Commissioners in England, should be paid only £1,000 a-year each?

MR. J. W. BARCLAY objected to the existence of the Lunacy Commission, not because the Commissioners were unfit, but because they had not sufficient duties to perform, and in consequence had shown a desire to magnify their office and create expense. Instead of complaining that the Vote was not larger, he thought it might be dispensed with altogether.

MR. W. H. SMITH, while bearing testimony to the ability with which the Commissioners did their work, declined to enter into the grounds on which the claims for increase of salary had been refused. He deprecated the practice of Members on either side advocating the increase of salaries of public officers.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £6,665, Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

(14.) £82,783, Board of Supervision, Scotland.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

SUPPLY [18th February].

Postponed Resolutions [reported 23rd February] considered.

Resolutions again read, as follow :—

(4.) "That a sum, not exceeding £90,178, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department and Subordinate Offices."

(9.) "That a sum, not exceeding £33,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales."

(10.) "That a sum, not exceeding £22,893, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission."

MR. MACDONALD said, he would move to reduce the item of £7,500 for travelling expenses for Inspectors of Mines by the amount of £500. There ought to be a detailed account of the manner in which the money was expended. He wished to see the Inspectors well paid, but the fact was, they only visited the office of a colliery, and not the mine itself. The fairest way to pay them would be by piece-work.

Amendment proposed to the Fourth Resolution, to leave out "£90,178," and insert "£89,678,"—(Mr. Macdonald),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '£90,178' stand part of the Resolution."

MR. PEASE considered the proposal an illogical one. The hon. Gentleman wished to secure a more efficient inspection, and the way he proposed to effect that was by cutting down the travelling expenses of the Inspectors. These expenses were paid by the Home Office, and in order to prevent any excuse for the Inspectors not travelling they were paid the money out of pocket, and 7s. 6d. per diem for rations. He believed the Inspectors performed their duty in a satisfactory manner, and hoped that the House would not consent to the proposed reduction.

MR. KNOWLES also supported the Vote. The Inspectors did their work thoroughly, and when they visited a mine were always ready to go below on the representation of the men. Their duty would involve the necessity of large travelling and other unavoidable expenses, and he was sorry that any reflection had been cast on them, for they were most energetic and able men, and were, in his opinion, underpaid.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the tendency of the present system of inspection was to increase the expenses. The office with which he was connected had last year issued a Circular for the purpose of securing a more careful inspection, and he hoped the Vote would be agreed to.

MR. BURT said, he did not find any fault with the Inspectors, but considered the travelling expenses too large, and wished to know whether there was any efficient control over the charges which they made?

MR. D. DAVIES objected to any reflection upon Inspectors of Mines, who were a useful body of men.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the travelling expenses of these Inspectors were sent in detail to the Home Office, and examined.

MR. MACDONALD said, with the leave of the House, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

On the Ninth Resolution,

MR. JAMES said, he objected to the recent appointment of the Chief Commissioner, on the ground that he had not had so much experience as the office required, and would move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £2,000.

Amendment proposed to the Ninth Resolution, to leave out "£33,500," and insert "£31,500,"—(Mr. James),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '£33,500' stand part of the Resolution."

MR. ONSLOW was sorry that the hon. Member had thought right to criticize this appointment of the Government; for, on the contrary, he was of opinion that the Government had exercised a wise discretion in appointing Sir

Seymour Fitzgerald to this important post. It was true that Sir Seymour Fitzgerald had not practised long at the Bar; at the same time, when he was first called he went regularly the Northern Circuit, and pursued his occupation as a barrister until a fresh field was opened to him; but what they wanted as Chief Commissioner of Charities was not a profound lawyer, but a man of ability, good sense, and experience, and the right hon. Gentleman had shown in that House, as a Member of a former Government, and in India, that he possessed all those qualities. He hoped that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. MONK, while admitting the talents of the right hon. Gentleman, contended that it was necessary that the Chief Commissioner of Charities should be not only a barrister of 12 years' standing, but one of great and varied experience. No appointment that had been made by Her Majesty's Government had caused such widespread dissatisfaction.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, Sir Seymour Fitzgerald had had considerable experience as a lawyer, and the appointment was a wise one.

MR. MUNDELLA said, there was no desire to attack the character or ability of Sir Seymour Fitzgerald, but the only question was whether the Government had not put a square peg into a round hole. He declared that privately he had heard the appointment much more strongly denounced by Conservative than by Liberal Members, and more than one hon. Member had assured him that it was the greatest mistake the Party had made. He considered it a flagrant abuse of the patronage of the Government.

MR. DISRAELI: Notwithstanding the denunciation of the hon. Gentleman who just sat down, I trust I shall be able to satisfy the House that the appointment of Sir Seymour Fitzgerald was a good one, and certainly made for no consideration but the good of the public service. He is an able and distinguished man; and although it may be said that that had nothing to do with it, I say it had, and that it is of great importance to bring such persons forward occasionally by appointing them to situations which some people out-of-doors think ought to be the monopoly of permanent and close bureaucratic arrangements. He has been a Member of this House for upwards of a quarter of a century, and at the time that the late Lord Derby formed his first Administration filled the important office of Under Secretary of State for India with conspicuous ability. He was afterwards appointed Governor of Bombay, and it was chiefly by his great exertions and zeal that the Abyssinian Expedition was so successful. In point of fact, he is the man fit for the situation to which he is appointed. The Act of Parliament requires that two of the Commissioners shall be barristers of 12 years' standing, and in this case all three of the Commissioners are in that position. In making the present appointment, I considered that it was not so much a question of appointing a man of great legal experience and high legal knowledge as a man of the world, who would not take a contracted or pedantic view of his position. What was required was a man altogether superior to prejudice—a man of that enlightenment which an able man who had been 25 years in the House of Commons could not fail to possess. I accordingly recommended the appointment of Sir Seymour Fitzgerald to Her Majesty as that of an individual who was perfectly competent to discharge the duties of the office, and if my right hon. Friend retains his health, I have not the slightest doubt that he will discharge them to the satisfaction and general benefit of the public.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that at all times it was disgraceful to enter into personal considerations of this kind, but it was more particularly so at a time when they were told that the subject of discussion was seriously unwell. The right hon. Gentleman opposite objected to the remarks which had been made in regard to the appointment; but he had omitted to refer to that which was the real objection taken to the appointment on that—the Liberal—side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Act of Parliament required that two of the Commissioners should be barristers of 12 years' standing, and he had accurately stated that all the three Commissioners possessed that qualification. What was really objected to was that the right hon. Gentleman had appointed a Gentleman who was only technically qualified. He did not deny the ability of Sir Seymour Fitzgerald, and the public services which he had rendered; but he did think there was something in the objection that the right hon. Gentleman was only technically qualified. The real question was, whether Sir Seymour Fitzgerald passed the legal qualifications which the Act contemplated, and which in this particular instance were evidently evaded.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would venture to say that there were many hon. Gentlemen walking the hall at Westminster for 15 years without his (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald's) qualifications. He thought that Sir Seymour Fitzgerald possessed the capacity necessary for the administration of a great public Department; and though he did not say he was the very best man that could have been appointed, yet he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had known of other Governments which had made appointments far less meritorious.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 71: Majority 66.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. O'SULLIVAN thought that, as it was now 1 o'clock, the House ought not to be called on to proceed any further.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. DISRAELI thought that after the decision which had just been announced, and after the House had so strongly expressed its opinion, this was a monstrous proposition. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion.

MR. FAWCETT said, he had no wish to take another discussion upon this particular Resolution, but he thought the consideration of the Report of Supply should not be carried further.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

The Marquess of Hartington

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I adjourn the House. [Laughter.]

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Sir, I beg leave to adjourn the House. [Much laughter.] Then, Sir, I beg to adjourn the debate. I find I am still wrong. I beg leave to move the adjournment of this debate.

MR. DISRAELI: If the House agree to the Motion, the remaining Resolutions on the Report will be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Further Consideration of Postponed Resolutions deferred till Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolutions [February 24] reported, and agreed to.

Bill on the First Three Resolutions ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bill on the Fourth Resolution ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bills presented, and read the first time.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS ELECTIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CALLAN, Bill to provide for the Election of Poor Law Guardians by Ballot in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CALLAN, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Mr. MAURICE BROOKS, and Mr. DOWNING.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 88.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 28th February, 1876.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Ordered that the Viscount Eversley do take the chair in all Committees upon Private Bills in the absence of the Lord Redesdale from illness, unless where it shall have been otherwise directed by this House.

MALAY PENINSULA.

OBSERVATIONS. ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the state of things in the Malay Peninsula and to move for Papers, said: My Lords, I shall commence by stating that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has suggested to me to wait for a despatch which he expects from Sir William Jervois; but as that despatch can have little reference to the greater part of what I desire to place before your Lordships, or to the Questions that require an answer from Her Majesty's Government, and as reports continue to arrive of the plunder and burning of villages by the officials of the Straits Settlements, it appears necessary to call your Lordships' attention without delay to the state of things in the Malay Peninsula. It might have been expected that the noble Earl the Colonial Secretary would have laid Papers on the Table at the commencement of the Session—since these affairs were more important than those of the Gambia. A paragraph in the Speech from the Throne refers to the military operations and loss of valuable lives in that country; and it is a matter of satisfaction to find an expression of regret for the loss of those lives, for which loss the Secretary of State for the Colonies is primarily responsible—as also for the bloodshed, injustice, and expenditure which have occurred, and which may follow later. The same paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech says that the military operations have re-established the just authority of this country. I hope to show to your Lordships that some of those operations and losses of life have happened in countries where there is not even a semblance of just authority on the part of England. Her Majesty's Government will perhaps inform your Lordships whether all the military operations in Perak and also in Sunghi Ujong, which is more than 100 miles away from Perak, and which had nothing to do with Mr. Birch's death, were undertaken by their instructions or at the discretion of the Colonial Governor? The Correspondence relating to the affairs of the Malay Peninsula shows that the Duke of Buckingham on the 22nd of April, 1858, Earl Granville on the 10th of September, 1869, and the Earl of Kimberley on the 26th of August, 1871, all warned the Governors of Singapore that they were not to enter into formal negotiations with Malay Princes, nor to extend the responsibilities of Her Majesty's Government without specific instructions. It becomes, therefore, equally unaccountable either that Sir Andrew Clarke should have appointed Residents, and that Sir William Jervois should have assumed the Government of Perak by officials of his own without instructions, or, on the other hand, that the noble Earl the Secretary of State should have reversed the policy laid down by his Predecessors, and by the Indian Government, without either informing Parliament of his intentions, or taking proper precautions to carry out his measures without the loss of valuable lives. I must ask your Lordships to go back a little to the causes of the recent events. The Secretary of State on a former occasion (May 19, 1874) informed your Lordships that the pirates in the tin mines of Larut had rendered British intervention necessary—but a dispatch of Sir Henry Ord of July 24, 1873 (No. 13 of the Blue Book), re-establishes the truth that the Chinese disturbers of the peace of Larut all proceeded from Singapore and Penang, and drew supplies and munitions from Penang without restriction. A despatch of the Earl of Kimberley of December 22, 1873, to Sir Andrew Clarke, says—

“I feel the same difficulty as Sir Henry Ord in understanding how these factions can have been supplied from Penang with junks, boats, arms, ammunition, and provisions, unknown to the authorities of that settlement. Such a state of things must not be allowed to continue, and I request that you will impress upon the Lieutenant Governor that I expect the utmost vigilance to be exercised to prevent Penang from being used as the base of operations for carrying on an armed conflict within a neighbouring friendly State.

This is sufficient to prove to your Lordships that it was from what Sir Henry Ord names, “want of due vigilance.” That the pirates mentioned by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon), and who have been the pretext for Sir Andrew Clarke's intervention in January, 1874, originated in Penang and not in the Malay Peninsula. I must now refer to No. 14 of the Blue Book: a despatch of the Earl of Kimberley of September 20, 1873, to Sir Andrew Clarke, which desires him to report on the condition of affairs in each State, on the measures he would recommend, and on the advisability of appointing a British officer to reside in any of the States; this despatch concludes—

"Such an appointment could of course only be made with the full consent of the Native Government, and the expenses connected with it would have to be defrayed by the Government of the Straits Settlements."

Well, instead of reporting as he was instructed to do, Sir Andrew Clarke, mero motu, makes an engagement with one of the claimants to the Throne of Perak, and with certain Chiefs, which was made reluctantly, for the appointment of Residents in Perak and Larut, at a cost of £2,000 each, to be a first charge on the revenues of Perak, although in his despatch of January 26, 1874, No. 39, he says—"This charge would be gladly borne by the Straits' Government." In this despatch, Paragraph 39, and in another of the same date, No. 40, he admits that he has exceeded his instructions. These despatches were answered by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) on the 6th of March, 1874, No. 43, and the hesitating language of this despatch contrasted with the decided language of the noble Earl's Predecessors. This despatch said—

"As far as your explanations enable me to judge, I am disposed to hope, that without unduly compromising Her Majesty's Government in the internal affairs of these States, your proceedings may have the effect of allaying disorders and promoting peaceful trade. I have formed no opinion as to the salaries which should be received by the Resident and Assistant Resident, if Her Majesty's Government should determine to sanction these appointments."

In this despatch the noble Earl feared that a resident might perhaps compromise Her Majesty's Government, does he now not fear annexation? The next document in the Blue Book is an address to the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) from the Straits Association. This probably accounts for the noble Earl having departed from the instructions given by his Predecessor (the Earl of Kimberley), and saddling Perak with £4,000 a-year for remedying the effects of the want of due vigilance on the part of the Penang Government. I will now ask leave to remind your Lordships of what took place in this House when I called your Lordships' attention on the 19th May, 1874, to the arrangements made by Sir Andrew Clarke. I pointed out then that these arrangements must lead to the conquest of Perak, and that the Straits Press was asking for the conquest of the whole Malay Peninsula, and entreated Her Majesty's Government not to sanction these arrangements, and in any case to appoint respectable men, and not to allow these officers to be called Residents, a designation, which was associated with ideas of conquest, and acquisition of territory. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) declined to make any reply, such as might have discountenanced all desire for conquest, neither did he allow your Lordships and the country to know what was being prepared underhand and in secret. But he told your Lordships that the Malay Peninsula was "the fairest portion of the earth." He again used the same expression, and said the Fiji Islands were the fairest portion of the earth, when he invited your Lordships to consider the acquisition of those Islands. Doubtless in that midnight complaint poured into the ears of Jezabel, Ahab also described Naboth's vineyard as "the fairest portion of the earth;" and the tactics adopted in the case of Naboth's vineyard have been adopted in the case of the Malay Peninsula also; for as men of Belial were set up to bear false witness against Naboth, so also men in Singapore and elsewhere have set themselves up to bear false witness against the Malays, and to accuse them of being pirates. I need not trouble your Lordships with proof that the accusation of piracy made against these States of the Malay Peninsula is unfounded; that matter has been amply and satisfactorily disposed of by a letter from Sir Benson Maxwell, well known to be a person of weight and experience in those countries, published in The Morning Post of Tuesday, the 15th of February. I have also here the letter of a Mr. Bain, who navigated in the Straits of Malacca for 11 years, between the years 1847 and 1864, and he never heard of any piracy, nor saw there any suspicious craft; and I have a letter from a lawyer in Penang showing that the so-called Chinese piracy of Larut originated in Penang. The noble Earl will remember that I repeatedly, both in the House and out of it, pointed out to him the nature and character of the officials proposed to be appointed as Residents, and that such appointments must lead to a disaster. It has been pointed out by others in the following passage in a letter to The Times, in the Blue Book (No. 44), which was sent to the Colonial Office by the Straits Association:—

Lord Stanley of Alderley

"The success of Sir Andrew Clarke's experiment, however, will depend materially on the personal character of the Resident who is to represent British power and to exercise British influence. If he is liked and respected by the Malays, he will lead them easily, as the Brookes have done in Borneo. But to be liked and respected he must understand them, their language, character, and habits; he must be patient, cool, and firm, and he must be sober, truthful, and incorruptible."

It is easy to see that this portrait is drawn from life of what a Resident should or should not be. If the noble Earl the Secretary of State should dissent from my assertion that unfit men were appointed as Residents, I shall be obliged to ask him to lay before your Lordships the late Mr. Aitchison's letter, and the correspondence on the subject between the noble Earl and myself at the end of 1874 and beginning of 1875. The noble Earl will, however, hardly attempt to deny it, or else how could he account for not having confirmed these appointments made by the Straits authorities? When Sir Andrew Clarke proposed an arrangement to the Chiefs of Perak in January, 1874, he established Raja Abdullah as Sultan of Perak, instead of Raja Ismail, who had been elected Sultan three years before, and who had been recognized as Sultan by former authorities of the Straits, and by the greater part of the country. He did this, notwithstanding that he knew that Raja Abdullah was addicted to opium, and from passages in Mr. Irving's Report, it is pretty clear that he was selected because it was hoped that he would be a more pliable puppet in the hands of the Straits Government. It was alleged later by Sir William Jervois that the Residents did not succeed in the objects for which they were appointed, though Captain Speedy appears to have done a great deal at Larut, at least by his own account. Now, I would ask the noble Earl whether he gave these Residents any instructions as to the performance of their duties, or whether he left them to find them out by the light of nature? I have been lately reminded that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, when addressing some students at Ad-discombe before they proceeded to India, told them that they would each represent this country in India—that no civil officer there can have any private life. Did the noble Earl address any such advice to his Residents. I would say a few words about these Residents. Captain Speedy was under more favourable circumstances than any of the others, for he had few besides Chinese to administer, and he came to Larut not as a nominee of the Straits Government, but as one who had entered the service of the Mantri of Larut. These Residents it was supposed were to inculcate lessons of order and economy in finance, but the Resident in Larut at once erects a residency worthy of a colonial Governor. The Penang Gazette speaks of its "noble proportions" and centre room 70 feet in length. He then provides himself with a bodyguard of Chinese, dressed in blue satin tunics and red circular hats, and he appears to have no fewer than 17 elephants at his disposal for a picnic for his Penang friends. In his Report he invariably speaks as though he were the Ruler of the country, instead of the adviser of the Ruler. He mentions having circulated the copper coin of the Straits, and having forbidden the coin of the country to be received in the Larut Treasury. As a natural consequence the coin of the country fell into disuse; and he says that, owing to the scarcity of copper coin, only 97 cents instead of 100 can be obtained for the dollar in the Larut bazaars. He then reports that he established a Court in which, as nearly as possible, he always follows the Indian Penal Code. Now, the late Mr. Iltudus Pritchard, in commenting on that Code, says that its authors appear to have thought that he who invented a new crime conferred a benefit on the human race. Mr. Speedy did not, however, usually administer this complicated code himself; it was administered by a late clerk in some trading firm in the Straits. During the year 1874, 770 persons were tried by this Court. Now, though Larut has been represented as full of truculent pirates, there was only one trial for attempt to murder; 186 were tried for assaults, 97 for unlawful assembly, an offence more consistent with a department in a state of siege under a French Prefect, than with a Malay State and a British Resident; and 11 were tried for breach of conservancy: I do not know what offence that is, unless it be the new crime Mr. Pritchard said the authors of the code wished to invent. Of the administration of the Perak Residency

I will say nothing on account of its unfortunate termination ; but as something has been said of it in the newspapers, I shall be glad to hear any defence of it from the noble Earl. Then a Mr. Davidson was appointed Resident in Salangore ; it was known that he had advanced large sums to Tunku Dhya Uddin, and this was an obvious objection to his appointment, yet Sir Andrew Clarke excuses this appointment by stating that he had transferred his claims to Messrs. Guthrie—a transfer which, on the evidence of the Blue Book, is palpably colourable. No reply of the noble Earl to this dispatch of Sir Andrew Clarke appears in the Correspondence. Sir William Jervois then by proclamation, and acting without instructions from home, as he stated to his Legislative Council, altered the arrangement made by Sir Andrew Clarke, and vested the government of Perak in his own officers. He professed to do this on the authority of Sultan Abdullah, the man whom the Straits Government had set up instead of the Sultan who had been reigning for three years. A man whom Sir William Jervois knew to be incapacitated by opium, and who, even had he been the lawful ruler of Perak could have no authority or power to transfer the allegiance of his subjects to foreigners. This usurpation by Sir William Jervois, carried out so indiscreetly by Mr. Birch, would perhaps be sufficient to account for the attack on that officer. The speech of Her Majesty mentions representations to the Chinese Government, and an inquiry into the lamentable outrage in Yunnan. Why was no similar inquiry made into the circumstance of Mr. Birch's death ? Was it because China was stronger than this Malay State ? Will the noble Earl the Secretary of State say whether or not Mr. Birch had caused one or more Malay Chiefs to be flogged, whether he had or had not burned down people's houses, as reported by a Times Correspondent, and done acts which were tyrannical in one who was not a Ruler, but only an adviser of the Ruler ? If the consent of Raja Abdullah to Sir William Jervois's assumption of the Government of Perak gives a semblance of authority to the Straits Government in Perak, that cannot be alleged in another country where no such transfer of the ruling power took place. Yet Sir William Jervois, when he had obtained troops, invaded Sunghi Ujong, a country separated from Perak by the State of Salangore. As Sunghi Ujong is not in all the maps, the case will be better understood by comparing the Malay Peninsula to Italy. Perak corresponds to Tuscany, Salangore to the States of the Church, Malacca and Johore to Naples, and Sunghi Ujong would correspond to Benevento or some place in the Kingdom of Naples, in the interior, on the southern slopes of the Appenines—so that it is separated from Perak by Salangore, or the States of the Church. A battle was fought in Sunghi Ujong, in which eight of Her Majesty's troops were killed. So little was it believed in this country that a general invasion of the Malay Peninsula was being carried on that The Times fell into natural mistake of describing this action as having occurred in Perak. It will be remembered that it has been alleged that the intervention in the Malay Peninsula was dictated by a desire for civilization and the welfare of the Malays. Here is one of the results of Sir Andrew Clarke's policy as described by The Straits Times—

Lord Stanley of Alderley

"Great dissatisfaction has been expressed amongst the troops at the disposal of the money derived from the sale of the cattle captured in Sri Menanti by the troops. They were afterwards sold by public auction in Sunghi Ujong, and although only realizing a wretched average of 7 dollars a-piece, the total sum amounted to nearly 1,500 dollars, and this sum has been placed to the credit of the Sunghi Ujong treasury, to cover part of the expense of the expedition."

I prefer not to use any words of my own to describe the acts of the Straits authorities and their troops in Sunghi Ujong, lest some should think them excessive and others inadequate. I will therefore place before your Lordships the comments of two of the principal newspapers of Singapore. The Straits Times of January 8 says—

"We must confess that in reading our special correspondent's description of the march of Colonel Clay's column in Sunghi Ujong . . . . it rather jars on one's feelings to read that Captain de Fontaine and his Arabs brought up the rear with orders to burn and destroy everything as they advanced, which order they carried out in the most emphatic manner."

The Straits Observer, of January 4, says—

"We do not know what our French, German, or American fellow-colonists may think, but Englishmen must feel very small when they read in yesterday's Straits Times the accounts so unctuously given of the proceedings of the British force now operating in Sunghu Ujong. Mind, we have invaded the country without cause. We have not a murdered officer to avenge, as in Perak, nor have we any treaty, convention, pact, or agreement of any kind to justify our placing our foot on their soil against the inhabitants' wish, nor have these people done more than defend their country against invaders, who will assuredly rue the day they did so as soon as the news reaches England."

When the Colonial Press expresses itself in this manner, it fully exonerates me from any charge of precipitation in calling the attention of the House to such proceedings, and to the way in which they have imperilled the fair fame of England. Your Lordships will have observed that a force of Arabs are mentioned, who made a blackened line through what has been called the "fairest portion of the earth." I believe these men were collected from various nationalities: certainly no Arab among them would be received by his respectable fellow-countrymen. Their leader is a Canadian Frenchman, with traditions of Huron and Iroquois warfare. Should not this remind the noble Earl of Lord Chatham's protest against such warfare and such allies? A little before this time a notification was made by the Colonial Office that no measures were to be taken for the annexation of any part of the Malay Peninsula. This order from the Colonial Office does not appear to have had any effect, or to have been attended to. Is it possible that when this telegraphic order was sent out the telegraphic cable did not work, for at one time an interruption took place? But how is it that although the murderer of Mr. Birch has been reported to have been killed operations are still continued and more villages are burned? Is it intended to drive out all the Malays from Perak to make way for Chinese immigrants? Does the Colonial Office propose to establish a Chinese colony in Perak, and has it counted the cost of maintaining troops in Perak, without which the Chinese faction fights will continue? The Malay population was formerly looked to as a counterpoise against the enormous Chinese immigration into the Straits Settlements. The Malays never gave us any trouble. That element of safety is now removed, and the strength of the Chinese will be greatly increased. Then there is the incident of the burning by a young Civil officer of the house and property of a Chinaman, who had given information about Mr. Birch, but had not saved his life. Can the noble Earl say whether he has inquired who was the perpetrator of that disgraceful act, and how he has dealt with an official capable of such conduct; and will he inform the House whether he has yet ordered compensation to the Chinaman for the loss of his property? Will the noble Earl inform your Lordships how much his policy has already cost the country in lives and expenditure, and whether as many lives have not been lost as in the Ashantee Expedition? How many officers and men have died of jungle fever or cholera besides those that have been reported? To conclude, will Her Majesty's Government justify the bloodshed which has taken place, and state whether they or the officials in the Straits are directing the measures which have involved this country in a course for which it was entirely unprepared, of invasion and conquest. I would suggest that the best way out of these embarrassments would be to re-instate Sultan Ismail, the de jure, and till Sir Andrew Clarke's intervention the de facto Ruler of Perak. To convert the Residents into Consuls, respectable men depending on the Foreign Office, like Her Majesty's Consul in Siam, or under the Indian Office, if the Foreign Office will not have them, and to purge the administration of the Straits. On a former occasion I pointed out the disorganized state of the Government of the Straits Settlements as a reason for not undertaking further responsibility in the Malay Peninsula. Since that time there has been little improvement, and at this time the number of "unconfirmed" officials and acting appointments, are the subject of general complaint in the Straits, and in the Colonial Press. I then mentioned that the system of "virements" or transfer of unexpended balances, as the noble Earl then named it, or of spending money for a purpose different from that for which it had been voted had become general in the Straits Government; I should fear that this bad example has affected the noble Earl himself, since he has eked out the resources of the Fiji revenue by transferring an unexpended Judge of Penang to Fiji. I gather from the newspapers that out of four Judges belonging to the Straits, only one is at his post. Perhaps the noble Earl follows the maxim, "Inter Arma silent leges." But the non-official members of the Legislative Council at Singapore do not agree with it, and gave to the Governor this protest for transmission to the Secretary of State.

"Legislative Council, Singapore,

"Oct. 29th, 1875.

"We, the undersigned, non-officials members of the Legislative Council in the Straits Settlements, respectfully protest against the decision of the right hon. the Secretary of State, as conveyed by a despatch, dated 5th August last, to charge the Colony with the half salary of the Judge of Penang during his absence connected with, or whilst engaged in, the duties of Acting Chief Justice of Fiji. And we furthermore protest against any portion of his salary, whilst so employed, being charged to the revenues of this Colony; because, if it is considered that, without injury to the interest of Penang, one of its Judges may be granted an extension of leave for the purpose of undertaking a special service in no way connected with the Straits Settlements, it is only just and fair that the Colony should be relieved of all expense connected therewith, because it is alienating the revenue for Imperial or other purposes with which this Colony has nothing whatever to do, and establishing a precedent prejudicial to its interests.

"(Signed)

"H. A. K. WHAMPOA, J. SHELFORD,
THOMAS SCOTT, R. LITTLE, R. B.
READ.

"Singapore, 29th Oct., 1875."

Last Saturday's newspapers announced that Mr. Whampoa had received a decoration of St. George and St. Michael, at the noble Earl's recommendation. Perhaps the noble Earl will inform your Lordships why he has not also rewarded the other four sturdy and independent defenders of financial order, especially Mr. Read, who has long enjoyed the esteem of his fellow-colonists.

Moved That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for further Correspondence respecting the Malay Peninsula.—(Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, their Lordships would hardly expect him to follow step by step the extremely discursive, not to say rambling, statement of the noble Lord. Two hours, he thought, would scarcely suffice to follow the noble Lord in the multitudinous points he had brought before their Lordships, if anything like a clear explanation was to be given on those points. There were, however, some points on which he felt bound at once to state the facts—and this not because Her Majesty's Government were attacked, but because the charges brought forward by the noble Lord bore unfairly and unjustly against persons who were absent from this country. He must protest against the course taken by the noble Lord. When the noble Lord mentioned to him his intention to bring this question under the notice of Parliament, he told the noble Lord that the Government had every desire that it should be brought before Parliament; but that the Papers were not yet complete, owing to one despatch, which Sir William Jervois considered essential to a thorough understanding of the case, not yet being among them, and the Government thought that in justice to all parties concerned the case ought not to be presented to the Legislature till the Papers were complete. Notwithstanding that, the noble Lord had thought fit to proceed in a business which it was absolutely impossible rightly to understand without the Papers. The noble Lord had spared no one in his sweeping censure—he had used very strong language indeed as against Her Majesty's Government and as against other persons concerned in the late transactions in Malaya, including by implication the noble Earl the late Secretary for the Colonies; but the noble Lord had intimated that since the present Colonial Secretary received the Seals of office there had been a great change in the policy of the Colonial Office as regarded the Malay Peninsula. It would have been well if the noble Lord had given any kind of proof in support of that assertion; but not one tittle of evidence had he brought forward to support his statements. No doubt, from the first the noble Lord had been an universal and indiscriminate prophet of evil. When he (the Earl of Carnarvon) came into office he stated in a despatch that he did not feel it necessary to make any change in that policy, but approved the provisional appointment of the Residents. He thought the circumstances which had subsequently occurred showed he had acted with caution. The Papers, which he hoped to lay on the Table before many days had elapsed, would show how the case with respect to those

Lord Stanley of Alderley

Residents really stood, and when the noble Lord had read them he would be likely to find good reason why he should modify the opinion he had expressed that evening. If the noble Lord's speech had been simply an attack upon Her Majesty's Government he should have left it unanswered—at least, until the Papers had been laid upon the Table; but the noble Lord went further, and imputed blame of the severest kind to the officers who were employed in the suppression of the disturbances—persons who had done no more than their duty, and had done it, he believed, with great moderation and forbearance. He could not justify himself if he were to sit in that House and hear the statements of the noble Lord with reference to those officers and allow them to go uncontradicted. A very wise and wholesome rule prevailed in their Lordships' House that when any Member of it intended to bring a charge against the conduct of another Member he should give notice of that intention to the person concerned.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY was understood to say that he had not brought charges against the personal character of the officers.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the noble Lord, in the remarks he had made, had put forth to the whole world that our officers had sanctioned a system of violence, cruelty, and devastation which if true would have been highly censurable. If such charges were to be brought against any Member of their Lordships' House, the rule to which he had referred required that notice should be given him beforehand. If that was only fair in the case of men who could attend in their places and on the instant reply to the charges made against them, how much stronger was the necessity for notice in the case of officers serving at distant stations? But though notice had not been given to those officers, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) happened to have at hand some documents from which he could quote extracts to meet the charges of violence, cruelty, and devastation so lavishly scattered by the noble Lord. In the Papers which he would lay before their Lordships within a week or two were passages from Instructions written by Sir William Jervois and by the principal officers engaged in the operations to which he now begged to call the attention of their Lordships. On the 22nd of November Sir William Jervois wrote—

"There is, however, one broad principle which I should desire to guide you as far as possible, and which I wish you to impress, not only upon the officers in command of the forces, but upon the officers commanding any expedition—viz., to avoid, as far as possible, the punishment of the innocent along with those engaged in armed resistance to the Government of Perak. I am aware that under present circumstances it is difficult to discriminate; but, so far as possible, with a due regard to the safety of our own forces, I desire that all places shall be treated as friendly until there is evidence to the contrary, and that punishment shall, as far as possible, be confined to places where resistance is made."

On the 7th of December Major General Colborne, commanding, issued these Instructions—

"The Major-General commanding desires that in camp and on the march all officers will give particular attention to the prevention of the appropriation of property of any kind except by order and by regular payment. The setting fire to or destruction of property, except under orders from competent authority, is strictly forbidden. It is important that all natives of the country and others (with the exception of those in arms and opposing the advance of the troops) are to be held as friendly, and to be treated with consideration, and encouraged to bring in supplies for the use of the troops."

General Ross, the next in command wrote—

"Captain Young moved his party in a similar manner up the right bank to a village of the same name. His orders were to collect any arms, but not to destroy or injure houses or property, as the inhabitants have been well disposed."

From the next extract he had to read it would be seen that General Colborne felt it necessary to order fire to be opened and loss to be inflicted on a particular place; but he expressed a regret for having to do so, and alleged that it was necessary. He wrote—

"I have instructed Major Amiel to open fire on this place, and to inflict such loss as he may be able to; also to land and destroy houses and property in the vicinity. Much as this necessity may be regretted, I see no other means of endeavouring at once to stop the commencement of a practice which, if allowed to extend, might be followed up by disastrous results. A detachment of 50 men, 3rd Buffs, and 50 Goorkhas arrived here yesterday under command of Colonel Storey. It is my intention to desire Brigadier-General Ross, C.B., to send an additional 100 men of the 3rd Buffs to Blanja, so that I may be enabled to send a detachment to occupy Bhota or the neighbourhood."

He (the Earl of Carnarvon) thought it would be found that every one of the officers, whether superior or subordinate, constantly followed out the line of general instructions laid down by Sir William Jervois and the General in command—namely, to avoid destruction of property whenever it was possible to so. So far as he could see, there had been no wanton destruction of property, and certainly no wanton destruction of life, on our part. He could see no traces of anything which justly deserved the name of excess. It was impossible that war could be conducted without many things occurring, which everybody ought to regret; but when the officers engaged in the Malay operations were found laying down instructions which strictly forbade destruction of property, and enforcing respect towards the lives and possessions of the well-disposed Natives, he thought it hard, cruel, and monstrous that any Member of their Lordships' House should make such charges against those officers as the noble Lord had brought forward on no better foundation than scraps from the local papers. He should not go into the whole of the transactions; but their Lordships would remember that the disturbances arose with the murder of Mr. Birch, who was at the time acting as Resident. Troops were sent to the spot, and the disturbances in Perak were being brought to an end, when, in consequence of a fight between two Chinese factions, it became necessary to order two detachments of troops to interfere for the purpose of restoring peace. At the time of these occurrences, a further disturbance arose on the frontier. A pass was seized and stockaded, and at that pass a concentration of Malays was effected. No doubt that was a most serious moment. Had the authorities shown any vacillation or irresolution, the disturbances might have extended so widely that they would have become a general war. Our troops were re-inforced, and the stockade was carried in a most gallant manner. It was found that the chiefs of the villages were in the stockade at the time the successful attack was made upon it. Until the Papers had been laid upon the Table of the House it would be impossible satisfactorily to discuss the policy of our action in the Malay Peninsula either past or future; but he felt bound to say that he had no doubt whatever that the course which had been taken by us in that Peninsula during the last few months had been the means of saving this country from one of those little, but costly, wars with which we were too familiar. Had the Government hesitated or vacillated instead of acting as they had done with vigour and energy, the war would have spread from one end of the Peninsula to the other. The murder of Mr. Birch had taken the Government by surprise, and it had been followed immediately by a considerable local disturbance which, for the moment, placed our people there in a most critical position. There were but few troops on the spot, and, to increase the difficulty, the telegraphic communication at this important moment was imperfect. Fortunately, however, troops were obtained from Hongkong and from India, and in the course of a very few weeks 3,000 men were collected there; and it was to that rapid concentration of our troops at the point of danger that our final success was due. Had the number of men brought together been fewer, or had they been assembled more slowly, the consequences might have been most disastrous. The noble Lord had found no word of praise for the military and naval officers and men who had taken part in the Expedition; but in his (the Earl of Carnarvon's) judgment both the sailors and the soldiers who were engaged in it on this occasion, as they always did, had shown the greatest gallantry, they had performed the most arduous duties, and had surmounted the most formidable difficulties; and, in short, both services had shown those qualities which always distinguished them, and upon which the country could invariably rely with the most absolute certainty. It was not for him to claim credit for Her Majesty's Government in this matter; but he might venture to express his opinion that they deserved some amount of credit for the fact that they were alive to the danger and that they concentrated their forces in time. It was not so very long ago, while India was under the control of the East India Company, whose Government the noble Lord looked back upon with so much regret, that a similar disturbance occurred in the same part of the country. It being met in a somewhat feeble and vacillating manner, our troops were routed and two of our guns were taken. It being necessary that the ignominy we had sustained should be wiped out, more energetic steps were ultimately taken; but it was only after a 12 months' severe fighting that the campaign was brought to a satisfactory conclusion. If any further proof were required of the fatal effect which delay and vacillation in the conduct of such a war entailed, we had only to look at the result of Dutch operations in Sumatra, where for the last two years that nation, in the same country, against the same race, and under almost the same conditions, had been wasting life and treasure unsuccessfully, just because they could not make up their minds in the first instance to send out a force of sufficient strength to accomplish their object. He must further point out that, much as he regretted the necessity for sending out this Expedition, it had in one respect been eminently useful; because not only had we succeeded in bringing three of the murderers of Mr. Birch to trial, but indirectly we had shown such nations as Burmah and China that English justice would pursue its object under all difficulties, and had given them to understand how great a Power we were in the East. In conclusion, he asserted that while our military measures had been well and efficiently carried out, the greatest moderation and forbearance had been exhibited; and he expressed a strong hope that before any long time had elapsed all enmities in the Peninsula would be composed, that fitting punishment would be inflicted upon the murderers of Mr. Birch, and that order and peace would be restored in what might be well termed one of the fairest parts of the world.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he entirely concurred with the noble Earl in the view that it was impossible to discuss this subject satisfactory until the whole of the Papers relating to it were upon the Table. He had no desire to disclaim any responsibility that properly belonged to him; and was ready to admit that although he had not actually sanctioned the act of Sir Andrew Clarke in appointing a Resident in the Peninsula, still he was at first inclined to think that step promised well; and in fairness to that gentleman he must observe that he had had no opportunity of expressing any official opinion on the course he had pursued. He preferred, however, not to express a more decided opinion on that matter until he had seen the Papers relating to the subject. But upon another point adverted to by the noble Earl—namely, the conduct of our naval and military forces engaged in the Expedition—there was no reason whatever for delaying to express our opinion, heartily and frankly. The despatches of the commanding officers had been laid before the public both by the Government and the newspapers, and, whatever might be our opinion upon the general policy of the Expedition, every one must feel that the manner in which the operations were carried out reflected the highest credit upon all concerned; and it was not without considerable pain that he had heard the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) in reference to this subject. The conduct of both our naval and our military forces was beyond all praise, and they had promptly and courageously discharged their duty under circumstances the difficulties of which were by no means to be underrated. As regarded alleged acts of inhumanity committed by our men, he felt bound to accept fully the denial of the accuracy of those imputations which had been given by the noble Earl, and he should be surprised and bitterly disappointed if it should turn out that there was the slightest foundation for them. No doubt many things were done in a state of war which afterwards caused regret; but after all it must be remembered that war was war, and it must be expected that some things would occur which would occasion painful reflections. But on the whole, he thought that the conduct of our naval and military officers and men engaged in this Expedition would be found to deserve the approbation of that House.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, in reply, that he complained of the noble Earl's putting words into his mouth to obtain cheers from his Friends. He had said nothing of Her Majesty's troops; he had spoken of an Arab force, and M. Fontaine was not in Her Majesty's Army List. The noble Earl had given no answer as to what these forces were doing in Sunghi Ujong. As he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) was not a military man, he had not given any opinion of the military operations from a military point of view.

On Question, resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at half-past Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 28th February, 1876.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, appointed.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE
ESTIMATES — Class II. — Resolutions [February 25] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS — Second Reading — Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000) * [89]; Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000) *.

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Manchester Post Office * [72]; Epping Forest * [66].

Committee—Report—Marriages (Saint James, Buxton) * [79].

Third Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders * [71], and passed.

PRIVILEGE—22 GEO. III. c. 45—THE MESSRS. ROTHSCHILD.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, or not, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the proposed payment to Messrs. Rothschild, one of which firm being also a Member of this House, of a commission of 2½ per cent. on the amount of the Suez Canal Purchase, brings the said Member within the provisions of the Act 22 Geo. 3, c. 45; and, if so, what action the Government propose to take on the subject?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it does not appear to me that this Question ought to be addressed to Her Majesty's Government, and I may say further, that on referring to the statute which the hon. Member has mentioned, I am doubtful whether it ought even to be addressed to the Law Officers of the Crown. I read in that statute that which indicates that it is a question neither for the Government nor for the Law Officers, but one for Her Majesty's Courts of Law. It says that any Member of this House offending under the circumstances referred to shall forfeit the sum of £500 for every day on which he sits or votes in this House to any person who shall sue for the same in any of Her Majesty's Courts at Westminster. In these circumstances, as it appears to be open to any of Her Majesty's subjects to sue for that penalty, I think it is not for the Government or for the Law Officers of the Crown to give any information on the subject, but for those who are directly interested in the question.

SIR NATHANIEL ROTHSCHILD: Sir, I hope the House will allow me to make a personal statement on this matter. I feel it my duty to declare that I am not a partner in the house of which my father is the head, either in London or Paris. I have no doubt that the House will accept that statement from me; but, if it is necessary, I am authorized by my father to say that the deed of partnership of the firm of Rothschild, both in London and on the Continent, can be inspected by any one whom this House may choose to appoint.

RAILWAYS—THE PASSENGER DUTY.

QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the North London Railway upon the two points; first, of stoppage of trains at every station; and, secondly, the charge on third class return tickets, will lead him to make any modification or re-adjustment in the mode of assessing the Passenger Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he understood that the decision of the House of Lords was in favour of the Board of Inland Revenue in regard to the mode in which the duties were to be levied on passengers, and not only confirmed the view which the Inland Revenue Board always contended for, but carried it somewhat further. It was the intention of that Board to adhere to that which they had always maintained was the proper mode of assessing passenger duty; but they would not attempt to avail themselves of that part of the judgment which seemed to carry their claim further than they had previously applied it.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill this Session for amending the Law relating to Agricultural Holdings in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, that a Bill on the subject had been prepared, and he was authorized to state that it would be introduced in the House of Lords on an early day by the Lord President of the Council.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND)—VACCINE LYMPH.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will consider the desirability of placing the Cow Pock Institution under the control of the Irish Local Government Board, and of increasing the grant to such institution so as to enable vaccine lymph to be supplied gratuitously in Ireland as it is in England?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he believed that the institution referred to was a private one, and, he therefore could not say how far it was possible to put it under the control of the Irish Local Government Board; but if the grant should be increased in order to enable vaccine lymph to be supplied gratuitously in Ireland, he thought the administration of such increased grant should be under the control of that Department, and he was now engaged in a correspondence with a view to effect that object.

ARMY—ACCOMMODATION FOR SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be true, as reported, that in Fort Gomer, Gosport, there are in No. 3 Room three men, three women, and nine children; in No. 4 Room, two men, three women, and nine children; in No. 14 Room, three men, three women, and nine children; in No. 15 Room, three men, three women, and eight children; and that in none of the rooms referred to are there partitions, screens, or curtains; and, if it be true, that there are similar instances of over-crowding also in Fort Grange; and, if so, whether steps will be taken to remedy such over-crowding?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that in respect to Fort Gomer the statement in the Question was correct, except as to the number of children, which was smaller. The rooms were large rooms, and at night curtains were put up, though they were not kept up during the day, because, being casemates, they would obstruct both the ventilation and the light in the day time. Unfortunately, those forts were not near a place where lodgings could be procured, and the men submitted to inconvenience rather than be separated by a distance of two miles from their work, their comrades, and the reading rooms. In the case of Fort Grange, there were two families in those rooms which were built for 14 men, and therefore, as far as cubic space was concerned, there, as also at Fort Gomer, there was ample space for the inmates. He would endeavour to see what could be done, but the matter was one of extreme difficulty, because there was not barrack accommodation in the neighbourhood. However, every provision would be made by the officer in command as far as possible to preserve decency and order.

COAL MINES — USE OF BLASTING POWDER.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has yet had the opinions of the Inspectors of Mines laid before him on the use of blasting powder in fiery mines; and, if he has had such Report, if he will lay the same upon the Table, with the Report on the Swaith Mine Explosions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had received the opinions alluded to, together with the Report, and both would be laid on the Table.

EGYPT—GENERAL FADEIEFF. QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the report that General Fadeieff, an officer of the Russian Staff, is about to be appointed Minister of War in Egypt?

MR. BOURKE: From the reports received at the Foreign Office, it appears that General Fadeieff, at the request of the Khedive and with the consent of the Russian Government, has proceeded to Egypt, and it was supposed that he would be employed in the re-organization of the Egyptian Army. No confirmation of this supposition has been received as yet. There does not appear to be any intention of appointing him

Minister of War, that post being now held, and its duties efficiently performed, by his Highness Hussein Pasha, the Khedive's second son.

ARMY—SALE OF COMMISSIONS—THE ROYAL WARRANT OF 1870.

QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any intention of altering the Royal Warrant of the 29th December 1870, by which six weeks must elapse after an Officer has made application to sell his Commission before such permission is granted, he being possibly very ill or in a dying state; if he would explain to the House why such permission cannot be granted in consequence of the expense, and how it should cost the country one million sterling if such permission were granted to an officer applying to sell at once; and if an Act of Parliament be requisite to cancel the Clause mentioned, why it should not be brought in?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: There is no intention of altering the Royal Warrant referred to. I appear to have been misunderstood in what I have said on this subject with respect to the amount involved. What I said or meant to say was that the change proposed would seriously reduce the saving of £1,100,000 taken credit for in the original Estimate. Officers remain in precisely the same position in this respect as before the abolition of Purchase, and I cannot undertake to bring in a Bill to alter it, however much I may feel for surviving relations in certain cases.

FIJI ISLANDS—THE EPIDEMIC.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Court of Inquiry which was held to investigate the circumstances connected with the lamentable introduction of measles into Fiji by Her Majesty's ship "Dido?"

MR. HUNT, in reply, said that no Court of Inquiry had been held with respect to the introduction of measles into Fiji, but there were some Papers on the subject, including a report of the captain of the Dido, which he would lay upon the Table.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—THE "STRATHCLYDE."—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any official inquiry will be held in order to ascertain the cause of the Dover Harbour authorities, as reported, not rendering timely assistance to the passengers and crew of the steam-ship "Strathclyde," whereby lives were lost which might, it appears, have otherwise been saved?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The Coroner's jury having found a verdict of "Manslaughter" against the master of the Franconia, it is impossible for the Board of Trade to institute an inquiry into the sinking of the Strathclyde until they know the issue of any proceedings which may be consequent on that verdict. Nor can they order an official inquiry into the conduct of the Dover Harbour authorities except as a part of an inquiry into the casualty. The Dover Board are, however, making a thorough investigation into the conduct of the master of the Palmerston, the harbour tug.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—GRAIN-LADEN VESSELS.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a return of the number of British vessels laden with grain in bulk which have been totally lost, with their crews, within the last twenty years?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I find it difficult to ascertain what grain ships are loaded in bulk which are afloat; I should therefore despair of finding what grain ships loaded in bulk have gone to the bottom during the last 20 years. If a Return were asked of the number of grain ships, however loaded, which have been lost during half that period—that is, since The Wreck Register began—it might be made with a good deal of trouble and expense; but what end would be served? No one disputes that a grain cargo is a very dangerous one, and the Government are using their utmost efforts to check its mode of stowage under the provisions of the recent Act,

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT EDWARD O'MEAGHER CONDON.

QUESTIONS.

MR. PARNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have any information as to an instruction by the House of Representatives of the United States of America to their Foreign Affairs Committee, to inquire into the circumstances of the conviction of Edward O'Meagher Condon, an American citizen; and to report whether the United States should interfere by a remand for his release or an appeal to British clemency; and, whether the Government will lay before the House information as to the charge upon which Condon was convicted, his sentence, and present place of imprisonment?

MR. BOURKE: On the 28th of February, 1874, a Petition was submitted to the House of Representatives in the United States by Mr. Banning, Member from Ohio, with reference to the case of Edward O'Meagher Condon, and on the 3rd of April a resolution of the House of Representatives was passed requesting the President to cause a representation to be made to Her Majesty's Government favouring the release of the convict. That resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, where it remained until the 2nd of March, 1875. On that day the Chairman of the Committee brought it before the Senate, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of it. That request was agreed to, and the resolution of the House of Representatives referred to by the hon. Member was thus disposed of. A telegram has appeared in the papers within the last few days announcing that the House of Representatives have lately passed a resolution similar to that passed in 1874, but no official information has reached us on the subject.

MR. PARNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Edward O'Meagher Condon, an American citizen, is now a prisoner in Spike Island Convict Prison; and, if so, whether he has been handcuffed or chained in his cell during any portion of his imprisonment; and, if so, how often, and for how long a period, and for what reasons such punishment has been inflicted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The hon. Member must have been misled by information he has received. The prisoner named is not in Spike Island Convict Prison and never has been there. He has never been handcuffed and has never been chained.

PARLIAMENT—POSTPONEMENT OF ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RESOLUTION.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the loss of H.M.S. "Vanguard."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

LOSS OF H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

MR. GOSCHEN, on rising—

"To call attention to the loss of H.M.S. Vanguard and the proceedings taken subsequent thereto; and to move for a Copy of further Correspondence relating thereto."

said, that a very few words would, he trusted, be enough to justify the course which he took. As he had said before, he should have preferred that the First Lord of the Admiralty should have himself delivered a statement upon the subject in the first instance, as it would, perhaps, have been possible for the right hon. Gentleman in that case to have given a clearer and more consecutive history of the transaction; but when asked to adopt that course, the right hon. Gentleman replied, in a tone of cheery pugnacity that he would give him (Mr. Goschen) an opportunity of taking the opinion of the House in the matter. But what it was desirable to know was, not the opinion of the House, not the opinion of outsiders—that had already been sufficiently expressed—but the views of the First Lord of the Admiralty himself with reference to the loss of the Vanguard and the many questions so vitally affecting the interests of the Navy which were involved in that disaster. All they knew so far of what the right hon. Gentleman had done, was contained in a Minute which scarcely covered a page. All they knew of what the right hon. Gentleman had thought upon the subject was derived from a gay and festive speech he had made at a civic feast, in which he spoke with enthusiasm of the ramming powers of the Iron Duke. It would not, however, do for the right hon. Gentleman to assume such an air of complacency, as if he had no story to tell unless he were challenged upon the point. It was not he (Mr. Goschen) who arraigned the right hon. Gentleman. He had been arraigned at the bar of public opinion, and he (Mr. Goschen) had brought forward his Motion in the interests of the Service and the interests of justice in order that the whole truth of the matter might be elicited. He might, indeed, have followed a different course. It would have been easy to frame a Motion for which everyone could have voted who on different grounds objected to the celebrated Minute. There had been few documents of so short a character to which more objections had been taken. He would state some of them historically rather than controversially. Some objected to the Minute because it superseded without reason assigned, and curtly enough, the decision of the Court-martial. Others objected to it, because it announced a complete and exhaustive inquiry, while it was believed that a complete inquiry had not been made. Others objected to it because it appeared lenient to the Admiral and captains and severe upon the lieutenants. Others objected to the Minute, because it did not seem to go to the root of the whole business, because, while the Court-martial had sat only upon the conduct of the officers of the Vanguard, the conduct of the officers of the Iron Duke had not yet been dealt with. It would have been easy enough to frame a Motion, and if he had submitted one—that in the opinion of the House the Admiralty Minute had failed to satisfy the exigencies of the case and was inadequate to the occasion, there would have been a very general feeling in favour of it, and as he was at present advised it would have received unanimous support out-of-doors. He said as at present advised, because he felt that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord had not yet been heard, and until he had heard him, he was unwilling to put a Notice on the Paper of what would have been a speculative attack; and hon. Members sitting on both sides of the House would not have been able to speak with that frankness and that impartiality which was so essential to the interest of the Naval Service, and he had therefore thought it best to simply call attention to the subject so as to have a frank and impartial discussion. They were there to hear the right hon. Gentleman now; and he hoped he had, in dealing with this matter, pursued a course which would commend itself to the House. How deeply the country had been stirred on this question was well known, but it was impossible to exaggerate the impression which this disaster had made on the Naval profession; and he knew that the words which would fall from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty and the mode in which the subject would be dealt with in that House would be watched with the deepest interest and personal anxiety by every member of the whole Naval Service. Let him state how the accident happened. The Vanguard belonged to what was called the Reserve Squadron, which was on its annual cruise, exercising the Coastguard men for a month at sea. At least that was the purpose; he should have to call attention to how that was fulfilled by-and-by. The fleet was under the command of Admiral Tarleton. It left Kingstown at 10.30 on the 1st of September. The Achilles parted company almost at once, and the remaining ships proceeded in single line, the Warrior—the flagship—being followed by the Hector; then came the Vanguard, commanded by Captain Dawkins, and the Iron Duke, commanded by Captain Hickley. The speed ordered by the Admiral was 33 revolutions, intended to give a speed of about seven knots. It was about a quarter past 12 when the Admiral gave orders to change the formation. The squadron was to be formed in columns of division in line ahead. To put it more popularly, the two sternmost ships were to take up positions parallel with the Warrior and Hector instead of following astern, and to effect this object the Vanguard and Iron Duke turned off at right angles from the other line. They proceeded four cables length—that was, 800 yards distance—and when they had reached that distance they had again to turn sharp round to the right and place themselves abreast of the Warrior and Hector. But the Warrior and Hector did not slacken speed, and as the Vanguard and Iron Duke, in order to get abreast the Warrior and Hector, had to perform a greater distance, the Vanguard and the Iron Duke dropped astern. The Admiral at the time was standing away. A little later, about 12.30, a fog descended upon the ships. At 12.26 a signal-gun had been fired by the Admiral, but it was not heard by the ships astern—in fact, the Admiral had lost control of the two ships. About the same time the captains of the two ships, the Vanguard and Iron Duke, left the deck, and the two ships were in charge of lieutenants. When the fog came on, the lieutenant of the Iron Duke, fearing to steer in the wake of the Vanguard, gave a sheer to port—that was, he moved a little out of line to the left, in order, in this dense fog, not to be immediately behind the ship in front. The captain, coming on deck, said—"You have done wrong; you should have remained behind;" and he gave an order to turn back again to the right and get into position. Meanwhile, Captain Dawkins had also come on deck, and he, misconstruing the orders in the Signal Book, directed speed to be reduced, making such signals as occurred to him—but there was unfortunately some confusion on this point—to the ship behind. The ship behind did not answer the signals, and why? Steam had not been put on to the steam whistle on the Iron Duke. At this moment Captain Dawkins saw, or thought he saw, a ship in front of the Vanguard in the fog, and he ordered the engines to be stopped, and gave his ship a sheer to the left. At the same time the captain behind him was giving his ship a sheer to the right. The speed of the ship in front had been reduced, the speed of the ship behind had been increased, and the two ships came into collision almost at right angles, the Iron Duke striking the Vanguard a deadly blow. That was the case as simply as he could put it. He had said that the squadron were at sea for the purpose of exercising the Coastguard, in pursuance of a plan which was introduced in 1869 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) who had made changes in the organization of the Coastguard, eliminating the civilian element and creating a force of 4,000 picked men. It was arranged that, in order to keep them up to the mark in modern ships and modern guns, half of the Coastguard should be taken to sea every year for a cruise, and these men had been reported on by many Admirals, who declared that they formed the finest material for manning their ships. Captain Dawkins had stated in his evidence that upon that day he was short of his complement and had a young crew; but how about the Coastguard men? They had all been landed before the 1st of September, and the Vanguard was at sea with her depôt crew alone. She was unmanned, because she had been retained on the cruise after the object for which she had been placed on it—the training of the Coastguard men—had been attained. The ships, he might add, on board which the Coastguard were embarked for sea were iron-clads, and there were various reasons why that class of ship was employed in that service. Those iron-clads were stationed round the coast as administrative centres, and, being stationary for a great part of the year, they had small crews, because it was deemed undesirable to lock up in stationary ships a larger number of men than was absolutely necessary. For the same reason no midshipman and no sub-lieutenants were on board them, and the work which should be done by those officers was done by warrant officers of experience. The ships, besides being administrative centres, took crews of Coastguard men to sea for a month or five weeks, and lastly, while they constituted a very powerful Reserve of iron-clads, available at a moment's notice for going into action, if required, by simply increasing their crews. They were, in short, most valuable ships, forming, as they did, a sort of Reserve Channel Squadron. He hoped the House would forgive him for so long a digression, but he thought he was in reality lightening the task of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty by entering into those particulars. He next came to the question how it was that Admiral Tarleton was in command of the Squadron. When his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract acceded to office the Coastguard Reserve was a separate establishment, and formed a small Board of Admiralty, with a Controller and 17 clerks, which carried on an elaborate correspondence across the street with the office at Whitehall, the post of Controller being held by Admiral Tarleton. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract abolished that office and 17 clerks, and took the management of the Coastguard Reserves into the Admiralty and put it under a Naval Lord, arranging for their inspection by placing them under the Admirals at Sheerness, Portsmouth, and Devonport, so that they should be under active naval inspection. The present Government had, however, reversed that plan, and they had restored in a different form and on somewhat different conditions the Controllorship of the Coastguard, and the officer now occupying that position was called Admiral Superintendent of the Naval Reserves. The result had been, that choice was made for the position of an officer of administrative ability for administrative purposes. But, owing to that arrangement, they so hampered themselves that the officer so selected also became the officer who had to take command of these iron-clads on their cruise. In 1869 his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract had sent to sea Admiral Sir Cooper Key, an experienced officer, and in 1870 Captain Willes, in command of an Admiralty cruise similar to that in which last year the Vanguard was lost. Captain Willes had an appointment under the Admiralty, but not one of so important a character as that of Controllor of the Coastguard. The first year he himself was at the head of the Admiralty Captain Willes again took command of the Squadron; but in 1872 he had occasion to reflect who should have the command, and he would tell the House frankly he had a feeling, which might now be almost called a presentiment, that there were weighty objections to placing in command of an active Squadron a Colleague of the Lords of the Admiralty. The disadvantages of the adoption of such a course had, he feared, received but too sharp an illustration from what had occurred. In saying this he wished to guard himself against being misunderstood. He most warmly repudiated any suggestion that the Naval Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Admiralty were actuated by any feeling of partiality in the opinion which they gave. He did not believe there was any such feeling among the Naval Officers whom the right hon. Gentleman consulted. The Board was the Board of the right hon. Gentleman, but it was an honest Board of honest sailors. Out-of-doors, however, the suggestion of partiality had not been absent; and he could not help regarding it as a misfortune that an officer so intimately connected with the Board was placed in command of the Squadron, because it was most desirable that not even the slightest suspicion of partiality should attach to such Minutes as that to which he was about to call attention in the public mind. Admiral Tarleton, he might add, but for peculiar circumstances, would have retired from the Active List in 1872; but there was in that year a vacancy at the Admiralty, and he was anxious to secure as his adviser and colleague a man who possessed the confidence of the Service, of great administrative ability, and of high character. In the opinion of those whom he consulted on the matter there was no better man to take into the Admiralty at the time than Admiral Tarleton, who, although service afloat was always more popular with naval officers, did not hesitate to undertake the performance of administrative work. There was the difficulty, however, on joining the Board, in his case, that he had chosen the New Regulations—that was to say, he would have retired at 60 under those Regulations—and he held the belief, which was shared by many naval officers, that he would not command the confidence and authority at the Admiralty which were desirable if he were there in the position of a retired Admiral. He therefore asked to be allowed the option of going back to the Old Regulations, so that he would not have to retire before the age of 65. It had been said that he sanctioned Admiral Tarleton's reverting to the Old Regulations after he had retired; but that was not so, for he had not yet reached the age for retirement, otherwise he would never have sanctioned the step. But, Admiral Tarleton having joined the Board, he allowed him to reverse his option for administrative purposes alone, for to admit of his doing so with the view of giving him an active command would have been against the whole spirit of the Regulations of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract. But, be that as it might, when Admiral Tarleton joined the Board they found him a wise and loyal officer, and it was but right that he should state frankly and fully that when he (Mr. Goschen) left the Admiralty he considered Admiral Tarleton his personal friend, and one for whom he entertained the highest esteem. He had now stated to the House the nature of the cruise during which the Vanguard was lost, and how Admiral Tarleton came to be in command. He would now proceed to explain to the House the orders which were given, because they showed the spirit under which the Squadron went to sea. The first paragraph stated that—

Mr. Goschen

"The Squadron was to proceed to sea for the purposes of exercise and evolution both under steam and sail, and also with a view to test the efficiency of the crews in regard to seamanship and gunnery."

But looking further into particulars the House would see that their orders were that starting from Berehaven, the Squadron was to sail round Ireland to Queens-town. A very short time was allowed for the ships to be at sea, and if the House examined the Papers they would see that there were gaps of three or four days, during which the Squadron was to stop at certain places. Up to the 1st of September the Squadron had a very fine time of it indeed. The ships were not very much at sea; indeed they were scarcely at sea at all; they left one place at night and arrived at the next place on the following morning; and this was the Squadron which was to exercise its crews in "evolutions both under steam and sail." He had asked the First Lord of the Admiralty to state frankly how many entire days they had been at sea, and the right hon. Gentleman answered—"Seventeen days or parts of days," but did not state how many entire days the ships had been at sea. The fact was, that they had only been at sea four entire days, and that out of those four days they spent three between Portland and Berehaven. This cruise, considering the immense importance of exercising both the officers and men in seamanship, was ill-advised and ill-arranged. If the Squadron had been a party of Cook's tourists, who had attempted to go round Ireland without being at sea more than was necessary, they could not have followed a course much different from that which had been taken by the Squadron. What were the ships about during those important four weeks? They spent a little time at Galway, where there was a ball. They were at Belfast on the 25th, and stayed there till the 28th. At Belfast there was a lunch, a ball, a dinner, and a series of special entertainments. At Dublin there was a dance, but they declined to attend a ball, because they were "behind time." These were significant words. What was done then in the way of exercises and evolutions in the course of that cruise? During the whole of that cruise, if he might say so without being thought flippant, the only signals given were the waving of ladies' pocket-handkerchiefs, while the only evolutions practised were the intricacies of quadrilles. Why did the Squadron go to Cork? The instructions of the Admiralty to Admiral Tarleton were to the effect that it appeared expedient that the Squadron under his command should visit Queens-town in the first week in September for three or four days before the ships proceeded to their several destinations, and it was further ordered that the local authorities at Cork should be informed on this subject. But what had this to do with the exercising in seamanship and evolutions of the Coastguardmen, who only had an opportunity of being at sea for four weeks in the year? What was the meaning of their going to Cork? When he was in office a noble Lord who was not unconnected with the present Government and who had property in the North of Ireland, put some pressure upon him in order that the Reserve ships should visit the North of Ireland. He had not acceded to the request, but on the present occasion the Government had sent them to the North of Ireland, and the ships stayed there a long time; and he supposed that on the principle of concurrent endowment, this Squadron was afterwards to go to Cork. It almost seemed to him as if these festive arrangements had been made to celebrate the restoration of the Coastguard under a separate naval command. But whatever was the object with which the Squadron went to Cork and sailed round Ireland in this festive and triumphant way, it was a terrible comment upon these proceedings that before they had made the whole circuit of Ireland this terrible disaster occurred, reminding them that they should not tamper with these opportunities for exercising the officers and men. It was because he felt most strongly on this subject that he had called attention to it. He felt, and he believed the Naval Service also felt strongly, that such opportunities should never be neglected. The orders directed that on leaving Queens-town the Vanguard, after landing the men of the Southern Division, should proceed to Lough Foyle, there to remain till the end of October, and then to return to Queenstown. It was a very curious circumstance, however, that the Vanguard landed no men whatever at Queenstown, but that she landed all the men at Kingstown. Why, then, did she go south? She had a depôt crew, and Admiral Tarleton said in justification of the course he took in regard to the handling of the Squadron that "the cruise had virtually terminated." He did not know how far this fact of the Vanguard being with a dépôt crew when manœuvring in line might have created difficulties in saving the ship. She ought to have had a complement of considerably more than 500 men, but there were only 360 men on board when she went on the cruise to Queenstown; and he wanted to know whether if there had been 200 more men on board one day than the next this fact was not likely to produce disorganization? Indeed, Captain Dawkins admitted there was a difficulty in launching the boats and manning the pumps because the crew was a short one. An Admiral of considerable experience had told him (Mr. Goschen) that he would never allow a ship with a dépôt crew to manœuvre in line with a Squadron—more especially after she had just discharged about 200 of her crew. His contention was that the Vanguard was not going to Queenstown for any naval or any Imperial purpose. The country would indeed be sorry if, in addition to the bitter humiliation it experienced at the loss of a ship of the kind, it had also reason to believe that the ship was lost for the sake of their going with four ships to show at Cork, and to enable the officers to attend a ball which was to be held there on the 2nd of September. He entirely agreed that there were times when the ships of the Royal Navy should be shown to the population, but for that purpose the Channel Squadron ought to be employed. The Reserve Squadron had such a short time allowed them, that great responsibility was cast upon the Admiralty if the cruise was not employed in the best way for training the officers and men. He now came to the circumstances under which the Vanguard was lost on the fatal 1st of September. The Iron Duke and Vanguard had moved to take a position abreast of the Admiral's flagship, and he would ask if warning had not been given as to the difficulties attending that manœuvre in the special circumstances of the case. As to the circumstances which preceded the collision, Lieutenant Thompson, of the Iron Duke, had described them very graphically. He said, the evolution having been successfully performed, and the flagship not reducing her speed, the Iron Duke was left very much astern.

Mr. Goschen

He called the attention of Lieutenant Evans to the fact, and said that he thought 50 revolutions did not appear to be sufficient. Lieutenant Evans then gave the order to go at the rate of 52, shouting down the tube to learn what that would be. Lieutenant Thompson then left the deck, but before doing so, he gave the following orders:—

"Steer S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  E., close order; columns of divisions in line ahead; on no account get astern; look-out men are on the top-gallant fore-castle, although there is no fog; but I perceive banks ahead, which will in all probability be on the ship in about half an hour."

The deck was then left in charge of Lieutenant Evans, but Lieutenant Thompson

"remained to assist the signalman, knowing the fog-signals are the most difficult of all, and expecting an evolutionary signal would be immediately made by the flagship, or some signal relating to guns during a fog."

Thus there were warnings given before the collision. Almost at the moment that this officer was taking these precautions Captain Dawkins left the deck of the Vanguard, and Captain Hickley the deck of the Iron Duke, and a grave mistake was committed, a mistake which had been punished by the Admiralty—the mistake of sheering out of line. There had been warning as regarded the fog, but notwithstanding that, the steam was not put on to the steam whistle of the Iron Duke, and the consequence was that the Iron Duke was not able to make a signal at the critical moment. Why was this not done? Where was the judgment of the Admiralty upon this question? It was really not tried by the Admiralty. The result of the omission was that the Vanguard did not know when the Iron Duke was coming. At this moment the combination of circumstances appeared to have been exceedingly remarkable. The captains left the deck, the Admiral was standing away from his own signals, and though a gun was fired from the flagship, it was a small one. Two masses of iron, of 5,000 tons each, were ploughing through the water, the one in front reducing speed at the time when the ship behind was increasing speed. Who was in charge of the two ships? On board the Iron Duke, Lieutenant Evans, a lieutenant of three years' standing, about 460th on the list of Lieutenants; and on board the Vanguard, Lieutenant Hathorn, a lieutenant of one year's standing, who was 600th on the list. There was a million of money in these two ships; there were 900 lives on board; they formed an integral part of the British Navy; they were under the charge, as he had said, of two young officers, the one 460th, and the other 600th in The Navy List; a fog was coming down; both captains were off the deck; one then returned to rummage for his signals which were not ready; and the Admiral was standing merrily away. That was a picture which the country would not care to see repeated. Was seamanship displayed on this occasion? He hoped that in consequence of these sad events it would be the duty of the Admiralty to give naval officers increased opportunities of studying seamanship. At the same time, we must not decry science for the sake of seamanship. We wanted both. Scientific structures required scientific handling, and let it not be said that their naval officers studied too much. Seamanship and science both required honour at our hands. Upon that state of facts what was the judgment of the court martial? The court martial found that the collision was caused—

"1. By the high rate of speed at which the Squadron (of which these vessels formed a part) was proceeding while in a fog.

"2. By Captain Dawkins, when leader of his division, leaving the deck of his ship before the evolution which was being performed was completed, especially as there were indications of foggy weather at the time.

"3. By the unnecessary reduction of speed of Her Majesty's ship Vanguard without a signal from the Vice Admiral in command of the Squadron, and without Her Majesty's ship Vanguard making the proper signal to Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke.

"4. By the increase of speed of Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke during a dense fog, the speed being already high.

"5. By Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke improperly sheering out of line.

"6. By the want of any fog signal on the part of Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke."

The verdict was thought a strong one, but then it was a strong Court. The officers composing it were practical sailors and men of acknowledged ability, and their verdict commanded confidence. He turned now to the decision of the Admiralty. After reciting the finding of the court martial, the Admiralty Minute proceeded as follows:—

"Their Lordships consider that the first cause assigned by the Court did not in any way contribute to the disaster. That the Vice Admiral in command was, under the circumstances of the case, justified in continuing the rate of speed ordered until the time when he made the signal to reduce it. . . . Their Lordships are of opinion that the loss of the Vanguard is mainly owing, first, to the reduction of the speed of the ship, and, secondly, to the improper sheering out of line and quitting station by Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke, by the order of Lieutenant Evans, officer of the watch. Their Lordships attach no blame to Captain Hickley, of Her Majesty's ship Iron Duke, in respect of the speed of his ship at the time of collision, it being his duty to regain his station, and he being warranted in supposing that Her Majesty's ship Vanguard was maintaining the speed at which she was going when she was last in sight."

This decision was directly contradictory to the decision of the court martial on two points—first, as to the speed at which the Admiral was going, and, secondly, as to the speed at which Captain Hickley ought to have gone. The court martial, he had stated, was a strong body; how about the Board of Admiralty, who gave an adverse decision? It might be easy for him to follow the course which was frequently taken when he was in office—namely, to speak of the Admiralty as a kind of phantom Board with a civilian head, and no doubt hon. Members opposite would have contrasted this strong court martial, with its immense authority and its judicial powers, with that phantom Board with its civilian head. That, however, would not be fair criticism, and he should take that spectral cloak from off the Admiralty and show the flesh and blood of some most excellent naval officers beneath. When he had charge of the Admiralty there was a vacancy in the post of First Naval Lord, caused by the promotion of Sir Sydney Dacres. This was a time at which political opponents thought it consistent with their duty and the public interest to lower the authority of the Admiralty as far as they possibly could. He, however, was determined to raise that authority, and accordingly he looked for the best man he could find, and his choice fell on Sir Alexander Milne, the First Naval Lord of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt), who was partly responsible for the Minute before the House. At one time he (Mr. Goschen) also was in trouble, like the right hon. Gentleman, when the Agincourt ran on a rock, and there was a court martial, which was followed by a Minute. But here, unfortunately, the parallel ceased. It was his misfortune that, as the result of his Minute, two Admirals were deprived of their commands, while the right hon. Gentleman had been fortunate enough to be able to confine his severity to one lieutenant. Well, when he had to find a successor to the Admiral in command of the Channel Squadron, he took a man who was one of the best sailors in the British Navy, and also one of its most scientific officers—Rear-Admiral Hornby, now the Second Naval Lord of the right hon. Gentleman, and one of those responsible for the Minute before the House. The right hon. Gentleman's Third Naval Lord was Lord Gilford, who had commanded the Hercules for three years with signal success. He trusted the House would feel that he had done justice to the Advisers of the right hon. Gentleman opposite; and if he had spoken of the strength of the court martial, he had also spoken of the confidence which ought to be reposed in the professional opinion of those Advisers. Hon. Members would understand that he considered it his duty to speak frankly on this subject, if even it was in praise of the present Board of Admiralty. But, it was said out-of-doors that naval officers became too official when they joined the Board, and that officialism might have hampered their judgment. He would reply, that it would be a great misfortune if the moment naval officers joined the Admiralty they ceased to have the confidence of their brother officers out-of-doors; though in that House they sometimes found that when a Gentleman took office he lost the confidence of those whom he represented before. For his own part, he did not believe that the officers of the right hon. Gentleman were partial, and he had shown that they had strong sailor-like qualities for deciding questions of this kind. He had now, as far as any evidence of his own could do, set up for the right hon. Gentleman to the best of his ability the authority of his Board; but he was bound nevertheless to say that out-of-doors nine men out of ten, nay, 99 out of 100, had come to the conclusion that in this case the Admiralty had made a deplorable mistake. The House must distinguish between the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman and that of his Advisers. The First Lord of the Admiralty would incur an immense responsibility if he were to throw over the advice of his professional Advisers; but it was for him to see that that advice was embodied in a wise, discreet, and proper shape. If he (Mr. Goschen) had had to deal with the case he would no doubt have ultimately followed the advice given by his Naval Advisers; but he would have stared with astonishment when first told that the orders given to the Squadron as to speed had nothing to do with the disaster. Then he would have asked some pertinent questions. He would probably have asked Admiral Hornby, because he had most recently come from the sea, what was his own practice in a fog; did he generally go fast or slow? He would have replied either that he generally went fast or that he generally went slow. If he had said he had gone slow, he would have followed the instructions of the Signal Book; if fast, he (Mr. Goschen), as the Instructions of the Admiralty gave a different order, would have made a mental note of the matter as an element in the conclusion at which he should arrive. The Signal Book of the Admiralty stated clearly enough what the course was to be—namely—"During fogs, the speed of the fleet, except under special circumstances—['Hear, hear!']—shall not exceed three to four knots per hour." Then he would have got his answer—possibly he had got it as implied in that cheer. There were "special circumstances;" but, before he came to that point, he might have found out that in the opinion of some of the Admirals these Instructions would only hamper the discretion of Admirals, and that they dissented from the view that any hard-and-fast line like this order ought to be laid down at all. Then he would have made a note of that, in order to see how it might have affected their judgment. If the Board were unanimously of opinion that special circumstances justified the course that had been taken he would have given way, but only on one condition—that those circumstances were set forth on the face of the Minute. He would have said—"We are not going to abandon Admiral Tarleton, to a cry, if you are right. But, the fact that he is our Colleague, so intimately associated with us, increases the duty upon us to convince the Service that we are dealing with this matter in a fair and just spirit; and while I accept your advice you must accept mine upon one point. You must state the special circumstances in your Minute, and then offer it to the acceptance of the Service and the country." The Admiralty Minute, however, was absolutely curt; it reversed the opinion of the court martial, and it said simply: "under the circumstances," leaving it to be imagined what the circumstances were. That phrase, "under the circumstances," was a delightfully elastic one. He did not presume that, under it, they were to include a desire to get to Cork on a particular day. They were not to remember the statement made that they were behind time. As far as he could learn, the "special circumstances" of the case were the setting of a current in the direction of the Kish Bank, that bank lying to the right of the Squadron as it proceeded on its course. It was stated in the Admiralty Minute that the speed of the current setting towards the Kish Bank was such that if the speed of the Squadron had been reduced there would have been some danger of getting on to the bank, and that was the reason which induced Admiral Tarleton to proceed at the speed of seven knots in a fog. It naturally occurred to one to ask why, in that case, he could not reduce speed and change his course, and steer a little more to the left? If there was this danger of a current setting him on the bank, why not give the bank a wider berth? The possible answer might be, that it was dangerous to give two signals in a fog, as they would have to make a signal for reducing speed, and one for steering another course. If the right hon. Gentleman laid it down as a doctrine that two signals could not be made in a fog in the course of half-an-hour, the sooner there was more practice in signalling, or the sooner the signals were revised, the better. But he understood there was no such difficulty, and it would have been perfectly possible to change the course, if the current carried the Squadron nearer to the Kish Bank. There was, however, a remarkable circumstance connected with this which must not be forgotten. The Admiralty Minute gave a different signal which it was said the Admiral should have given, and which, if given, would have kept the Squadron better together. The Admiralty said that Signal 017 ought to have been made. He was curious to know what Signal 017 was; and the right hon. Gentleman had given a diagram to show how the ships would have been placed had they followed that signal of the Admiralty. They would have been placed four cables nearer to the Kish Bank, which in consequence of the current, it was stated, they wished to avoid. Admiral Tarleton might have fairly complained of that Minute, and said—"Had I followed the signal which you point out, it would have placed me nearer the danger which I kept up my speed to avoid." How would the right hon. Gentleman explain that? It would have been satisfactory if some report had been produced from the Hydrographer of the Admiralty showing how the current set. As regarded the wreck, evidence might be obtained as to the extent of the current by watching to see how far the Vanguard drifted after she came into collision. The right hon. Gentleman had produced a chart within the last few days, taken from the log of the Warrior, and probably it would be of some use to his right hon. Friend in one respect that night, because it afforded one scrap of evidence which was not before the court martial, but was before him when he made his Minute. The chart of the Warrior was produced to show that the course of the Squadron was rather more to the westward and nearer the land than the course laid down by the Iron Duke and Vanguard; but the right hon. Gentleman did not bear in mind that if the Squadron was steering a course nearer the shore, it would only show that the wreck had not drifted so much towards the land as would appear from the other charts before the House. He should like to know whether it was sufficient, in dealing with Admiral Tarleton's case, to have gone simply on the questions of speed and signals. There was another point, which was, that Admiral Tarleton had reported that the two ships were four miles astern when the fog lifted about 2 o'clock. It seemed the ships had been in collision, guns were fired, which were heard on board the Warrior, but not understood, and that after the collision Admiral Tarleton steamed away without looking after the two ships. Why, then, was there not a court martial upon him and a Court of Inquiry? He thought that as in the case of the Agincourt the late Government decided not to hold a court martial, it would scarcely lie with him (Mr. Goschen) to ask his right hon. Friend why a court martial had not been held; but he submitted to the House that there was a difference between that case and the present, where the Government had reversed the sentence of a court martial. What was felt was that this reversal was a serious error, and that even if there had been no court martial, the inquiry had not been so exhaustive and complete as it was stated to have been in the Minute now before them. But although he (Mr. Goschen) had spoken frankly of Admiral Tarleton, let it not be supposed that Admiral Tarleton had got off scot-free. He ventured to think that of the many officers who had been censured in these proceedings—he would not even except the lieutenant who was dismissed his ship—there was not one who had suffered more than Admiral Tarleton. Naval officers were not like case-hardened politicians, though even politicians thick-skinned, as they were supposed to become, did wince sometimes beneath the flagellation of hostile criticism. But for naval officers to whom distinction above their fellows was as the very sunshine of their lives, and praise for service well performed as the very food of Heaven, men who preserved each scrap of paper bearing record of success, from the first certificate for seamanship of the delighted midshipman to the letter of thanks from My Lords to the gratified Admiral when he laid down his command for distinguished services—for men such as these to see themselves involved in disaster, and to be held up for weeks and months, guilty or not guilty, punished or unpunished, to reproof and reproach, and to see the heavy hand of public opinion write an angry final line at the bottom of an unblemished page of a service of 40 years, was more than pain, it was positive torture, and he grieved from the bottom of his heart that in discharging his duty in this matter he might have added to the pain of a gallant and distinguished man. He came now to the case of Captain Hickley, and from enquiries he (Mr. Goschen) had made, he could state that it was entirely against the ordinary practice of the Service for a captain to leave the deck while an evolution was still in progress, and that that distinguished officer Lord Lyons used so to inform his captains when he took the command of a Squadron. The court martial remarked on the fact that Captain Dawkins left the deck before an evolution which was being performed had been completed, but he was not the only man who left the deck while an evolution was being performed, because Captain Hickley left the deck under precisely the same circumstances, and naval officers would see how far he must be held responsible. Three mistakes were made on board the Iron Duke in the absence of Captain Hickley. In the first place, Lieutenant Evans sheered out of the line on an erroneous interpretation of the regulations of the Service, and if the captain had been on deck that would not have been done. The disaster occurred, however, not through Lieutenant Evans steering to port, but in the correction of his error by Captain Hickley. Then as to the question of speed, the Admiralty said there was no blame to Captain Hickley for the speed of his ship at the time of the collision, it being his duty to retain his station, and he being warranted in believing the other vessels would retain theirs; but Captain Hickley admitted in the evidence that the Iron Duke was going faster than he himself knew. He did not know the ship was going at 60 revolutions at the time, but he had left the question of speed with the lieutenant who had given the order. And thirdly, who was responsible for steam not having been put on the steam whistle of the Iron Duke? He might add a further question. Why did not Captain Hickley think of taking the Vanguard in tow and towing her into shallow water? The navigating lieutenant of the Vanguard was censured at the court martial for not having suggested this to his captain, the opinion of the court martial being that there was shallow water close enough, and that such advice ought to have been given. He should like to know why Captain Hickley was not asked why he did not take the vessel into shallow water; but the fact was there had been no inquiry into the conduct of the officers of the Iron Duke. He would ask a similar question with regard to Lieutenant Evans. That officer gave an order and committed an error of judgment, and had been dismissed from his ship by the Admiralty Minute. He did not question the power of the Admiralty in the matter; but he questioned to a great extent the discretion which they exercised in dismissing that officer. That was not a professional but an administrative question, and the right hon. Gentleman might well have said—"Many officers have been censured, but only Captain Dawkins has been dismissed from his ship. We will censure this young lieutenant, but we will not dismiss him from his ship." That would have been a wiser and fairer course, and it would not have caused that bitterness in the Service which had been caused by the Admiralty. Lieutenant Evans also had not been tried, and had not had the opportunity of giving any evidence which he might have adduced with respect to the practice of other officers. He heard that it was by no means uncommon, although it was against the Regulations, for an officer to take precisely that course which Lieutenant Evans took on that occasion. It was even whispered abroad—he knew not whether it had reached the right hon. Gentleman—that the Hector, the ship following the Warrior, the flag-ship, also sheered out of line on that particular occasion, and did not follow strictly in the wake of the flag-ship. [Mr. HUNT said, it had reached him only to be contradicted.] That was one of the inconveniences of his speaking before the right hon. Gentleman, who would pardon him if he raised points which, though perhaps easy of contradiction, ought to be put fairly before the House with a view to their proper explanation. But how much better it would have been if that contradiction had come out in evidence given before some Court of Inquiry, instead of after all that time had elapsed, and so much damage to the Service had been done! He had stated some of the points which made the Minute incomplete, and whatever explanations the right hon. Gentleman might give that night could not disprove that the Minute was too inconclusive, too curt, and very inadequate. He would only ask the right hon. Gentleman a few more questions. [Laughter.] If he did not ask them, they would be asked by the country and by the House. He wanted to know what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do in consequence of that disaster, and of the deficiencies which had been shown to exist in our naval officers? Let the right hon. Gentleman tell the House not only what he had done with respect to the past, but what he proposed to do about the future. For instance, as regarded the extract from the General Signal Book, that during fogs the speed of the fleet, except under special circumstances, should not exceed three to four knots per hour—had the right hon. Gentleman repealed that article or not? [Mr. HUNT: I have not done so.] Then they might expect to have this difficulty—that the special circumstances would be differently interpreted by different captains and Admirals. He thought the right hon. Gentlemen's Naval Advisers would have told him that while that might be a wise regulation in itself, it would not be wise to maintain the rule after the decision that had been given. Again, had he taken any measure with regard to the gun signals, which seemed to have been so inefficient? Captain Dawkins said that he had his guns loaded in the night, but not at the critical moment in the daytime. Other officers said there were no look-outs posted at the stern. Was that so? Had the right hon. Gentleman gone through that evidence and mastered it in such a manner as to be able to assure the Naval Service that every possible measure would be taken to remedy those evils which they knew had occurred? Again, let them hope as to the future that the right hon. Gentleman would not be discouraged by the disaster which had happened from sending the ships to sea, making them cruise in squadrons, and exercising the officers and men. If he were to relax his efforts because he was staggered by that calamity, his conduct would be both perilous and pusillanimous. But the right hon. Gentleman must draw the line. The cruises should be business cruises—not cruises in which there was more display and speech-making than actual exercise. And now he had discharged his task, and while apologizing if he had displayed any undue warmth, he would only say that he did not wish to treat that in any degree as a Party subject. He wished the truth to be elicited, and he said most frankly that in the interests of the service, against which so many reproaches had been levelled, in the interests of the officers incriminated, in the interests of discipline, which was so much weakened when any blow was struck at those set in authority, and in the interests, also, of justice itself, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to make what was called a triumphant reply. But the right hon. Gentleman must remember that he had not only to defend himself, but that in the sight of England and of Europe the fair fame of British seamanship had been jeopardized by what had occurred. The right hon. Gentleman was not only the Member of a political Administration, which would suffer from blame imputed to himself; he was also at the head of the Naval Service; he was on that occasion their spokesman and champion, and if he wished to represent them worthily, he entreated him to discard the language of apology and extenuation, and to speak simply the language of determination and of truth. He must not speak again in that tone of jaunty indulgence about a few blunders having been made. He must show the House that he grasped the full import and appreciated the gravity of those great questions that so vitally affected the nation which had been involved in that sad disaster. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Copy of a further Minute relating to the loss of H.M.S. 'Vanguard.'"—(Mr. Goschen.)

MR. HUNT said, that the right hon. Gentleman had told them at the beginning of his speech that he regretted that the First Lord of the Admiralty had not volunteered an official statement to the House on the loss of the Vanguard. That regret the right hon. Gentleman had expressed before; but he (Mr. Hunt) must say that he thought the course he had taken was the right one, because it was not usual for the Minister in charge of his Department to initiate discussion on the naval occurrences of the year, except in introducing the Navy Estimates. He had therefore contemplated introducing the Navy Estimates at an earlier period, and had made his arrangements accordingly, as that seemed to him the appropriate occasion for dealing with those occurrences, and, beyond all others, with the great naval disaster of the year. Having been anxious—most anxious—that the subject should come on at the earliest period of the Session, in order that the House might be put in possession of all the facts of the case as far as they could be explained by evidence taken before the court martial, he had given instructions that the Blue Book should be prepared months before Parliament met, so as to be placed as soon as possible in the hands of hon. Members. Notwithstanding the somewhat critical speech of the right hon. Gentleman—of which he did not complain—he could not but feel grateful to him for giving him an earlier opportunity of addressing the House on that question. For months he had been assailed with a virulence and a persistency which he thought he hardly ever remembered in his experience to have seen directed against any public man.

Mr. Goschen

But he had been sustained by the consciousness that he had acted in that matter as he believed to be right and just; and he had always had full confidence that, when the subject came to be discussed on the floor of that House—the proper place in which to vindicate his conduct—full justice would be done him. He had had some advantage in hearing the observations and the questions of the right hon. Gentleman before addressing the House himself. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not contented himself with asking him questions, and putting all the different points which occurred to him before the House, but had, he thought, gone a little out of his way to tell him the tone in which he should address the House. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to a speech made by him (Mr. Hunt) on a festive occasion, and he asked him not to repeat the tone of that speech, and he had recalled to the mind of the House the expression—"Two or three blunders." Well, he (Mr. Hunt) was not going to defend the expression, and the reason was, that he had never used it. It was true that during the slack part of the year there was some exceedingly smart writing on the subject, and hon. Members of the House, when addressing their constituents, had alluded to it; but he was indebted for the expression to the slovenliness or malevolence of a reporter—for it was not one which fell from his lips, and much of what he did say had been perverted and distorted in a way which he could hardly have thought possible. But he would pass on from that, assuring the House that he would address them in a spirit of seriousness and earnestness with regard to what he considered a very great disaster. The right hon. Gentleman had gone into the questions of the re-establishment of an officer at the head of the Naval Reserve, the orders given for the cruise, and as to whether on the occasion alluded to the ships were properly officered and manned. He did not expect that he should have had to go into the question respecting the Admiral Superintendent of the Naval Reserve, but, being challenged on the point, he was bound to refer to it. The right hon. Gentleman had complimented his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers)—who, he regretted, was not present—on the view he took with respect to the Naval Reserve. He would not, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, criticize his policy, except so far as it was necessary to vindicate himself; but when he (Mr. Hunt) entered on the office he held, he gave very great attention to the question of the Naval Reserve, and it appeared to him that all had not been done which was necessary to induce men to join that body, and that there was no stimulus to the officers connected with the Reserve to perform their duties with zeal and industry. It seemed to him that the chief reason was that there was not a proper head to that body, and in consequence of that he established the office of Admiralty Superintendent, and placed Admiral Tarleton in that position. Why did he do so? When he went to the Admiralty he offered Admiral Tarleton a seat at the Board for a limited period. He was anxious to have the assistance of the gallant officer who was in command of the Channel Squadron, but that was not possible at the moment. He, therefore, offered a seat at the Board to Admiral Tarleton, it being understood that he was to give place to Admiral Hornby when his services were available. But during the time he was at the Admiralty he was impressed with the ability of Admiral Tarleton and the great amount of knowledge he possessed on the subject of the Naval Reserve. That gallant Admiral also accompanied him in a cruise round the coast of England to visit the chief drilling stations on the coast. They discussed the matter thoroughly, and he came to the conclusion that there was no man more fit to be placed at the head of the Reserve than was Admiral Tarleton. The right hon. Gentleman said that a man might be a good administrator and not a good officer afloat; but he ventured to say that the reputation acquired by Admiral Tarleton afloat was a distinguished reputation. The right hon. Gentleman had occupied a great deal of his speech with discussing the question whether the Vanguard was rightly sent to Queenstown from Kingstown, and whether she was properly manned and officered. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Reserve Squadron was merely sent out to practise the Coastguard men. Under an arrangement made a few years ago the Reserve Squadron, instead of being left in port, had a regular complement of men and officers assigned to it, and it was as essential to them as it was to the Coastguard that they should be practised in naval evolutions and seamanship. The cruise of the Reserve Squadron, therefore, was as much required for that purpose as was that of the Channel Squadron. But the right hon. Gentleman had raised the question whether the complement of men and officers was sufficient for the purpose. Well, the complement was fixed by the right hon. Gentleman himself? It was fixed in 1871, he supposed, at the suggestion of his Naval Advisers, for at that early period of his occupation of the office he then held the right hon. Gentleman would hardly have ventured to fix it himself. But the right hon. Gentleman said the complement was fixed as a dépôt complement. He begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the ships went out of harbour to fire their ammunition, and were in the habit of going from one home port to another; that the complement was fixed, and that no complaint was ever made of the ships being undermanned on such occasions. There was a great difference as to the number of men required for ships which were out for long, and ships which were out for short, cruises; for ships proceeding under sail and under steam. On the occasion of the voyage from Kingstown to Queenstown the ships were proceeding under steam, and, according to the opinion of his Naval Colleagues, the crews were amply sufficient for the navigation of the vessels. It was true that some men were disembarked; but, in the opinion of the captain, the number remaining was sufficient to work the ship; and it was at his request that the Admiral Superintendent consented to the men being disembarked, as they could be conveniently conveyed by Coastguard cruisers to their several stations. Again, the right hon. Gentleman criticized the number of days that the Squadron was at sea. He said it was sent out for the purpose of practising, and that the greater part of the time was spent in harbour. Well, he had referred to the orders which were given, when the right hon. Gentleman was at the Admiralty, with regard to the Reserve, and he found that hardly any orders were given at all. It was left almost entirely to the Admiral in command what the time of the Squadron at sea should be. He wanted to know why a Squadron on the cruise of apology and extenuation, and to speak simply the language of determination and of truth. He must not speak again in that tone of jaunty indulgence about a few blunders having been made. He must show the House that he grasped the full import and appreciated the gravity of those great questions that so vitally affected the nation which had been involved in that sad disaster. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Copy of a further Minute relating to the loss of H.M.S. 'Vanguard.'"—(Mr. Goschen.)

MR. HUNT said, that the right hon. Gentleman had told them at the beginning of his speech that he regretted that the First Lord of the Admiralty had not volunteered an official statement to the House on the loss of the Vanguard. That regret the right hon. Gentleman had expressed before; but he (Mr. Hunt) must say that he thought the course he had taken was the right one, because it was not usual for the Minister in charge of his Department to initiate discussion on the naval occurrences of the year, except in introducing the Navy Estimates. He had therefore contemplated introducing the Navy Estimates at an earlier period, and had made his arrangements accordingly, as that seemed to him the appropriate occasion for dealing with those occurrences, and, beyond all others, with the great naval disaster of the year. Having been anxious—most anxious—that the subject should come on at the earliest period of the Session, in order that the House might be put in possession of all the facts of the case as far as they could be explained by evidence taken before the court martial, he had given instructions that the Blue Book should be prepared months before Parliament met, so as to be placed as soon as possible in the hands of hon. Members. Notwithstanding the somewhat critical speech of the right hon. Gentleman—of which he did not complain—he could not but feel grateful to him for giving him an earlier opportunity of addressing the House on that question. For months he had been assailed with a virulence and a persistency which he thought he hardly ever remembered in his experience to have seen directed against any public man.

Mr. Goschen

But he had been sustained by the consciousness that he had acted in that matter as he believed to be right and just; and he had always had full confidence that, when the subject came to be discussed on the floor of that House—the proper place in which to vindicate his conduct—full justice would be done him. He had had some advantage in hearing the observations and the questions of the right hon. Gentleman before addressing the House himself. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not contented himself with asking him questions, and putting all the different points which occurred to him before the House, but had, he thought, gone a little out of his way to tell him the tone in which he should address the House. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to a speech made by him (Mr. Hunt) on a festive occasion, and he asked him not to repeat the tone of that speech, and he had recalled to the mind of the House the expression—"Two or three blunders." Well, he (Mr. Hunt) was not going to defend the expression, and the reason was, that he had never used it. It was true that during the slack part of the year there was some exceedingly smart writing on the subject, and hon. Members of the House, when addressing their constituents, had alluded to it; but he was indebted for the expression to the slovenliness or malevolence of a reporter—for it was not one which fell from his lips, and much of what he did say had been perverted and distorted in a way which he could hardly have thought possible. But he would pass on from that, assuring the House that he would address them in a spirit of seriousness and earnestness with regard to what he considered a very great disaster. The right hon. Gentleman had gone into the questions of the re-establishment of an officer at the head of the Naval Reserve, the orders given for the cruise, and as to whether on the occasion alluded to the ships were properly officered and manned. He did not expect that he should have had to go into the question respecting the Admiral Superintendent of the Naval Reserve, but, being challenged on the point, he was bound to refer to it. The right hon. Gentleman had complimented his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers)—who, he regretted, was not present—on the view he took with respect to the Naval Reserve. He would not, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, criticize his policy, except so far as it was necessary to vindicate himself; but when he (Mr. Hunt) entered on the office he held, he gave very great attention to the question of the Naval Reserve, and it appeared to him that all had not been done which was necessary to induce men to join that body, and that there was no stimulus to the officers connected with the Reserve to perform their duties with zeal and industry. It seemed to him that the chief reason was that there was not a proper head to that body, and in consequence of that he established the office of Admiralty Superintendent, and placed Admiral Tarleton in that position. Why did he do so? When he went to the Admiralty he offered Admiral Tarleton a seat at the Board for a limited period. He was anxious to have the assistance of the gallant officer who was in command of the Channel Squadron, but that was not possible at the moment. He, therefore, offered a seat at the Board to Admiral Tarleton, it being understood that he was to give place to Admiral Hornby when his services were available. But during the time he was at the Admiralty he was impressed with the ability of Admiral Tarleton and the great amount of knowledge he possessed on the subject of the Naval Reserve. That gallant Admiral also accompanied him in a cruise round the coast of England to visit the chief drilling stations on the coast. They discussed the matter thoroughly, and he came to the conclusion that there was no man more fit to be placed at the head of the Reserve than was Admiral Tarleton. The right hon. Gentleman said that a man might be a good administrator and not a good officer afloat; but he ventured to say that the reputation acquired by Admiral Tarleton afloat was a distinguished reputation. The right hon. Gentleman had occupied a great deal of his speech with discussing the question whether the Vanguard was rightly sent to Queenstown from Kingstown, and whether she was properly manned and officered. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Reserve Squadron was merely sent out to practise the Coastguard men. Under an arrangement made a few years ago the Reserve Squadron, instead of being left in port, had a regular complement of men and officers assigned to it, and it was as essential to them as it was to the Coastguard that they should be practised in naval evolutions and seamanship. The cruise of the Reserve Squadron, therefore, was as much required for that purpose as was that of the Channel Squadron. But the right hon. Gentleman had raised the question whether the complement of men and officers was sufficient for the purpose. Well, the complement was fixed by the right hon. Gentleman himself? It was fixed in 1871, he supposed, at the suggestion of his Naval Advisers, for at that early period of his occupation of the office he then held the right hon. Gentleman would hardly have ventured to fix it himself. But the right hon. Gentleman said the complement was fixed as a dépôt complement. He begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the ships went out of harbour to fire their ammunition, and were in the habit of going from one home port to another; that the complement was fixed, and that no complaint was ever made of the ships being undermanned on such occasions. There was a great difference as to the number of men required for ships which were out for long, and ships which were out for short, cruises; for ships proceeding under sail and under steam. On the occasion of the voyage from Kingstown to Queenstown the ships were proceeding under steam, and, according to the opinion of his Naval Colleagues, the crews were amply sufficient for the navigation of the vessels. It was true that some men were disembarked; but, in the opinion of the captain, the number remaining was sufficient to work the ship; and it was at his request that the Admiral Superintendent consented to the men being disembarked, as they could be conveniently conveyed by Coastguard cruisers to their several stations. Again, the right hon. Gentleman criticized the number of days that the Squadron was at sea. He said it was sent out for the purpose of practising, and that the greater part of the time was spent in harbour. Well, he had referred to the orders which were given, when the right hon. Gentleman was at the Admiralty, with regard to the Reserve, and he found that hardly any orders were given at all. It was left almost entirely to the Admiral in command what the time of the Squadron at sea should be. He wanted to know why a Squadron on the cruise should have different orders from the Channel Squadron, for the right hon. Gentleman said it was all very well to send the Channel Squadron round the Coast, but why send the Reserve? But the right hon. Gentleman seemed to forget, or to be ignorant of the fact, that going into and out of harbour was one of the most important things which officers or men could practise. In the case of the Channel Squadron they had every two or three years been sent round the Coast, learning the different ports and harbours of the country, and giving great satisfaction to the taxpayers of the country—keeping up the pride and spirit of the country with regard to our maritime affairs, and satisfying the taxpayers that they had a certain amount of work done for their money. That, he believed, was the policy which had been pursued by all Governments of late years. He believed it to be a good policy, and it was one he desired to see carried out; and if the right hon. Gentleman wanted to know why orders were given to the Reserve Squadron to proceed to Cork the answer was this, that the people of Cork might have an opportunity of seeing the Squadron—uniting with that the practice which the Squadron would get during the voyage. Different ports in Ireland had been visited by the Reserve Squadron, but the people of Queenstown and Cork had not for several years seen a squadron of our ironclads, and on general grounds it was desirable that the natural and patriotic wishes of the people of Cork should be satisfied. It was for that reason that the Admiral was ordered to go with four of the ships of the Squadron to Queenstown. But really, though the right hon. Gentleman had laboured that part of the case very much, it was not, he believed, the question which the House wished to have discussed. The question was this—and it was a very important one—had the administration of the Admiralty in relation to the matter of the Vanguard been such as ought to satisfy the country? Had the action of the Admiralty been intelligent, had it been honest, had it been fearless, had it been impartial? He believed on those points that an examination of the question ought to satisfy the House that the administration and action of the Admiralty had not been wanting in any of those particulars. The right hon. Gentleman, though he had dealt with a great many topics in connection with this affair, and had asked a great many questions, had left almost untouched, or, at all events, dealt very lightly with a question which had been much agitated in the Recess—namely, Why did you not try Admiral Tarleton by court martial? That was a question with which he wished to deal. Now, there had been a great misconception in the public mind, if he might judge by writings in the newspapers, as to the authority of the Admiralty in relation to courts martial. Some people seemed to think that the authority of courts martial was greater than that of the Admiralty. But that was not the view of Parliament and of the Constitution; because Parliament had given statutory powers to the Admiralty to override the decision of courts martial, to annul, revise or modify their sentences—in short, to do everything but increase them; and, therefore, the Admiralty was an authority superior to all courts martial, and was bound to exercise an independent judgment upon all matters referred to them and to deal with them as they thought proper. Independently of that, the Admiralty had the power of dismissing officers from their ships and from the Service without a court martial. He could understand why the right hon. Gentleman had passed rather lightly over that part of his subject, because a question of this kind arose during his own Admiralty administration which he slightly hinted at—namely, the case of the Agincourt and the Northumberland. And what happened then? There was a court martial on some of the officers of the ship that got on shore, and the right hon. Gentleman dismissed two Admirals from their command without putting them on their trial by court martial. [Mr. GOSCHEN: I said so.] Yes, the right hon. Gentleman just alluded to it; but he (Mr. Hunt) wanted to bring it out more prominently. He did not complain of the right hon. Gentleman's action in that case, and, indeed, it met with universal applause. Well, if the right hon. Gentleman was applauded when he dismissed two Admirals from their command without court martial, was he (Mr. Hunt) to be complained of when he exonerated an Admiral without court martial, and dismissed a subordinate officer on sufficient grounds? ["Hear, hear!"] He repeated, "on sufficient grounds." The right hon. Gentleman said that he was upheld by Parliament and the country in the line that he took; and what he (Mr. Hunt) had to show was that what he had done had been on sufficient grounds, and then the right hon. Gentleman could not complain that he had acted without authority and without precedent. He had said that the Admiralty had by law the authority to review and revise the sentence of a court martial, and what he said was that the gallant officers who did him the honour to sit at his Board were regarded by the profession as officers of the highest distinction and ability in the Service, and that on professional subjects they had the entire confidence of the Navy. On the subject, indeed, of squadron-sailing, at no period in the history of the Admiralty was the authority of the Naval Lords higher than at the present moment. He could not quite understand the view of the right hon. Gentleman as to his confidence in the Naval Council of the Admiralty. He said that the present First Naval Lord had occupied the same position at his own Board; that the Second Naval Lord he had appointed to a most important command of the Channel Squadron; and that the Third Naval Lord had gained great distinction in the Service. And then the right hon. Gentleman said that they were honest men. The right hon. Gentleman had not the slightest complaint to make of their honesty and impartiality; but he said that the country did not feel confidence in the advice they had given. But if they were honest, able, and competent men was not the country to have confidence in their advice?

MR. GOSCHEN: I expressed unreservedly my opinion of the great ability and sailor-like qualities of the Members of the right hon. Gentleman's Board.

MR. HUNT: But the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the country deplored the advice that they had given. He presumed that the right hon. Gentleman did not deplore it, because if he thought them capable and honest he ought to repose confidence in their advice. With regard to the court martial on the loss of the Vanguard it had, under the Naval Discipline Act, two functions to discharge. It was a judicial tribunal as regarded the officers of the Vanguard; and a Court of Inquiry as to the loss of the ship. Its finding as a judicial tribunal was confirmed by the Admiralty; but as regarded that part of the finding which referred to the loss of the ship, neither the Admiralty nor himself was able to concur in it. He had no wish to criticize in any captious spirit the finding of the court martial; but when he read those six causes which were alleged to have brought about the loss of the Vanguard, he was convinced from the first—although he did not know the facts—that it was the finding of a divided body, and that these six causes could never have been agreed upon by the whole of the Members of the Court. Any one who studied that finding must arrive at the same conclusion. What was his duty on receiving the finding of the court martial with the evidence that was put before it? It was to read most carefully—not only the evidence which came from the mouths of the witnesses, but the log-books of the ship. It was his duty to examine the charts and the sailing instructions, and to understand what was the set of the tides on the coast at the time, and, with the assistance of his Naval Colleagues, to come to a decision. The conclusion at which he arrived, with the unanimous assent of his Colleagues, was that Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley were blameless for the disaster; that the two causes of the loss of the Vanguard, so far as regarded culpability, was mentioned by the court martial as the 3rd and 5th causes; and it was on the officers responsible for the action complained of that the displeasure of the Admiralty fell. The right hon. Gentleman had called attention to the first cause, which he said was the high rate of speed at which the Squadron was proceeding, as he said, in a fog. He (Mr. Hunt), however, and his Colleagues were unable to come to the conclusion that there was any ground for that assertion, and it was obvious that the high rate of speed did not cause the disaster uncoupled with other circumstances, and that it did not contribute to the disaster so far as culpability was concerned. It could be shown mathematically that the high rate of speed was not the cause of the disaster. The Squadron, after the operation of formation, was going in two parallel lines, so that one division of the fleet could not collide with the other division. Then came the question of the ships that were following one another. Supposing that two ships were proceeding, one exactly ahead and the other following in the same line and keeping the same speed, it was quite clear that they also would not collide. And what happened? The starboard division, consisting of the flagship and the Hector, was proceeding at the speed ordered until a quarter past 1 on the day of the disaster—holding communication with one another and stopping together—and they proceeded at the speed ordered without accident; while the port division met with the disaster owing to their proceeding at an unequal speed. The Admiralty Minute pointed out that the signal made by the Admiral was not the best that he could have made. He had seen that signal described by some writers in the Press as a "bungling signal." There was, however, no question of a bungling signal in the matter. There were two signals in the Signal Book applicable to the circumstances—one No. 004 and the other No. 017—and it was optional with the Admiral whether he would give one or the other. Taking the Squadron as forming four ships in line, the signal that was given obliged the two hinder ships to go to the left and then to the right, and thus to get into proper formation; whereas the signal recommended by the Admiralty would have ordered the two leading ships to go to the right and then to the left. The result was, as the Admiralty Minute pointed out, that the evolution would have been performed in the least time and at the least rate of speed if the signal they recommended had been given. If that signal had been given, the ships would have proceeded at the rate of seven knots; whereas by the signal actually given, the speed of the two hinder ships had to be increased to eight knots to enable them to come to their station. The right hon. Gentleman said that the signal recommended by the Admiralty would have thrown the ships four cables nearer the shoal than that used. That was quite true; but if it had been used by the Admiral, he would have given the Kish light a wider berth before making the signal. The signal employed had been in use for many years, and until lately had been the only signal in use under similar circumstances. In the Detached Squadron it was the only signal used, and it was not until recently that it had reached the Signal Book. Therefore, the charge that the Admiral had used a bungling signal could not be sustained. He now came to the question what course the Admiral ought to have adopted as to the speed of the Squadron when the fog came on. No one would pretend to say that seven or eight knots an hour was an improper speed for the Squadron to make in fine weather. The Admiral and his Squadron having left Kingstown he had the choice of two passages, the inner and the outer. The inner passage was not recommended to any navigator not perfectly acquainted with the passage, and it would have been imprudent to adopt it with large iron-clads. Therefore the proper course to go by was the outer passage, which the Admiral took, and having rounded the Kish light, he then shaped his course as described in the evidence given before the court martial, and he made a signal that he was proceeding at seven knots. The port division of the Squadron, the Vanguard ahead and the Iron Duke following it, performed the evolution which had been ordered by the signal; they had before the fog came on got into their proper course, though they had not got into their station; they were astern of their station, but they had got into their proper course. The fog came on very suddenly; it had been clear just before. The fog did not come up ahead of them; the banks were seen on the Welsh coast on their left, and ahead it was clear, or moderately clear. He was told that in the weather in the state in which it was described in the log-book ships would be visible at a distance of 10 or 12 miles, and it was known as a matter of evidence that the only ship in sight from the look-out at the masthead of the Vanguard was seven or eight miles distant, and the look-out man saw her hull and was able to describe her rig and the course she was steering. The Admiral therefore knew there was nothing ahead of him, and when the fog fell what did he do? What said the Admiralty Orders? They said the speed was not to exceed three or four knots, except under special circumstances; and there was a special circumstance which the Admiral was bound to regard. He maintained, therefore, that the Admiral was justified in increasing his speed. Alluding to the chart which had been produced, the right hon. Gentleman said the court martial did not have it in evidence, but the court martial had the log of the flagship before it, and if the officers had been asked, they could have marked out the course from it. To make the matter more intelligible—even to himself, for he did not profess to be a skilled reader of logs—he had requested the hydrographer to prepare the chart, and it showed the course steered by the Warrior according to the log. This was shown by a dotted line, and was considerably outside the Codling lightship. The difference between the dotted line and the full line showed the influence of the tide upon the ships in making their course at seven knots speed. There was a line of shoals extending for about 13½ miles between the Kish lightship and the Codling lightship, and the Admiral in his evidence gave as his reason for maintaining speed that he should have been brought in dangerous proximity to the shoals had he slackened his speed. It must be obvious that the action of the tide on a ship going at four knots must be much greater than on a ship going at seven knots, and it would not have been prudent in the Admiral to reduce his speed to anything much less than he had ordered by reason of the tide carrying him towards the shoals, which were in dangerous proximity. In order to illustrate that, he directed the hydrographer to show upon the chart where the star-board division of the Squadron would have been brought supposing the speed had been reduced to four knots; and he found that at 2 o'clock the division would have been in dangerous shoal water, and at 3 o'clock it would have been 1½ miles inside the Codling light ship, outside of which he was bound to keep. It was on this ground that the Admiralty upheld the Admiral in not reducing his speed; and yet because they upheld him in maintaining his speed for what he thought the House would consider a sufficient reason—namely, to avoid the shoals—very hard words had been used about the Admiralty, and about himself in particular—it being said that he was wholly incompetent for the office he filled. The course recommended by his irresponsible advisers in the Press would have brought the Admiral upon the shoals. Was there any real risk in proceeding at the speed of seven knots? The evidence showed that just before a ship could be seen with great particularity seven or eight miles off; and his Naval Advisers informed him that in that state of the atmosphere 12 miles was a moderate distance for ships to be seen from the mast-head. Their opinion was that the risk of meeting anything was almost nil. The only sailing vessel they could have met had been seen at the distance stated away on their port bow and going away from them; and on the course they were pursuing no steamer could have met the Squadron before the speed was reduced by order of the Admiral, except for the space of something over a quarter of a mile. Therefore the risk of proceeding at the speed they did was almost nil, and the risk of reducing speed was very great indeed. The right hon. Gentleman had asked why the Admiral could not have altered his course and also reduced his speed, and that point was not omitted when the matter was under the consideration of the Admiralty. It could only have been done by two sets of signals by gun-fire, with intervals between, which would have sent the ships in the most awkward way across the usual channel for ships approaching Dublin—a double set of signals which no prudent Admiral in command of a Squadron would have thought of giving under the circumstances. He hoped he had said enough to justify the Admiral in maintaining speed, and to show that the Admiralty was not wholly incompetent because it had supported him. With regard to Captain Hickley, he remained on deck until his ship had made the two turns which had been already described, by which his ship was brought into her course, and when he left the deck his ship was in a direct line with her leader. According to the evidence he saw the three masts of the Vanguard in one line, and then came the question, to his (Mr. Hunt's) mind a very important one, whether having brought his ship into that position, he was justified in leaving the deck? The question he put to his Naval Colleagues was this—"Was Captain Hickley transgressing his duty in leaving the deck of the Iron Duke at the time he did?" and the answers of his Colleagues were unanimous. One replied—"When the Vanguard had made her second turn in the evolution order, there was no necessity for Captain Hickley continuing on deck. The officer of the watch had to perform the usual duty of keeping station by his next ahead." The second replied—"The captain was not bound to keep on deck." The third replied—"Captain Hickley was not to blame for leaving the deck. His ship had made the last turn required in evolution, and the officer of the watch had simply to do the ordinary duty of keeping station astern of his next ahead." Captain Hickley had been on deck for two hours and he left it for about 10 minutes, leaving his ship in her right course, and also leaving her—which was important—three cables astern of his leader, it being his duty when he came into station to be two cables astern, and a cable being 200 yards. On leaving the deck, he said he gave directions to the officer of the watch, Lieutenant Evans, not to get astern of his station, and he had only left the deck about 10 minutes when the officer on watch, notwithstanding the directions of his captain, gave the ship what he called a good sheer-out—that was, he left following the wake of his leader, and went out to the left or port, and that was in violation of the Instructions given by the Admiralty. The Instructions were—"During a fog the fleet is to maintain the same order and steer the same course as before the fog came on." Article 9 was to this effect—"Close order is as much as possible to be maintained in the fog." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London had not fallen into the error, but a great deal of the commentary on the action of the Admiralty amounted to this—it was said they punished the man who did the right thing—to sheer out of the line and get rid of all collision. But that was not in the mind of those who framed the Instructions; in the wake of their leader they had to keep in line, and, therefore, to sheer out of the wake of the leader was wrong. The fault of the officer of the watch, therefore, was this—he neglected the order of his captain, and violated these positive Instructions during the fog. What did Captain Hickley do? When he returned to deck he said—"You have sheered out of the course; we must put her back again." The officer of the watch had increased the speed, and he made no alteration in the speed of the ship at the time. But they had it in evidence that the Iron Duke could not make more than 8½ knots. The Vanguard had immediately before the fog signalled that she was going 8 knots. No signal had reached the Iron Duke that that speed had been reduced, and therefore Captain Hickley was justified in supposing that she maintained that speed until another signal reached him. The Iron Duke was three cables astern of the Vanguard, one more than she ought to have been, and in regaining her position, the sheer-out by the officer of the watch of the Iron Duke would have put her more astern, because, instead of going in a straight line, sheering-out and sheering-in must have increased the distance; and the captain of the Iron Duke gave the order to sheer in again, it being his duty to regain the position which the officer of the watch had lost as soon as possible. What said the Instructions? The speed of the fleet during the performance of evolutions should be notified beforehand, and should not exceed that easily attainable by the slowest ship present, so that each ship, when manœuvring, should be able to hold on, and not resort to increasing speed, so as to regain her station without delay. It was therefore the duty of the Iron Duke to regain her position without delay. This matter had also been very carefully considered and worked out by diagram, and at the speed the Iron Duke was going, if the speed of the Vanguard had been maintained, at the moment the collision actually occurred she would have been more than two cables astern of her leader, and therefore in a perfectly safe position. If she had kept her course without having been sheered out, if she had gone in the straightest line, going at 8½ knots, the Iron Duke would have been two-and-a-quarter cables behind the Vanguard. On that ground the Admiralty upheld Captain Hickley with regard to the speed of his ship at the time of the collision. Now, as regarded Captain Dawkins, of the Vanguard—what was his fault? His fault was that he suddenly reduced the speed of his ship from 42 revolutions to 25, and then to 18, in the course of two minutes without any answering signal from the ship behind him. That was a very grave error, and that was the error which mainly caused the disaster they were now discussing. He ought not to have reduced his speed without a signal from the Admiral. But he might have reduced his speed without a signal from the Admiral and yet done no harm. He might have fallen out of his station, but he need not have caused the destruction of his ship. It was a rule in the Service—and it was alluded to, for a question was put to a witness on the point before the Court-martial—that no signal was valid till it was answered. If he made a signal it must be answered before it was valid; but he reduced the speed of his ship twice without waiting for the return of the signal, and consequently without notice to the ship that was following her. No doubt what contributed to the disaster—and for which they must not very heavily blame Captain Dawkins—was an alarm of a ship ahead; but the fact was the order to reduce speed was given before the alarm was raised. Captain Dawkins himself said the order to stop had no effect, because he immediately saw his ship would clear the vessel, and the order was given to go on. Indeed, the vessel seemed to be the veritable "phantom ship;" he could not make out whether Captain Dawkins had any certainty in his own mind that there was any ship ahead, and certainly the man who gave the alarm had defective vision. There were several look-out men aloft and on deck, and none of them ever saw the ship at all. From the evidence there could be no such ship, because a few minutes before only one was seen, and that was steering a course away from the Squadron. The evidence of the look-out man at the mast-head of the Vanguard was that he could only see the fleet. If Captain Dawkins had his wits about him he would have said—"There can be no such ship ahead;" but he sheered out of his course. He did not attach much blame to Captain Dawkins on that head, because the collision would not have happened but for the improper reduction of the speed by Captain Dawkins' order, or, if at all, it would have been a very slight one, had it not been for the sheering out of line. The action of the officer of the watch of the Iron Duke contributed in no slight degree to the disaster. He believed he had now sufficiently explained the view he took of the real cause of the disaster. But there was another question—he did not think the right hon. Gentleman alluded to it—that was, the disapprobation expressed in the Admiralty Minute of the view put before the Court by the Admiral in command with regard to the reduction of the speed. He upheld him in continuing his speed, but when examined before the Court the Admiral was asked whether Captain Dawkins was justified in reducing his speed without his orders. He said that, as a matter of opinion, he might be. That was a curious answer. The evidence showed that no orders were given to that effect, because when the question was specially asked whether any such orders had been given he said "No." He had not asked the Admiral for any explanation of this, but he supposed that he was betrayed into that expression of opinion from an amiable desire to extenuate the error that had been committed. If he had said "Certainly not," Captain Dawkins must have been convicted, of course, at once. But he went further than that. Supposing that the Admiral had given positive orders to Captain Dawkins that he was at liberty to reduce speed without a signal from him, that would not have justified him in reducing his speed as he did—he reduced his speed without exchanging signals with those behind him. Then it was said—if not by the right hon. Gentleman, by the Press—why did we not bring the Admiral to a Court-martial? Now, that sounded very plausible, and it was the obvious course for a man in his position to take who wished to evade responsibility. To have had him tried by Court-martial, when he did not consider him to blame, would have rendered it necessary for him (Mr. Hunt) to have preferred a specific charge against him which he did not believe, and for which he thought there was no foundation; but then he should have escaped all obloquy from the public and the Press. He thought that would have been a weak, cowardly, and contemptible course. He satisfied himself after a most laborious examination of the evidence, assisted by his Naval Colleagues, and fortified by their deliberate opinion, that Admiral Tarleton was entirely blameless as regarded the disaster, and to bring Admiral Tarleton to a Court-martial on a charge he did not believe in, would have shown him to be entirely unworthy of the position he ought to hold. Mistakes he might make, and who did not? He claimed no infallibility of judgment; but no one could say that, being placed in a high position, he had shirked responsibility, and endeavoured to throw on others what he ought to take himself. Having made up his mind that the Admiral was not to blame, he felt bound to assert his opinion, and carry it out, and he was not to be deterred from doing so by any fear of newspaper vituperation or Parliamentary attack. Of course, he had known what was in store for him, for days before the official evidence of the Court-martial reached him, he had been told by writers in the Press exactly what he ought to do. But it was his duty to look for assistance in professional matters to his responsible Advisers, and having consulted them, he had stated in the Minute—which was his own—what he conscientiously believed to be right. It had been said that he would punish a lieutenant but not an Admiral. Well, in answer to that, he might remind the House that he had already shown that his Predecessor had punished two Admirals without a Court-martial, and beyond that, the first year he was in office an accident happened to a detached Squadron—two of the vessels got on the Solent rocks—and not being satisfied that the orders of the Admiral had not contributed to the disaster, he had him tried by Court-martial. On the present occasion he was satisfied that the Admiral was not to blame, and therefore no Court-martial was held. It was quite clear that the lieutenant of the watch had committed a grave error, but it was said he had been punished too severely. Those who held that language were evidently not aware of the difference of such a sentence in the case of lieutenants as compared with officers of higher rank. It was no doubt a sharp punishment for a lieutenant at the time, but it did not militate long against him, and he hoped the lieutenant in question would yet do good service to his Queen and country. However, having neglected the injunctions of his captain and violated the orders given to the Navy with regard to proceeding in a fog, it was absolutely necessary that he should be visited with some degree of punishment. He believed he had dealt with all the points it was necessary to bring under the notice of the House. He hoped the House would be satisfied that the matter had not been treated lightly or without due inquiry and proper investigation with regard to all the circumstances connected with it. They had been told that the Admiralty ought not to deal with the cases of officers without subjecting them to a Court-martial. He admitted there were cases where it might be well to do so, and it sometimes happened that such inquiries did not elicit the whole of the circumstances. And sometimes there was a conflict of evidence on material points which would induce the Admiralty not to deal with the matter on their own responsibility.

Mr. Hunt

It was not so here, however; the inquiry was complete and full. There was no conflict of testimony upon any material point, and the facts were all clear before them. The only question was the right inference to be drawn from the facts, and the Admiralty was the proper authority to draw them, and state them in an authoritative manner. He had been asked what he was going to do with the Squadron in future, and his reply was that he hoped to give them more practice than they had had lately. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) that it was desirable to do so, but it was not his fault that he could not send the Reserve Squadron for practice in 1874, because in that year he had not a Reserve ship fit to go to sea. Practice was the soul of efficiency, but in 1874 no squadron evolutions could be performed with Reserve ships, and he had to send them out singly for the best practice that could be had. Last year, however, they were in a position to send out seven ships. It was his wish to give both officers and men more practice than they had had lately, and for the first time, and with the advice of his Naval Colleagues, he intended to utilize the training brigs in winter to practise young lieutenants and young men. Hitherto they had only been used in summer for training boys, but the last season they had to perform double duty. There were five brigs, and he hoped that arrangements might be made to give more practice to the crews of the Reserve ships, and he felt certain that the more that was given to them both officers and men would become more efficient in duty, and that such disasters as these would not be repeated.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, that the officers of the Navy with whom he had conversed were at a loss to understand how it was that the Lords of the Admiralty, whom he (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) believed to be able and competent men, could have issued the Minute referred to, except that they had been led into a very grave error. He wished to know who it was at the Admiralty that issued it, and why they punished the lieutenant and allowed the Admiral to go free, and why Captain Hickley had been let off and Captain Dawkins punished? There was an unanimous feeling in the Navy that a Court-martial ought to have been held on Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley, and the other officers of the Iron Duke, whereby they would have known more of the circumstances connected with the collision than was known at present. It was even a matter of astonishment that Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley had not themselves demanded a Court of Inquiry. For himself, he was quite sure that the holding of a Court-martial on those officers would have been to the benefit to the advantage of the Service. Analyzing the evidence given in the Court-martial upon the officers of the Vanguard, he drew the conclusion from it that upon entering the fog at a high rate of speed it was the duty of the Admiral to have made signals for slackening speed. Instead of doing so, however, he went ahead at the same speed which prevailed before the fog, and that was the result. The Vanguard and Iron Duke had to race into position and go ahead as fast as possible, at the same time the Admiral pursuing his course utterly regardless of the position of the two ships. Yet they were told by the right hon. Gentleman that speed had nothing to do with the disaster—that speed had not contributed to it; he contended, on the other hand, that the Admiral had not kept the fleet well in hand. The failure of the Admiral to do that was, in his (Mr. Hanbury Tracy's) opinion, and in that of many naval officers, the main cause of the disaster. It would have been desirable, with regard to the loss of the Vanguard, to know what the officers of the Hector saw, and until we did so we were not in a position to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on the subject. He was well aware that the reputation of Admiral Tarleton stood very high; but then junior officers were punished, and, putting aside all matters of detail, there could be no doubt that, whether the Board of Admiralty were right or wrong in their decision, a Court-martial on the Admiral would have brought out many facts, while its appointment would have been far more satisfactory to the public as well as to the Navy. If there had been a Court-martial, he could not help thinking that the blame would have attached not to the Navy, but to the Admiralty. The First Lord had spoken of the Admiralty as being superior to any Court-martial, but up to 1860 Courts-martial were superior to every other tribunal—that was to say, there was no appeal from their decisions, which they could arrive at without any fear of an Admiralty Minute. Unfortunately, the Act of 1860 was passed, giving to the Admiralty an Appellate Jurisdiction. And why? It was acknowledged in the House of Lords that this Appellate Jurisdiction was asked for the Admiralty because it was necessary to have junior officers sitting at our Courts-martial. He apprehended, however, that it never was intended that the Admiralty should upset the decisions solemnly and deliberately arrived at of a Court composed of the senior officers of the Fleet. The First Lord had said that this was both a Court-martial and a Court of Inquiry. It was a Court presided over by an Admiral and Commander of the Channel Fleet. We had nine senior officers to inquire into the loss of the Vanguard, and no one could say that their decision was not arrived at with the greatest deliberation and without fear or favour. Was it right, therefore, that the Admiralty should go and issue a Minute upsetting that decision? The effect of such a course on the part of the Admiralty was to declare to the world that it did not agree with the professional opinions of our senior officers.

SIR JOHN HAY: Sir, as one of the very few naval officers who have seats in the present Parliament, I trust the House will allow me to say what I believe to be the general opinion of the Navy in regard to the deplorable accident now under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) has stated the case so fully and so fairly that I shall not weary the House by recapitulating the circumstances which led to and followed this great naval disaster. But, first of all, I must take exception to the new system, adopted of recent years by the Admiralty, of supplementing or reversing the sentences of Courts-martial, and I must express my surprise and regret that my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has deemed it to be his duty to sanction the issue of this Minute, and now to justify it to the House. The first instance of attempting to reflect upon the judgment of a Court-martial by Minute was in the case of the loss of the Captain, against which I have, in common with many hon. Friends of mine on this side of the House, constantly protested; but I shall not further allude to that case except to express my sorrow for the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) from our debates, and my sincere sympathy for him in the sad circumstances which explain his absence. But it is the less necessary for me to allude to that Minute because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London also afforded an example of over-ruling the sentence of a Court-martial by a Minute in the memorable case of the Agincourt disaster. The Agincourt struck on the Pearl Rock; a Court-martial was assembled to try the captain and officers and crew of the Agincourt for the stranding of their ship. The Court-martial sentenced them as in their judgment it thought fit, and the sentence was discredited by the Admiralty of the day, over which the right hon. Gentleman presided, in obedience to ignorant public clamour. In this case the Admiralty acted by Minute because it thought that the sentence was not severe enough. Not only I myself, but, if I am not mistaken, my lamented Friend the late Mr. Corry challenged the course taken by the Admiralty with regard to the Agincourt disaster. I have always held, and I now hold, the opinion that Admiral Wellesey and Admiral Wilmot, two very distinguished officers, were very illused by being dismissed from their commands, and discredited without having the opportunity afforded them of defending themselves before a Court-martial. I do not say whether they were right or wrong. I express no opinion. They might have been found guilty if they had been tried, but they ought to have had that to which every Englishman has a right—a trial by his Peers. Now, this is the bad precedent which my right hon. Friend has thought it his duty to follow in this case; and I am the more surprised at it, because he has already shown the House that he knew what it was just and right to do under similar circumstances. In Admiral Randolph's case, to which reference has been made, my right hon. Friend took the right course. Admiral Randolph was much blamed by the Press, because two of the ships of his squadron went ashore on the coast of Sicily. The officers were tried by Court-martial, and so afterwards was Admiral Randolph, and upon his trial it was satisfactorily proved that he was not guilty, and that gallant officer must thank his stars that he was tried by Court-martial. In the present case it seems to me the unkindest thing ever done to Admiral Sir Walter Tarleton was not to submit his conduct to the judgment of a Court-martial. As it is now, he could hardly have been in a worse position if he had been tried and found guilty; his reputation is in danger of being shipwrecked, because he has had no opportunity of defending himself in a public manner before an open Court. I have the greatest respect and esteem for Sir Walter Tarleton. He has served the country with distinction and great ability for 40 years, and now he has not a fair opportunity given him to explain publicly his share in this deplorable disaster, and to show at least in what degree he is responsible for it. I say the same as regards Captain Hickley. I have not the honour of knowing that gallant officer, but I have always heard him spoken of as an excellent officer. Why has he had no opportunity of explaining the facts of the case, and his share in the transaction? My right hon. Friend asserts that he could frame no charge on which to try these officers; but it seems to me a charge could have easily been framed on which to try them, as it was against Admiral Randolph. By the course adopted by the Admiralty, my right hon. Friend has done much to discredit the authority of Courts-martial. These tribunals are the only means left to maintain the discipline of the Navy. It is very dangerous to tamper with their decisions; their judgments should be upheld; and I believe, in my heart, that the Admiralty is weakening the discipline of the Navy everytime they publish wretched Minutes like these I have alluded to, disparaging the decisions of Courts-martial. In this case the Court was one whose authority was well deserving of respect. It was presided over by a noble and gallant Friend of mine, well known to many hon. Members—Lord John Hay. There were two Admirals on the Court, the President being at the time second in command of a squadron of iron-clads, and Admiral Chamberlain, an officer who had commanded an iron-clad. The seven captains all had commanded, or were commanding, iron-clads. These nine officers were all experienced in the subject they had to consider, and it must be remembered that in coming to the decision at which they arrived, they were establishing a precedent against themselves. A similar accident to that which befell Captain Dawkins might befall any one of them, and their decision upon Captain Dawkins might at any moment come to be applied to themselves. I ask—could there have been a fairer or more competent tribunal? Now, my right hon. Friend—not, of course, of his own authority—chooses to set at nought and to differ from the judgment of this Court. His naval Colleagues are personal Friends of mine. The name of Sir Alexander Milne carries the greatest weight with the naval profession; both he and Admiral Hornby have commanded fleets and squadrons, and Lord Gilford is an officer of very high reputation, who has also commanded an iron-clad in a fleet. Their names as members of any Court-martial would add weight to its decisions, or as witnesses before a Court their evidence would be entitled to the highest respect. I would not for a moment ask the House to accept my judgment in preference to theirs; but is it to be said that these three gentlemen, however distinguished, forming their judgment by reading the evidence and without hearing and seeing the witnesses, and without the weight of responsibility which devolved upon the sworn Members of a Court-martial could possibly come to a decision which would command equal confidence with that arrived at by the nine officers composing the Court. In my opinion the sentence was a stern and severe one. I confess, when I read it at first in the newspapers, I thought it a hard sentence, and regretted that the Court had not said something complimentary as to the discipline and good behaviour of the men of the Vanguard—had not entirely removed the stigma unjustly cast upon Captain Collins, a marine officer who had already elsewhere distinguished himself for conspicuous gallantry in action—had not said something complimentary of Lieutenant Hathorn, the officer of the watch of the Vanguard, the only officer of those tried who was entirely acquitted of all blame, and who the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for the City of London informs us was 600 down the list of lieutenants. But for all that the Court deserved to be upheld and its decision respected. My right hon. Friend the first Lord has said that the sentence was one which showed divided councils. Why should he say so? There is no evidence of divided councils, nor is this a matter into which either he or this House have any right to inquire. The sentence of a Court-martial is the sentence of the whole Court. The decision is the decision of the majority, but the members are sworn to secrecy, and no knowledge of the votes of individual members can be obtained without breaking a solemn oath. In Admiral Byng's case this House was appealed to, to pass an Act to enable Members of the Court who were also Members of this House to divulge the individual opinions of the Members of the Court. It was refused, and since that no such attempt has been made, until my right hon. Friend has thought fit to allude to divided councils. I may mention that a naval Court-martial differs from a military Court-martial in this—that when it is once formed it owns no higher authority. A military Court-martial cannot promulgate its sentence or dissolve itself, until the sentence has been approved by the highest authority. Its sentence may be sent back for revision, or entirely set aside; but a naval Court-martial cannot have its sentence revised, for so soon as it has decided upon the evidence it proceeds to pass its sentence upon the prisoner by dismissing him from the service or sentencing him to punishment under the Naval Discipline Act. It then dissolves itself, and exists no longer, and the Admiralty cannot express its disapproval of the sentence to the President or any other Member of the Court, because the person so accused may have voted in the manner the Admiralty may have desired, but is unable to say so for fear of violating his oath. It is true that sentence of death is not carried out without the approval of a higher authority, and that after sentence of dismissal the Admiralty have power to restore the officer to the profession, but the Admiralty cannot annul the sentence.

Sir John Hay

MR. HUNT: By the Naval Discipline Act the Admiralty have a power to modify and revise the sentence.

SIR JOHN HAY: Yes, after it is passed; but the sentence cannot be annulled or sent back to the Court-martial for revision. All the Admiralty can do is to prevent the sentence being carried into effect. Now my right hon. Friend says the Court-martial was a Court-martial to try Captain Dawkins and his officers, and a Court of Inquiry to inquire into other circumstances attending the loss of the Vanguard. I entirely deny that a Court-martial is a Court of Inquiry. A Court-martial tries prisoners for stated offences submitted to it and the prisoners have the opportunity of defending themselves; but it has no power to inquire into the conduct or character of persons not before it. The Court-martial says that Captain Dawkins and others are culpable, and sentences them accordingly, and acquits others of blame. It further says that the evidence before it seems to make it possible that other causes are to blame. It is the business of the Admiralty to give the persons so reflected upon an opportunity of defending or explaining their conduct and this can only be afforded them before another Court-martial. I blame the Admiralty for issuing the Minute at all; but having issued the Minute, I blame them for this—namely, for justifying a fleet of iron-clads in the narrow seas, in steaming seven knots an hour in a fog. Instead of being a protection to our commerce they are a danger to it, and are not sufficiently under command to avoid collisions with peaceful traders. This speed is entirely at variance with the Admiralty Order in the Signal Book which enjoins an Admiral to reduce the speed of his fleet to three or four knots an hour. Will the House forgive me if I endeavour to explain the reason for giving this Order? I will endeavour to divest my explanation as much as possible of technical language, if the House will bear with me. A screw ship has a peculiar advantage over ships propelled by paddles or sails. If, even when the ship is at rest, the screw propeller is put in motion, and the rudder is turned to one side or the other, the water is thrown off the propeller against the side of the rudder, and the direction of the ship's head is at once altered by the stern of the ship being turned, and this before the action of the screw has caused the ship herself to be moved ahead through the water. I may say that on one occasion I commanded a screw line-of-battle ship, and brought her from Cape St. Vincent to St. Katherine's in a thick fog, and without seeing anything but one yacht under my dolphin striker. That yacht was so well handled that she may have belonged to my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) and when his flare-up was burnt I ordered the screw to be turned rapidly for a few revolutions, which enabled my ship's head to turn so quickly as to slip past the yacht without touching her. But our speed was not more than three knots, for if it had been seven, my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk might not have been here to give us the information which I am sure we shall hear from him in the course of this debate. The First Lord of the Admiralty says there were special circumstances, but what were the special circumstances? An hon. Friend of mine, a gallant Admiral, for whose opinion on all subjects I entertain a very high respect, Sir Cooper Key, addressed a letter to the newspapers, in which he justified Sir Walter Tarleton's speed by asserting that it was necessary to overcome the tide. I thought when I read that letter, and before I had seen the chart, that Sir Walter Tarleton had taken his squadron down the inner channel between the Kish Bank and Bray Head, in which case he would in my opinion, have certainly been justified in getting out of the dangerous channel as soon as possible, unless he had thought fit to bring them to an anchor. But I confess I do not see the necessity for maintaining a high speed to the eastward of the Kish Bank. In my opinion, unless there was some special circumstance with which I am unacquainted, it would have been best to have made a signal to reduce speed to that enjoined by the Admiralty, and to have altered course more to the east. There was nothing between the fleet and the Welsh coast, and a slight change of course would have overcome the indraught of the tide. Then I am not satisfied as to the reasons why signals were not made. My right hon. Friend says that the slackening of speed and the alteration of course would have involved two signals. Well, why not? One of the special objects of a squadron of evolution is to practise signals. The squadron had nearly completed its cruise, and no doubt had been properly drilled in this necessary duty. In efficient ships guns on the same side and of the same calibre are kept loaded, with a man ready to fire each in succession, and some spare guns ready to fire for fear any gun should miss fire, and an error be caused in the significance of the signal by a longer period elapsing between the discharges of the guns than is specified in the particular signal. In the evidence I regret to see that a gun of an improper calibre was fired at the wrong time, but this, no doubt, was not an error which can justly be attributed to the Admiral. Then there is the evidence as to the Vanguard and Iron Duke being seen at a distance of eight miles at two o'clock, just when one of them was sinking, instead of at four cables' distance, as ordered by the last signal. It surely would be to Admiral Tarleton's advantage to be able to explain to a Court-martial the special circumstances which prevented him ascertaining by signal the cause of these ships, half his fleet, being out of station—whether, in fact, it was ever reported to him. Again, I should like to know why Captain Hickley was right in being off deck before his ship had regained his station, and why Captain Dawkins was wrong? If there was an excuse for Captain Hickley, there might surely have been an excuse for Captain Dawkins. The Vanguard would certainly not have been sunk if the Iron Duke had not run into her, and the Iron Duke would not have run into her if she had not altered her course at a high rate of speed. I must say that sufficient importance is not attached, in my opinion, to Captain Dawkins' evidence as to the ship which was under his bows. I hold the Blue Book in my hand in which, no doubt, every hon. Member has read Captain Dawkins' letter, in which he states that he himself saw the vessel under his bows. He could hardly have been mistaken, and if he had not altered his course and perhaps slowed his engines, another catastrophe might have occurred with, perhaps, considerable loss of life. I have no personal knowledge of Captain Hickley, and I have a great respect for Sir Walter Tarleton; but, if I had been in the place of either of these distinguished officers, I would never have been satisfied until a Court-martial had been assembled before which I could have made my explanation and defence. In my opinion, it is not even now too late, and I see no difficulty whatever in framing the charges. I am sorry to differ from my right hon. Friend, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London is equally culpable with himself for setting the bad example of the course pursued. I thank the House for having heard me, and I trust the officers concerned will forgive me if I have said anything which may appear harsh with respect to their conduct.

Sir John Hay

ADMIRAL EGERTON, referring to the "phantom ship" alluded to by the First Lord of the Admiralty, said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the suddenness with which vessels came into sight out of a fog-bank, and, indeed, he was far from being satisfied that the ship in question had not crossed the Vanguard's bows just before the accident occurred, a fact which a second court martial might have elicited. He could not help thinking that it would have been a great advantage to Admiral Tarleton, if he had had an opportunity of explaining the extraordinary opinions he expressed with respect to the conduct of officers under his command. He did not, however, think that the speed at which the vessels were going was one of the main causes of the accident, and he believed that the collision was to be attributed to the conduct of the young officer of the watch, who had acted most unjustifiably in sheering the Iron Duke out of her course. The Admiralty had been more lenient in the punishment of that young officer than a court martial would have been, and he rejoiced to think that the time might come when that young officer would have an opportunity of redeeming his error and of becoming an ornament to the Service. He was satisfied that, even at this late hour, the appointment of a court martial to try Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley would meet with the approbation of the whole Service, and even if the verdict of the Court were against them, those gentlemen would stand in a far higher position than they did at the present moment in the view of all naval officers. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the First Lord of the Admiralty would re-consider his decision.

CAPTAIN PIM, in moving, as an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Member (Mr. Goschen)—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the opportunity should be afforded to the Admiral in Command, Vice Admiral Sir Walter Tarleton, K.C.B. of clearing his reputation by being tried by a Court Martial," said, that during the 30 years that he (Captain Pim) had been in Her Majesty's service, in all parts of the world

he had never heard of a more deplorable circumstance than the loss of the Vanguard. The Minute of the Admiralty on the subject had also caused great dissatisfaction throughout the Service. He was sorry to say that there was discontent both among officers and men in the Navy, and the extent to which the discontent prevailed among the latter was shown by the number of desertions which increased every year. In 1874 there were no fewer than 800 desertions, last year the number had risen to 1,100, and no doubt this year it would still further increase. He believed that if a court martial were granted to enable Admiral Tarleton to clear his reputation, it would give great satisfaction to the Service, and it was with that view he proposed the Amendment.

MR. NORWOOD, in seconding the Amendment, expressed his opinion that the explanation given that night by the First Lord was not altogether satisfactory. The action of the Admiralty, on two points, had served to attract attention of an unfavourable character from the public at large. One was, that the Admiralty had absolved Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley from all blame, and had refused to submit their conduct to an inquiry by court martial, and the other point was, that, at the same time, they had dismissed a young lieutenant from his ship. What was the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman? He had said that the Admiralty had an Appellate Jurisdiction and possessed powers superior to those of a court martial, and that, having read the evidence, and examined charts, he had concluded that neither Admiral Tarleton nor Captain Hickley was to blame. Therefore, it was that the Admiralty declined to put those officers on their trial by court martial. But the nation had suffered a heavy loss in the sinking of the Vanguard, and in his (Mr. Norwood's) opinion every person implicated in that loss, however remotely, should have been brought to trial, and either punished or completely cleared of all blame in the matter. In the Mercantile Marine, whenever an accident occurred, a Board of Trade Inquiry was held, and the whole affair was sifted and its details laid clearly before the public, and it was of equal importance that the same course should be taken in the event of disaster to our Navy. It was most unsatisfactory to the country at large that the right hon. Gentleman and his professional Advisers should have thought fit to set aside the deliberate decision of a court martial of unexceptional authority, and should have refused to allow of further inquiry being made into the cause of the accident. As it was, the First Lord of the Admiralty had thought fit to screen two officers, one having command of a most important Squadron, the other commanding one of our largest ships, and to avoid the full inquiry which the nation had a right to expect. In his opinion, it was a most extraordinary statement that the high rate of speed at which the vessels were going in a fog had not contributed to the accident, and to show the difference of treatment as to the Mercantile Marine he might instance that one of his steamers had been found to blame by the Judge of the Court of Admiralty because she had run over another vessel while proceeding in a fog at the rate of only four-and-a-half miles an hour. The argument that it would have been difficult to alter the fleet's rate of speed, because it would have entailed a change of course to avoid running on to the Kish shoal was absurd, because there could be no difficulty in vessels obeying two simple and well-understood signals in succession. He could not attempt to vouch for the accuracy of the statement; but he had certainly heard it stated that the officers were fêted in every place at which the Squadron touched; that the state of discipline was lax; and that, as a matter of fact, the ships were steaming at a high rate of speed at the time of the accident in order that the officers might reach Cork sufficiently early to be present at a ball which had been arranged for their amusement. Whether that was or was not true, he could not help regretting that the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London was not more definite in its character. The clear duty of the Leaders of the Opposition was to raise a distinct issue, and to ask the opinion of the House as to whether the First Lord of the Admiralty had performed his duty with a stern determination to maintain the high honour, position, and discipline of Her Majesty's Navy, and whether it was not just to Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley to deny them an opportunity of defending their conduct before the Service and the country?

Captain Pim

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "in the opinion of this House the opportunity should be afforded to the Admiral in Command, Vice Admiral Sir Walter Tarleton, K.C.B. of clearing his reputation by being tried by a Court Martial,"—(Captain Pim,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. BENTINCK said, he fully endorsed the opinion of the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Norwood), that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) was of a very unsatisfactory character; but he was bound to add that he did not think any Motion which the right hon. Gentleman could have brought forward would have been of a satisfactory character. He made that remark in no disparagement to the right hon. Gentleman, but on the ground that the subject was one which that Assembly, with all its talent and ability, was not competent to deal with satisfactorily, because it was a subject involving too much professional detail. When he first read the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman he did not anticipate any good result from it, and the debate upon it so far confirmed that view. Recently there had been a lively discussion as to whether a certain question, which had been before the House, was or was not a Party question. At all events, this could not be considered a Party question. Whatever blame they attached to anybody, both sides of the House were, in his opinion, equally to blame in the matter, for he had no hesitation in saying that the primary cause of the loss of the Vanguard was the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) that one of the more immediate causes of the loss of the ship was her being undermanned; but had not the late Admiralty been guilty of doing the same thing when they were in office? Before bringing forward the Motion then, it would have been well for the right hon. Gentleman to have remembered that when he left office the Navy was in a state of debility and destitution. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt)

had done something, but not so much as might be desired, to repair the errors of his Predecessor. He, however, fully exculpated himself, and made out an excellent case, in reply to the charges brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The subject had much better not have been brought forward for the credit of both sides of the House, for the present state of the Navy was a disgrace to the country. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) said that the ship was amply manned; but it was in evidence that she had landed 170 Coastguard men at Kingstown, and they being absent she was not in a position to deal with the emergency which followed. The Vanguard ought to have been sent away from Kingstown as a crippled ship, not fit to be in company with men-of-war in Squadron. He did not pretend to censure the sentence of the Court-martial—it was composed of men of the highest character, and presided over by one of the most distinguished officers in the Service; but he would make one remark as to the Admiralty Minute. He lamented that that Minute should have endorsed the mischievous doctrine that steamers were to maintain in a fog the rate of speed at which they were going. Why, there was no more cogent cause of collisions at sea than such a practice, and to find it endorsed by the Board of Admiralty—and, therefore, encouraged—was a thing which he could not but deeply deplore. A high rate of speed was the immediate cause of the disaster; for he believed that if speed had been reduced the collision would never have occurred, no discussion would have been necessary, and the Vanguard would have been still afloat. It was urged that by reducing speed the vessels would have been set inside the Codling Bank. Well, he had known the Codling Bank for 50 years, and, unless the tides in the Irish Channel had very much changed of late, the Admiral, by altering his course two points to the eastward, might have reduced his speed and kept clear of the Codling Bank. With respect to Admiral Tarleton, he entirely endorsed the opinion which had been expressed by his right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). He looked upon Admiral Tarleton as a very ill-used man, and hoped he would be afforded an opportunity of relieving himself by the sentence of a Court-martial of probably an unjust imputation. The same observation applied to the officer of the watch of the Iron Duke, Lieutenant Evans. He would not go into the question whether that officer was or was not guilty of a breach of discipline, or orders, in altering the course of the vessel and not reporting the fact immediately to the captain; but he maintained that to alter the course was a sensible and seaman-like thing to do; and further, that if the course as altered had been maintained and persevered in, the disaster which occurred would not have ensued.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had told them that this was a question which the House did not understand—that it was so completely technical that it ought to be decided by another tribunal. Now, whether that House was or was not the proper tribunal to settle the matter under discussion, one thing was certain, and that was that the country at large had formed an opinion upon the causes of this great calamity—namely, that the captain of the Vanguard had been hardly dealt with. The Squadron was going at a reasonable rate of speed, a fog suddenly came on, a ship crossed the bows of the Vanguard, orders were given to change her course to avoid running down that ship, and before the effect of that change was perceptible the Iron Duke appeared, and in 30 seconds the collision occurred. Now, the two transactions were so entirely unexpected that he questioned whether any human foresight could have anticipated, or any human wisdom have prevented, the collision under the circumstances; and if a Court-martial sitting deliberately and determining upon rates of speed, points of steering, and various nautical matters without any sudden emergency to excite them, with plenty of time to deliberate, and no responsibility for the preservation of human life pressing on them, came to the conclusion that Captain Dawkins should have preserved the same coolness as they did when sitting weeks afterwards to decide these questions, he thought such a sentence was one that was eminently severe, rigorous, and unjust. The first charge against Captain Dawkins was, that he left the deck before the evolutions were completed. He had sailed from Kingstown at half-past 10, and was on deck until half-past 12. The Squadron was then well clear of the Kish Bank, no possible danger was anticipated, and he went below for seven minutes and then returned on deck. It appeared that Captain Hickley, on board the Iron Duke, had remained on deck precisely the same time, and had curiously enough gone below for exactly the same time, and yet he was absolved, as if his ship had completed her evolution. He did not mean to cast the slightest imputation on Captain Hickley, but to a landsman it appeared that the same measure of justice should be meted to each, and he was at a loss to understand what neglect of duty there was in the one case that there was not in the other. They were told that there were indications of a fog, but an indication of a fog in the Irish Channel in the month of September meant nothing more than that the sky was not very clear, and most hon. Gentlemen who were in the habit of crossing the Channel must have had experience of fogs, and must know how suddenly they sprung up, particularly at that period of the year. Within seven minutes after Captain Dawkins had gone below he appeared on deck, and he had scarcely done so before it was announced that there was a ship right ahead of him. His first order was to change the course of the Vanguard, he ran forward to see that order executed, and in three minutes from the time when the ship was reported “right ahead” the collision took place. What possible arrangement could be made at that moment? Who could have anticipated that the Iron Duke was so near? There was no time to make any signal to the Iron Duke notifying a change of speed or course on the part of the Vanguard. Again, Captain Dawkins reduced speed, and they had the opinion of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Admiral Egerton) that in doing so he had committed no error. It was a matter of safety and proper precaution, and to condemn Captain Dawkins for lessening speed, while by the same Court-martial the Admiral was blamed for keeping up his rate of speed, was a thing which, to him, was altogether unintelligible. But it was said that Captain Dawkins did not take proper precautions to save the ship after the collision. But the evidence showed that the tremendous collision had misplaced the apparatus for closing the water-tight compartments, and the rush of water was so enormous and so sudden that the saving of the ship under such circumstances was hopelessly impossible. According to the report of the divers, the aperture made in the Vanguard by the collision was 15ft. high by 4ft. broad, and there were 350 tons of water per minute flowing into her, so that no human being could have believed that the vessel would stay afloat for 70 minutes. The likelihood rather was that she would go down in 15 or 20 minutes after the collision. One of the engineers had deposed that in a few minutes he was up to his thighs in water; and in similar circumstances, supposing there was to be a rush of water from the Thames into that House, he apprehended the first thing they would do, would be to look after their own lives, although the occupants of the Treasury bench might sit and deliberate on the best mode of pumping out the water; and so the first thought of the captain was to save the lives of his officers and crew. Captain Dawkins was responsible for 350 lives. By the wise course he adopted he saved every life on board, and if he had wasted precious time in trying to pump out this deluge of water, or trying to stop this breach with sails, every life on board would have been sacrificed. It was not feasible to take the Vanguard in tow, for she had sunk so low that the water had reached to the name of the ship, and if Captain Dawkins, in such a fog, had perilled the lives of his crew by taking such a course it would have been anything but judicious. It had been alleged that the line taken by the Admiralty in differing from the decision of the Court-martial had been adopted in order to screen Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley. He owned that the explanation given that evening by the First Lord of the Admiralty was perfectly satisfactory as to the reasons which had led them not to put Admiral Tarleton on his trial. It had been said that in justice to Admiral Tarleton, Captain Hickley, and the other officers concerned, they ought to have the opportunity of demanding that Court-martial. But by that Admiralty Minute Admiral Tarleton had been entirely exculpated from blame, and he did not see how, after that Minute, the Admiralty could call upon Admiral Tarleton to be tried by Court-martial. All that was imputed to any of the gallant officers concerned, whether condemned or acquitted, was an error of judgment, and the House would remember that 100 years ago a naval court martial had most cruelly condemned a gallant officer to death for an error of judgment. It had been said that Admiral Tarleton must keenly feel his present position, but he would feel it still more keenly, after having been exempted by the Admiralty from all blame, that he should be called upon by the House of Commons to stand his trial as a criminal. He could not help thinking that Captain Dawkins had been treated with great severity—nay, more, with considerable injustice in these proceedings, and trusted that both Captain Dawkins and Lieutenant Evans, who had been condemned, would be speedily restored to the Service.

Mr. Bentinck

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE said, he wished, as the Representative of a large naval constituency, to say a few words by way of protest against the course taken by the Admiralty in this matter. He wished to bear testimony to the moderate and truthful manner in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) had so well put his case, although he must take exception to one or two points of his speech. The first reason given by the Court-martial for its decision was the high rate of speed at which the fleet was going. As an officer who had had some experience of fleets of modern days both in and out of fogs, he saw nothing exceptional or out of the way in the speed at which the Squadron was going. So far as the fleet itself was concerned, five, six, or seven knots an hour was by no means an unsafe speed for the ships under the circumstances. But they had to deal with vessels not belonging to the fleet, and with which they might come into contact, and then arose another question altogether. Captain Dawkins was not called upon to determine whether seven or eight knots an hour was the proper speed. He had his Signal-Book to go by, and he considered that he was at liberty to cast off from the Admiral and fall back on the regular provision made for him by the Admiralty Instructions. The First Lord of the Admiralty stated that the Admiral was obliged to go at a certain speed in order to arrive at his destination at a certain time, and to this it had been very truly replied that it was not necessary he should arrive at Queenstown at any particular time,

Even if two signals had been necessary instead of one, there would have been no difficulty in carrying out the required evolution. He had been in many fogs with the Channel Fleet, and as long as there was not a rough sea or gale blowing there was no excuse for a fleet becoming disorganized in this way. In a fleet properly organized and with a proper complement of signalmen there was not the slightest excuse for disorganization. With regard to Lieutenant Evans, he could not help thinking that one officer had been sacrificed to save another. A great deal had been said about the course of the ship, but he wished to say that during his experience, he had seen the same course taken in several instances, not only by the lieutenant of the watch, but by the captain in charge of the ship, and even by Admirals in charge of their Squadrons. In more than one instance he had known the rather particular formation called quarter line to be taken in a fog in preference to that commonly called line ahead. He could not think the course taken by Lieutenant Evans in sheering the ship to the left hand was calculated to bring about the accident, and it had been ably shown that if the course he began had been pursued no collision would have happened. What caused it was the improperly steering into line of the Iron Duke. When the captain came on deck he found the ship had been sheered out of her course, because Lieutenant Evans—holding views which, though possibly mistaken, were shared by others—thought it safer to be a little on one side than in a straight line with a fog. The captain thought differently, and, finding the ship in the position she was and going at the speed she was, instead of sheering her gradually, reducing speed, and ascertaining whereabouts the Vanguard was, sheered his ship at once towards the line she had been in, and naturally produced the collision. He could not have adopted any other course more likely to produce a collision if he had wished to bring one about, or if the Vanguard had been an enemy's ship which he had chased into the fog. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) had spoken of the fact that a large portion of the crew had been left at Kingstown, but he (Captain G. E. Price) did not think that that could have had anything to do with the matter, seeing that such ships were navigated less by blue-jackets than by stokers and officers in charge, and more especially by signalmen; and he regretted that the Returns did not show the numbers and rating of the different descriptions of men on board, because he feared there was not the proper proportion of fully-qualified signalmen. Then as to the purpose and intention of the cruise, though the right hon. Gentleman opposite was very moderate in the present tone of his speech, yet in one part of it he said in effect to the present Board of Admiralty—"Look at what you did; you sent the fleet round the coasts of the country for the purpose of gaining popularity." He (Captain G. E. Price) thought that was a pity, for he could say from his own experience that the Channel Fleet had visited more important places than this Reserve Squadron did, such as Belfast, Greenock, Liverpool, and Holyhead, stayed longer at them, and received more hospitality, extending to as many as 30 balls in 10 days, or three or four a-night; and, if the nursery of the fleet might accept so much hospitality, he could not see why the veterans of the Reserve should be denied their share. It had been said that if the Vanguard had been taken in tow she might have been saved to the country. He did not think that was possible. He had been concerned in the towing of the Floating Dock to Bermuda, and, therefore had enjoyed the advantages of some experience in such business, but he believed it would have been futile and absurd to have made any attempt to tow the Vanguard, full of water as she was, with her men trying to save the ship until they had to save themselves; and if the Vanguard had been towed into shallow water she would have been less safe than she was at present, because on the Kish Bank she would have knocked herself all to pieces. As to the popular demand for a Court-martial on the officers, and the reference that had been made to Admiral Byng, that officer was not shot in deference to public opinion; he was put out of the way to divert public attention from the mismanagement of the Admiralty. On that occasion, the public thought they saw an attempt on the part of a British officer to avoid an action with an enemy, and on this occasion they thought they saw officers screened from justice. Foreign nations looked up to us with the greatest respect in matters of organization and discipline, and it was to be regretted that there should appear on the part of the Admiralty a shirking of the fullest investigation. Notwithstanding his criticisms, he felt sympathy for the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was not so responsible for this result as was generally supposed. A good deal had been said as to the Naval Advisers of the Board of Admiralty; but if the right hon. Gentleman who brought forward this subject had been First Lord at the time this accident happened, and if he had received, as he would no doubt have received, the very same advice as the present head of the Admiralty received from his Naval Advisers, he doubted whether he would not have followed precisely the same course. If he did not, he would have been setting himself up with that consummate ignorance which all First Lords of the Admiralty had on naval affairs, upon a professional point against the advice of some of the best officers of the Navy. He could not vote for the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but he must record his protest against the action the Admiralty had taken, and against the system which rendered such action possible.

Captain G. E. Price

MR. T. BRASSEY said, he had long been convinced that the Admiralty kept too large a proportion of our young officers and seamen in harbour ships, and, in his view, the necessity for increasing the number of sea-going ships in commission was conspicuously brought out in the course of proceedings at the Court-martial at Devonport. In order to show the urgent need for more experienced seamen in the Navy, he would refer to some details of the evidence given by various witnesses. Was it not unsatisfactory that the men who were placed in the most responsible positions, such as look-out men and signal men, were only ordinary seamen? An ordinary seaman was stationed as look-out man at the top-mast head of the Vanguard who had been only eight months in a sea-going ship. At the top-mast-head of the Iron Duke there was also an ordinary seaman who, when asked how many cables' length the Vanguard was distant from the Iron Duke when last seen, replied that he did not know the meaning of the word cable. The entire management and manœuvring of a ship by the officers in command might depend on the experience and judgment of the men on the look-out aloft, and if they were not efficient the gravest consequences might ensue. The case of Lieutenant Evans had repeatedly been mentioned, and it must be a source of great regret to find that a lieutenant placed in charge of one of our most costly ships on a critical occasion was an officer who, although he had held a lieutenant's commission for three years, had only been three months in a sea-going ship. The seaman placed as a look-out on board the Vanguard was an ordinary seaman, and it was in consequence of his reporting a ship ahead that the Vanguard stopped and the collision followed. It turned out that this seaman had been treated twice for blindness in the right eye, which was the organ directed to the supposed ship. The state of the signal department in the Iron Duke was most unsatisfactory. Not only was the officer of signals imperfectly acquainted with his duty, but the signalman whose duty it was to report signals, and whose efficiency depended on the full possession of the faculty of hearing, was stone-deaf in one ear. The stoking department in the Iron Duke was also in an inefficient state. In short, the results of the inquiry as to the loss of the Vanguard had revealed the fact that there were a great many inefficient seamen in the fleet, and we had not been without a warning on the subject from other sources. Within the last 12 months two very able lectures on the condition and training of the fleet had been delivered by Captain Wilson, who had just completed a term of three years' service as captain in charge of the training establishments of the Royal Navy. It had been shown that they only trained enough boys to keep up the number of seamen voted for service in the fleet, and yet while the number of boys was kept at the minimum, the sea-going ships in commission could only take three-fifths of those youths to sea who left the training-ships, so that the remaining two-fifths, instead of being sent to sea were sent to harbour-ships. Having shown some of the evils of the present system, he might be asked what remedies could be applied. He thought the initiation of the Flying Squadron by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract was exceedingly valuable. The annual cruise of the Channel Squadron was also valuable, and he was delighted to hear that it was in contemplation to extend the duration of that cruise in future years. These were steps in the right direction. It was, however, to be regretted that so many fine seamen were to be seen employed in harbour ships, and that something more should not be done with the view to give more thorough training at sea to the young seamen of the fleet. He trusted that the Admiralty would feel justified in making proposals for the building of vessels of a class which might be used for the purpose of instructing men in seamanship, and could be attached as tenders to our present training-ships at Portsmouth and Plymouth. It might be said that to send officers and seamen to sea in sailing-ships would be an imperfect preparation for service in iron-clads; but, on the other hand, many of the qualifications that were necessary for the management of an iron-clad ship could be acquired in vessels that would be built, equipped, and maintained at much less cost to the country. It had been pointed out by the Secretary to the United States Navy, in a Report which he made on the subject in 1869, that an iron-clad, which was always under steam, was a bad school of seamanship, and that promptitude and nerve, qualities so essential in naval battle, were not so constantly brought into play as they were on board a large sailing-ship. In conclusion, he would remind the House that our Navy presented an illusory appearance of strength, unless the seamen voted for the Service were thoroughly trained in their duties at sea.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, the inquiry that was made by the Court-martial was a full inquiry under Sections 91 and 92 of the Naval Discipline Act. The court martial, after full evidence, arrived at certain conclusions, and the question was to what extent were those conclusions borne out by the evidence, and to what extent the correction of those conclusions by the Admiralty Minute was justifiable. After the very full statements of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London and of the First Lord of the Admiralty, very few facts remained for discussion. There was very little discrepancy in the evidence.

Mr. T. Brassey

The evidence showed that the accident was owing to a reduction of speed by the Vanguard and to the Iron Duke sheering to port. He did not think anyone could have listened to this discussion and have read the evidence without coming to the conclusion that it was the duty of the Vanguard to maintain the rate at which she was going until her signal that she was about to reduce that rate was heard and answered by the Iron Duke, which was following her. The Vanguard reduced her speed from eight knots to six, and then to five. He thought it seemed clear not only to seamen, but to landsmen, that no man going ahead in a fog had a right to stop unless he had given a signal which was answered. The Admiral's course was laid for clear weather; the fog came on suddenly without giving him an opportunity of signalling to his fleet what they were to do, and he had laid a course which for 12 or 13 miles was a clear stage. Next Admiral Tarleton certainly had given an opinion by which it seemed that the captains of the vessels might have shielded themselves—namely, that they might have acted according to their own discretion in a fog; but that opinion only applied to single vessels navigating by themselves, and not to vessels immediately following one another, and that could not, therefore, warrant a leading vessel to alter her pace without communicating with her comrade. It had been urged that both the captains having gone below and having returned on deck at the same times, the one had been punished and the other had gone scot-free; but the leaving the deck and the returning had been attended by very different results—the captain of the Iron Duke, on returning on deck, had corrected the error of his lieutenant; Captain Dawkins, on returning, had slackened his pace, and so had led to the collision. The Admiral, having laid down a distinct course and the rate of sailing, could not have foreseen what did happen, the sudden reduction of speed and the sheering of the Iron Duke, and the return into the proper course which did produce the collision. For that disaster, it appeared from the full and very clear statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty, Captain Dawkins was primarily responsible. The whole facts were brought out by the court martial, and the eminent naval officers on the Admiralty Board no doubt drew the fair and just conclusion from them which was embodied in the Admiralty Minute. The right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had called the Admiralty Minute a "wretched" Minute — an epithet which he thought the right hon. and gallant Member would regret having used. The Minute went most carefully into the whole matter, going seriatim over the various points in the finding of the court martial; and the First Lord of the Admiralty had fully substantiated the judgment given in the Minute upon those findings. It was quite clear, upon a full perusal of the case and the evidence, that some of the findings were not borne out by the evidence, and, indeed, were inconsistent with each other. It had been suggested that it was improper to have a Court of Appeal like the Admiralty when there had been so eminent and well-qualified a tribunal as the court martial was in that case; but he maintained that there was great advantage in an appeal under such circumstances; and he denied that it was any interference with the rights of the Court below, or that it was at all giving it a "snub," for a body like the Admiralty to say to it—"We do not confirm your findings, but we negative a number of them." The Admiralty sat not only to consider sentences, but to consider findings on evidence. Some speakers had given a degree of countenance to the popular outcry about the great men having been let off, while the small men were punished. There was no justification whatever for that insinuation, and he was sorry to hear it sanctioned by anyone in that House; because, disastrous as it was that so great and expensive a work of English skill and English industry should lie decaying and silted-up amongst the sands of the Irish Sea, far more disastrous to the country than the loss of the Vanguard would it be if it were once thought that one whose name had always been distinguished for high honour and a love of fair dealing could be capable of sacrificing a subordinate in order to save one in high authority.

MR. SAMUDA said, he did not rise to follow in the track of the observations which had been made by hon. Members on other parts of the case. His object was to impress on the Admiralty the necessity of considering how far the construction of the Vanguard had led to the disaster, and the means of preventing such catastrophes in the future, for we had six ships constructed upon the same principle as the Vanguard. In her case it was clear that the point most worthy of remark was that, had the bulkheads been absolutely tight, the vessel would not have been lost. The total extra immersion resulting from the inflow of the water at the place where the blow was struck would in that case have been something under two feet six inches. But the bulkhead doors did not act effectively, and the water, in consequence, went over the greater part of the ship. Was this result to be looked for in the remaining vessels of the same class? If it was, and if doors were absolutely necessary in the bulkheads, it was clear they ought to be of a better description than those of the Vanguard—sliding doors, perhaps, instead of hinged doors; but in his opinion it would be perfectly possible to do away with them altogether at the point and in the position where their inefficiency resulted in the loss of the Vanguard. It was also to be observed that on board the Vanguard, not only the regular, but the auxiliary pumping arrangements were in the engine-room. Now, if the auxiliary pumps had been on deck they would have been available even when the engine-room was under water. It had been said that if Captain Dawkins had given his attention to rigging his pumps instead of getting out the boats he might have saved his ship. Now, he had gone carefully into the matter, and he could say the supposition was entirely erroneous. The effect of using all the available pumping power would have only been to keep the vessel afloat about three minutes longer than was actually the case. All this, as the House would see, pointed to the necessity of removing the auxiliary pumping arrangement from the engine-room altogether, and placing it on deck above water—a change it was most desirable should be carried out in the existing five vessels similar to the Vanguard. On the merits of the case which the House had been discussing he had only a word to say. He did not see how the Admiralty, on the showing of their own Minute, could altogether absolve the Admiral from blame, and it appeared to him extraordinary that while Captain Dawkins and Captain Hickley both left the deck of their vessels, the one should have been punished and the other not, and that Lieutenant Evans should be blamed for altering the course to avoid danger, and Captain Hickley praised for a similar act done with a similar object, but which nevertheless resulted in disaster. The same description of inquiry, in his opinion, ought to have been applied to all ranks of the Service alike. He certainly thought, looking at all the circumstances of the case, that some further judicial inquiry should be made into the conduct of the Admiral and of Captain Hickley.

LORD ESLINGTON said, the House of Commons was called upon to judge of the evidence which had been placed before them, and he hoped they would rise to the dignity of the occasion and decide it in a thoroughly judicial manner. They had heard both the charge and the defence which had been placed before them by the two right hon. Gentlemen, the Member for the City of London and the First Lord of the Admiralty, with equal ability, knowledge of details, clearness, and perspicuity. The manner in which they had handled the subject would go far to dispel the opinion entertained by many that civilians, assisted by a competent council of naval officers, were unable to conduct the business of the Admiralty. He admired the way in which the charge had been brought forward, and he still more admired the defence. But what was the charge? Shortly stated it was this—Why did you, the Board of Admiralty, not bring Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley to a court martial? Well, they had heard the reply to that. They could not try a man for what he said; they must try him for that which he did; and the gist of the defence was that the Admiralty were convinced in their own minds that Admiral Tarleton was not the cause of the disaster, and that he had nothing to do with the disaster. The First Lord of the Admiralty said, in effect—"I have taken the unanimous advice of my Naval Council, and they are convinced that the Admiral has in no way conduced to the accident." The right hon. Gentleman said further—

Mr. Samuda

"Feeling that strong conviction on my mind, I shall overrule that part of the court martial which said that the rate of speed was the cause of the disaster. I honestly believe that Admiral Tarleton in no way conduced to the accident, and how can I frame a charge against him which will justify me in bringing him before a court martial?" That was the defence, and it was an honourable defence. Was the charge sustained, or was the defence adequate and just? His conviction was that when the whole discussion went before the country—when it was found that the Naval Administration was composed of three officers to find whose equals they might search the profession through and fail—when it was found that, guided by such opinion as this, the First Lord could not make up his mind to frame a charge against the Admiral—his belief was that the country would acquit his right hon. Friend. There was one other point. Why had the officers not demanded a court martial themselves? Surely, if they had demanded it, it would not have been refused them? That was a course which he wondered the officers did not adopt; and if it had been adopted he believed their application would have been granted. He believed, however, that the defence had been well sustained, and that it was satisfactory and just.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked what was the direct cause of the accident? The direct cause appeared to be in evidence. When Captain Hickley came on deck the ships were in the relative position of departing from each other's course. It was clear, then, that had this course been followed out the accident could not have occurred. At that moment, however, Captain Hickley, though informed by Lieutenant Evans of the course the vessel was running, gave the order to port the helm, and thereby caused the Iron Duke to run into the Vanguard amidships, which was the immediate and direct cause of the accident. It was, therefore, clear that, whoever else might have been to blame, Captain Hickley was primarily answerable. It was also clear that Admiral Tarleton did contravene one of the Standing Orders of the Admiralty in allowing the Squadron to go at such a speed during a fog; and, that being so, both Admiral Tarleton and Captain Hickley ought to be placed on their trial.

MR. A. EGERTON said, that no one objected to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), but he hoped the House would pause before accepting the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim). The House was asked by that Amendment to order the trial of two officers by court martial without the intervention of the Admiralty. Such an Amendment, if carried, would sap the confidence of the Navy in those who were placed over them, and he trusted, therefore, that, whatever might be the result of the debate, the Amendment would be negatived. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken repeated the statement that Admiral Tarleton in going at the seven-knot speed had controverted a distinct Order of the Admiralty. This was precisely what the Admiralty contended that Admiral Tarleton had not done. They contended that he was perfectly justified in going at the speed which he ordered; and as to the course steered, South by East, there was no naval authority who would deny that that was the best course which could have been pursued under the circumstances. When he set the Squadron at the seven-knot speed the weather was perfectly clear. Was he then bound to reduce the speed directly the Squadron got into a fog? Certainly not. He saw before the fog came on that he had a clear course of 10 miles, and beyond that, the wind was light, there were no sailing vessels in the way, the course was out of the track of steamers, and the reduction of speed would inevitably have taken the ship too near the shoals. For these reasons it appeared to the Admiralty it would have been wrong to have brought any charge against the Admiral on the score of maintaining speed, while that part of his evidence to which exception had been taken had been misunderstood, for he had not meant to assert that Captain Dawkins was justified in reducing speed, without communication with the vessel following him; and even had the opinion expressed not been misinterpreted, the Admiral could not be tried for an opinion which had no effect upon the cause of the accident. As to the imputation that had been made on the discipline of the fleet by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), he had been assured that it was in excellent order, and that no complaint had been made of the conduct of the crews at any of the places on the Irish coast which they had visited. He hoped, therefore, that the House would dismiss from its mind the issue brought forward by that hon. Gentleman. Some people said—"Why did you not dismiss Admiral Tarleton?" That was an easy enough question to put; but it did not really touch the point. Admiral Tarleton had served his country well; he was an able officer; he was an admirable organizer and administrator; and it would neither have been wise, just, nor right to have dismissed him for an accident which the Admiralty, after full investigation, had decided he was not responsible for. No one could doubt the justice of the finding of the court martial respecting Captain Dawkins, who, according to the views of officers of distinction and experience, ought not to have slackened speed except with the greatest caution and the most perfect understanding with the ship behind him. That was precisely what Captain Dawkins neglected, and this exposed him to the severity with which he was visited. It had been suggested that the ship was insufficiently manned. Her complement was 336; and there were 351 men on board; besides the ordinary proportion of officers, there were one extra lieutenant and two or three warrant officers, and it could not be contended that the total number was not sufficient to sail the ship. Passing from Captain Dawkins he came to the case of Captain Hickley, for not trying whom by court martial the Admiralty was blamed. Remark was made on the condition of the Iron Duke's steam whistle, but it seemed to be forgotten that the steam whistle could not be turned on at a moment's notice, and he could not see, therefore, that any accusation could be brought either against Captain Hickley or the officer of the watch with respect to the condition of the whistle. The truth was, that whether the steam whistle was blown or not was a matter which had very little effect on the accident. There was, further, no reason to suppose that Captain Dawkins had been guided by any signal from the Iron Duke, for he had reduced steam without any communication with that vessel. What led to the accident was that the Vanguard had been brought back three cables' length to a spot where the Iron Duke had no reason to look for her. It was also said that the fleet was ill equipped and badly commanded; but the equipment was, he thought, perfectly good; while as to the crews, the Admiral was entirely satisfied with them. Some of the ships, no doubt, were badly commanded; and with one that certainly was the case. Generally speaking, however, the fleet was as well officered as usual, and he hoped the effect of the long discussion of that evening would be to convince the House that the Admiralty had not issued the Minute without careful inquiry and without having obtained the best advice in their power.

MR. SEELY, in moving the Adjournment of the Debate, said, that the main ground on which he relied as proving that the Admiral was wrong, was the finding of the court martial that the speed of the Squadron was too high. The statement of the First Lord, at the same time, he must confess staggered him; but as the subject was a technical one, and required considerable care in its examination, he did not wish the House to come to a decision upon it without having time to consider the arguments on both sides. It was alleged by some that a lieutenant had been dismissed unjustly while an Admiral had been also unjustly acquitted, and if an adjournment of the discussion, in order to give an opportunity of considering the arguments on either side, were refused, an impression would be created that there was a wish to favour the great at the expense of the small.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Seely.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, there is a Motion before the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, and an Amendment has been moved, without Notice, by some hon. Gentleman who sits on this side. I trust, in the first place, that both sides of the House will agree not to sanction Motions without Notice. The practice of proposing Motions without Notice, if of frequent occurrence, would completely destroy all our Parliamentary order; and if there be any subject on which such Motions should be particularly discouraged, it is a subject like the present—the gravest that can possibly be brought under our consideration. Whatever may be our decisions upon these matters, let them be mature decisions, after grave deliberation and with due Notice. I conclude, therefore, that there will be no encouragement given to-night on such a subject as the British Navy—for it is that, in fact, which is in question—to thoughtless Amendments. Then I come to the real question before us, which is the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. That Motion was brought before the House in a speech of exhaustive criticism, and I think that all who listened with the attention, at least, that I did, will willingly bear witness to its commanding merit. It was answered, on the other hand, by my right hon. Friend with a clear, a complete, and a manly statement. I have seldom heard in my Parliamentary experience a great and complicated case so completely put before the House as this case has been by the two right hon. Gentlemen. Well, the right hon. Gentleman moves for Papers of some importance—I have seen the heads of what he wishes to possess—and the Government make no opposition to his request. Well, then, why are we to adjourn the debate? The object is attained. Two of our principal Members—the two men most qualified to address us on the subject—have addressed us in a manner which has commanded the entire sympathy and respect of the House. We are now in possession of the case. An hon. Gentleman in the course of the debate spoke of the unsatisfactory character of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. In my opinion it was exactly the Motion that ought to have been made. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was that the House should be in full possession of all the facts. The right hon. Gentleman does not estop himself for the future, for the case being now before the country and the House, he will have an opportunity of considering what has occurred this evening, and it will be perfectly open to the right hon. Gentleman or to his Friends when they have the Papers to take any course they may think proper. With respect to the hon. Member for Lincoln, who has moved the Adjournment of the Debate,

Mr. A. Egerton

I must remind him, and I do it with great regret, that he would be disqualified from taking any part in it on account of the observations he has just made. Well, then, as I cannot suppose that the House will sanction a Motion without Notice, I must say I shall resist the Motion for Adjournment. In case it be persisted in, which I cannot contemplate, I must take the course which I think it my duty to take, not only on account of the manner in which the question has been placed before us, but also because the state of Public Business would render it most inconvenient that there should be any further discussion. As the Army Estimates will be introduced on Thursday, and the Navy Estimates on Monday, there will be ample opportunity for bringing forward any Motion connected with the Navy hereafter.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope that, at all events, the House may be able to come to some unanimous opinion upon this subject. I believe that the object of my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln in moving the Adjournment of the Debate was that the House might have an opportunity of considering the statement made on behalf of the Government, and that he thought the most convenient mode in which the discussion could be renewed would be in the form of an adjourned debate, when it would be possible for any hon. Member to give Notice of his intention to move some Amendment expressing the opinion which he held. But, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, I doubt whether it would be necessary for my hon. Friend to persevere in his Motion. I think that some of us on this side of the House were doubtful whether it would have been better, or, indeed, entirely fair to the Government, after the question had been discussed throughout a whole evening, that it should be again raised; but, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, it is evident that there is no objection on the part of the Government to the question being again raised by any hon. Member who might wish to submit a definite Resolution to the House on the subject. [Mr. DISRAELI assented.] If that is the distinct understanding, I do not think that any object would be gained by adjourning the debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London has obtained what he desired—namely, a full exposition of the views of the Government in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. The country will now have time to consider that statement, and my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln and other hon. Members will also have time to consider whether that statement can be or cannot be considered satisfactory, and whether they will take the sense of the House upon some definite Resolution. That is the view of the matter that I take at the moment, and I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln will do well, after the exposition of opinion elicited from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, not to press his Motion.

MR. SEELY said, he would withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. STACPOOLE asked whether it was incompetent for an hon. Member moving the Adjournment of the Debate to again address the House on the debate being resumed?

MR. SPEAKER: If the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate were negatived, the hon. Member for Lincoln would not be entitled to address the House further on the original Motion.

MR. GOSCHEN hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Gravesend would withdraw his Amendment on the ground that a division on the subject would be certain to embarrass any future action which might be taken with regard to it after the challenge which had been thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government.

CAPTAIN PIM said, he would accept that view of the case, and withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That there be laid before this House, a Copy of a further Minute relating to the loss of H.M.S. "Vanguard."

SUPPLY — REPORT — THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION — APPOINTMENT OF LORD HAMPTON.

OBSERVATIONS.

SUPPLY [18th February].—Postponed Resolutions [reported 23rd February] further considered.

Tenth Resolution again read, as followeth:—

(10.) "That a sum, not exceeding £22,893, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission."

MR. MUNDELLA, in moving that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £500, said, that the late Chief Commissioner, Sir Edward Ryan, who died at the age of 85 years, had been actively employed up to the last in the discharge of his duties, which, with the able assistance of Mr. Walrond, were most satisfactorily performed. It was now proposed to give Lord Hampton £2,000 a-year as Chief Commissioner; but it should be borne in mind that he would have an Assistant with £1,200 a-year, and that he was now a Peer of Parliament, and had other important duties devolving upon him, so that he could not give to the discharge of the duties of the office the whole of his time, as his Predecessor had done. He thought the Government ought to have appointed Mr. Walrond Chief Commissioner. The Vote now proposed was £4,400 instead of £2,700, making a loss to the country of £1,700 a-year. He regretted to say anything that would give annoyance to Lord Hampton, who was held in high esteem by all the Members of that House; but the noble Lord was now 77 years of age, and was taking an important office, the duties of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer said on a previous evening were very onerous. This appointment had been greatly criticized by the Civil servants, and had created the greatest possible dissatisfaction, because it set the precedent that after long and laborious years of work there was no promotion for tried and efficient public servants, and a Peer of Parliament was to be placed over their heads. They, in fact, looked upon the post as one actually created for Lord Hampton, and if Lord Hampton took this office he should take it at the salary which his Predecessor received. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £500.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£22,893," and insert "£22,393,"—(Mr. Mundella,)—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had been asked the other evening whether the business of the Department in question had increased as compared with last year. There was, he found, no marked difference; but the business had greatly increased of late years and was likely still to increase. He had always taken a great personal interest in it, and had been on the Committee that had led to its establishment. They were all doubtless aware of the hard battle the Civil Service Commissioners had had to fight to keep control over the appointments to the Civil Service, and he felt that while the mass of their work increased the delicacy and difficulty of the work increased also. Further than that, it would continue to increase, particularly if the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) were carried out. What was the nature of that work? It was of a very peculiar character, and required the assistance of a man of peculiar qualifications. The duties were not merely the conducting of a certain number of examinations, but over and above that, he would have to exercise authority in dealing with all the Civil Service Departments as to questions which required the exercise of great tact, a good deal of firmness, and a good deal of authority. So far from Lord Hampton taking a new office in which he had to learn his business, it was exactly that part of the working of the Civil Service system in which his assistance would be invaluable. The noble Lord had administered three public Departments—that of Secretary for the Colonies, that of First Lord of the Admiralty, and that of Secretary for War. Besides that, he had acquired a large experience of public life, and great knowledge of the wants and necessities of the Civil Service, and their qualifications for the duties they had to perform. When the Civil Service Commission was created it was a tentative Department, and the Commissioners were, he believed, appointed without salary. It was afterwards found necessary to give the Commissioners a salary. When Sir Edward Ryan was first appointed a Civil Service Commissioner, in 1861, the number of candidates nominated and appointed was 4,867, while last year the number had grown to 14,638. That represented an addition to the work which, it might be said, was principally done by the examiners. But there was one duty imposed upon the Commissioners of great delicacy—namely, the examination of characters, which took a great deal of time. He wished also to point out not only the increase in the number of candidates, but also the number of new examinations imposed upon the Civil Service Commissioners since 1861. They had now to examine the candidates for the Army, the Royal Military Academy, the Royal Marines, the Indian Civil Service, the Indian Civil Engineers, the Foreign Service, together with the candidates for employment as writers. The Commissioners had likewise to conduct an important and difficult correspondence with the various Departments as to the character of the examinations and the questions to be put to candidates. The exercise of their functions led them into discussions relating to the higher regions of Civil Service organization. He himself had seen, since he had been at the Treasury, some such correspondence, in which the Controller and Auditor General took part. The correspondence of the Commission had grown from 32,000 letters in 1861 to 147,000 letters in 1875, the work was, therefore, in every way seriously increasing. It had been asked why, on the death of Sir Edward Ryan, Mr. Walrond, the Secretary, had not been appointed Commissioner in his place. Now, he thought it would have been rather hard upon Dr. Dasent, who was doing his work exceedingly well, if Mr. Walrond had been put over his head. With regard either to Dr. Dasent or Mr. Walrond, neither of them—excellent and valuable public servants as they were—could have filled exactly the same position as Sir Edward Ryan or Lord Hampton, who had a general acquaintance with public offices. It was said that the Civil Service was sore at this appointment; but was it always the case, or was it even desirable that such offices should be given to the Civil Service? He would not take the appointment of Dr. Dasent himself, who was not taken from the Civil Service, but from outside that Service; but the House would remember the case of Lord Cottesloe, who, as Sir Thomas Fremantle, was taken from that House and appointed to the Customs, and the case of Sir William Dunbar, who was taken from Parliament and made Controller and Auditor General. That was a proper relation between the political and the permanent Civil Service. No one was more in favour of giving the Civil Service a larger share of those appointments than himself; but such an appointment as that of Lord Hampton was peculiarly advisable. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had advised the creation of this appointment without reference to any particular individual, in the firm belief that the organization of the Commission now carried out was best for the Civil Service. As to the salary of the Chief Commissioner, it was fixed on the theory that the office had acquired a greater position and status than of old, and that it was desirable it should be put on the same footing as the other Boards with which the Civil Service Commission came into communication.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he would admit that it was desirable sometimes that the highest Staff appointments should be made outside the permanent Civil Service; but when they had a man in any Department who did his work with remarkable ability, it was not right to pass him over in favour of one outside the Department, because such appointments discouraged the Civil Service, which had far too few offices of a high class to tempt men of great ability to engage in it. Here they had a Commission which had done its work admirably well. It might be said that Dr. Dasent's health would not allow him to undertake the onerous duties of First Commissioner, but was that a reason why they should appoint a man of 76 years of age when there was already acting as Secretary to the Commission a man of exceptional ability (Mr. Walrond) who was peculiarly qualified to fill the office? He was therefore sorry at the precedent which had been set, though, like all who knew Lord Hampton, he appreciated his public character. For his age he was one of the youngest men ho knew, and he was a man of great knowledge and ability; still, as it was a necessity that they should have in this office a man of full and vigorous life, he thought this appointment was one that could not be justified, and he was very sorry it had been made.

Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said, that Dr. Dasent had borne the brunt of the office work for six years, and it would only have been a graceful act to advance his position on this occasion.

Mr. LOWE said, the First Commissioners, who had a task of great difficulty to accomplish, and who had shown great tact and judgment in the organization of the Department, received no salaries at all. Now, when the period of salaries had arrived, the increase of the quantity of work in the office was quoted as a proof that the Commissioners had a greater amount of work to do. The fact was exactly the contrary; the larger the amount of work done in the office the less was the work of the Commissioners. He had no hesitation in saying that the work might be perfectly well discharged by one Commissioner, though he thought it right that there should be two in case any troublesome or difficult question should arise. Coming to the appointment of Lord Hampton, he was sorry there was not a vacancy in one of those pensions of ex-Cabinet Ministers so that one might have fallen to his share. Who ever heard of putting a man without any special qualifications, at the age of 76, into an office of this kind? The whole of the salary ought to be negatived, and the work left to two Commissioners.

Question put, "That '£22,893' stand part of the Resolution."

The House divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 126: Majority 33.

Resolution agreed to.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH SERVICES [LOAN].

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. W. H. SMITH, in moving to Resolve—

That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to raise further sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of Five Hundred Thousand

Mr. Lyon Playfair

Pounds, for the purposes of the Telegraph Acts, by the creation of Three per cent. Capital Stocks of Annuities chargeable on the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, said, the object was to provide funds to meet the various awards which had been made, under the Telegraphs Act, 1869, to various railway and telegraph companies. There was at present £200,000 to be paid under awards made during the last six months, and it was thought necessary to provide a further £300,000 to meet further sums which would be required this year. He hoped no further amount would be wanted.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Resolutions [25th February] reported.

First Thirteen Resolutions agreed to.

Fourteenth Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the further Consideration of the said Resolution be postponed."—(Mr. Monk.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the working of the existing machinery of Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, with power to suggest amendments in the same."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

And, on March 8, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. FORSTER, Sir JOHN HOLKER, Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. GIBSON, Sir HENRY JAMES, Mr. FLOYER, Mr. LEATHAM, Lord FRANCIS HERVEY, Mr. JOHN HOLMS, Mr. CHRISTOPHER BECKETT DENISON, Mr. SHEIL, Mr. STEWART, Captain NOLAN, Mr. GORST, Mr. EUSTACE SMITH, Mr. RIDLEY, Mr. BRUEN, and Sir CHARLES DILKE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

MANCHESTER POST OFFICE BILL.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on March 1, Ordered, That the Select Committee do consist of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two to be nominated by the Committee of Selection:—That Mr. FLOYER, Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, and Mr. LEVESON GOWER be Members of the Committee:—That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented against the Bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Bill, provided such Petitions are presented one clear day before the meeting of the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against the said Petitions.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

PEPPER FOREST BILL.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee, to consist of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented against the Bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Bill, provided such Petitions are presented one clear day before the meeting of the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against the said Petitions:—That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records: Three to be the quorum.

And, on February 28, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. CUBITT, and Mr. GOLDNEY.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 29th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Orders * (21).
Second Reading—Crossed Cheques (12).

CHURCHYARDS—THE BURIAL LAWS.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I have been intrusted with a number of Petitions from various parishes in my diocese praying your Lordships' attention to the subject of an alteration in the Laws of Burial. I desire, my Lords, in presenting these Petitions, to guard myself against being supposed to agree in every expression contained in Petitions which, as they do not refer to any Bill before your Lordships' House, deal rather with general propositions on the subject of the Laws of Burial. It may not be generally known to your Lordships that the two Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury are at this moment, under Her Majesty's licence, engaged in a revision of the rubrics which have reference to the Burial of the Dead. In the discussion of those rubrics many questions will naturally arise with respect to the general Law of Burial in this country. It appears to me very desirable that those who are intrusted with Her Majesty's licence to discuss these questions should approach them quite unpledged, with a full consciousness of all the difficulties which surround the question, and having no desire to increase those angry feelings which unfortunately have been called forth by discussions which have already been raised on this Question. My Lords, I beg to lay the Petitions on the Table. I am sure they will receive every consideration from your Lordships, though those who present them are not pledged to any propositions which the Petitions themselves may contain.

Then Petitions against authorising any other religious service in churchyards other than those of the Church read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

CROSSED CHEQUES BILL.—(No. 12.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, when I brought this Bill before your Lordships' House, I postponed any explanation of it in order that it might be in your Lordships' hands in the first instance. I am now about to give a short explanation of the objects of the Bill, and of the reasons which render a measure on the subject necessary. Your Lordships are aware that crossed cheques have been for a very long time in use in this country; but it was not until 1856 that any notice was taken of them by the Legislature. Up to that time the crossing of cheques and the effect of it remained a matter of convention, or courtesy, between the banks; but in 1856 an attempt was made by the Legislature to give a statutory security to cheques which were crossed. A Bill was brought into the other House by a private Member, which became law; and I am sorry to say that it is not a very happy specimen of legislation. It enacted nothing but this only—that any cheque crossed either generally “and Co.,” or specially to some banker, should be paid only, in the one case through a banker, and in the other through the banker to whom it was crossed. My Lords, I think it is obvious that the framers of that measure overlooked one peculiar characteristic of a cheque—that no one can bring an action against the banker on a cheque but the person who draws it. This is because a cheque is simply a direction by the drawer to pay money of his which is in the banker's hands. Well, what happened after the passing of the Act of 1856 was this—some cheques from which the crossing had been obliterated were presented for payment. Bankers paid them, saying—“These are not crossed cheques, and there is nothing in the Act which tells us not to pay them.” The consequence was that in 1858 another act was passed to remedy this defect. It provided that the crossing of a cheque should be taken to be a material part of the cheque itself, and that no banker should pay it if the crossing was removed, obliterated, or erased. That has been, then, the state of the law since 1858: But a case has occurred lately which has given rise to a great deal of apprehension and excitement in the commercial world. There was a cheque drawn on a particular bank—the Union Bank of London. The person who first received that cheque crossed it with the name of his own bankers, the London and County Bank. A servant took it to pay it into his master's bank, but lost it on the way. Some person found it, and subsequently it was passed for full value to a person who had no notice that the cheque had been found. The person to whom it was passed in the way I have just mentioned took it and paid it into his own banker, the London and Westminster Bank. This bank passed it through the Clearing House; and the Union Bank, not observing the name of the London and County Bank crossed on the cheque, paid it. That, of course, was an oversight, and such a peculiar case is not likely to occur again. But the person to whom the cheque was originally given, and who had lost it, Mr. Smith, brought an action against the Union Bank of London for the amount. The Court in which the action was brought—the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice—and afterwards the Court of Appeal, held that the action could not be maintained, and for these two reasons:—First, the Courts held that the cheque was a negotiable instrument to pass from buyer to buyer, and that the person who had taken it for full value without notice of infirmity of title had acquired a good title to it, and that Mr. Smith had lost his property in the cheque; secondly, that no person could bring an action on a cheque but the drawer, and that the drawer in this case had lost his property in the cheque, and consequently had lost his right to bring an action on it. This, my Lords, exhibited a new phase in the crossed cheque system, and, as I have said, it has given rise to no small amount of anxiety, and it was desired that a remedy should be provided. In the Bill now before your Lordships I have taken the opportunity of repealing the two Acts to which I have referred—the Acts of 1856 and 1858—but I re-enact the important and material provisions of both in a better form, so that the whole of the law of crossed cheques may be found in one enactment. Your Lordships will find in the Bill before you that the first eight sections do not contain any new law, but a simple re-enactment of the existing law. The 9th clause, on which I shall make some further observation, provides that—

“A person taking a cheque crossed specially shall not have, and shall not be capable of giving, a better title to the cheque than the person from whom he took it had. But a banker to whom a cheque is crossed specially, and who has in good faith and without negligence received payment of such cheque for a customer, shall not, in case the title to the cheque prove defective, incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of his having received such payment.”

Now, as to the particular form a provision of this kind should assume, there is no doubt that the question has been raised that, as to whether you should impart this infirmity of title to cheques, crossed generally, or confine it to cheques crossed specially. Many persons advocate that you should legislate in this way for all crossed cheques. My Lords, it appears to me that would be a very dangerous course, and that it would be found so irksome in practice that there would be soon a demand for its repeal. Your Lordships will readily understand this if you consider for a moment one or two matters. A very great many persons in business will take in the course of a forenoon 20 or 30 cheques crossed simply "and Co." They receive and collect money due to them in that way, and send all those cheques to their bankers, who in the ordinary course pass them through the Clearing House. If, in the case of such cheques, an infirmity in the title of any one person through whose hands one of those cheques had passed were to prevent the ultimate holder from recovering the amount, the consequences would be very serious. A person who takes, perhaps, 20 or 30 of those cheques in a forenoon might find, not in weeks even, but in months after he had received a certain number of them, that one of that number had been stolen, and had passed through the hands of a thief, or some other person who had no title; but to require that the payment ultimately made for that cheque to a holder for value must be handed back would be so monstrous that such a practice could not be tolerated. I will give a further illustration of how unwise such a law would be. I dare say your Lordships have heard of a bank established in very recent times, and called the Cheque Bank. I do not know much of its details, but I have heard that it has proved a great convenience. Well, every cheque of that bank bears the printed crossing "and Co." The object of the cheques of this bank is that they should pass over a counter and from hand to hand like money, until they ultimately come back to the bank itself. Of course you would defeat that object if you were to enact that an infirmity in the title of any of the hands through which one of those cheques passed should prevent the ultimate holder from receiving payment of the money for which it was drawn. Take the case of a bank-note; what would become of the negotiability of a bank-note if it was enacted that an infirmity in the title of any holder was to prevent the ultimate holder from receiving payment? When any of your Lordships cross a cheque, generally, all you mean is that the cheque ought to be paid through some banker, in order that there may be some mode of tracing the hand which ultimately receives the money; but you do not wish to attach the property in the cheque to any particular person. It is, however, quite different if you cross the cheque with the name of a particular bank. The moment you do that you intimate by the crossing that the cheque must be regarded as the property of the person who has that particular bank, and not as an instrument which may pass from hand to hand. For these reasons I propose that Parliament should confine itself to enacting that no person taking a cheque crossed specially shall have or shall be able to give a better title to the cheque than the person from whom he took it had—that persons must take such cheques subject to any infirmity of title in previous holders. But I think it right that there should be a protection for the banker to whom a cheque is crossed specially. Accordingly, if, for instance, a cheque is crossed specially to the London and Westminster Bank and it receives payment of it for a customer, that bank shall not, in case the title to the cheque prove defective, incur any liability to the true owner by reason only of that act of the bank. Those are the two provisions of a Bill which, if adopted by Parliament, will be an addition to the existing law on the subject of crossed cheques.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 9th of March next.

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD SANDHURST inquired of the Under Secretary of State for War, On what grounds the decision of the late Government affecting the choice of a site for Barracks on account of the cavalry regiments now stationed at Knightsbridge has been reversed? The late Government had condemned these Barracks, and the Commission which in 1863 considered the question reported very strongly against them, not only on account of the bad condition of the buildings, but also on account of the site on which the Barracks were placed. He asked their Lordships to recollect the important bearing which the second ground of the adverse Report of the Commission had in respect of the decision which Her Majesty's present Advisers had reversed. The Commission condemned the site quite as forcibly as the bad condition of the buildings. He imagined that there were various matters which had engaged the attention of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) when he was considering the question. Independently of the site being considered unhealthy, everybody must know that Knightsbridge Barracks were unfit for Cavalry, owing to tactical reasons or arrangements required for the convenience of regimental administration. They were exceedingly narrow, and very long. On the other hand, he was informed that there was a strategical argument in favour of the site—namely, the great value which many persons attached to having a Cavalry regiment available in the immediate vicinity of an open space like Hyde Park in the event of any outbreak among the people. That argument did not recommend itself to him, but must be taken for what it was worth. He thought everybody should deplore the idea of ever seeing the Household Cavalry engaged in aiding the civil power. That was a contingency which should be avoided if possible. For obvious reasons it was the last body of troops in the Army which should be applied to such a purpose. It was said that the householders in Knightsbridge had no claim to have their property improved by the removal of the Barracks. Their Lordships must remember that almost all the public improvements in the various parts of the Metropolis had been brought about by private improvements in their several localities, and he did not think that it should be a reproach to the owners of property in Knightsbridge that they wished to see improvements effected in that neighbourhood. He believed it had been determined by the present Government to make a still further extension of the present long and slender slip of ground by taking some ground the property of a noble Duke. This would scarcely mend matters if, for the want of sufficient area, the Barracks would have to be built on a principle which sanitary considerations had condemned—namely, that of having the rooms for the soldiers over the stables for the horses. The rooms of the men ought to be in a building separated from the stables. The late Government had condemned the Barracks, but with the change of Ministers a change had come over the policy of the War Office, and it was now proposed to build the new Barracks on the old site. He should like to hear some Ministerial explanation of this action.

EARL CADOGAN said, that in his Question the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Sandhurst) assumed that the decision came to by the present Government was, in effect, a reversal of the decision of the late Government. He had searched through all the somewhat voluminous correspondence and other Papers on the subject which he could find during the last 10 or 11 years, and he had not been able to discover any record in the War Office of any decision on this subject having been come to by the late Government. Therefore, he could not agree with the noble and gallant Lord that the action of the Government in the present instance was a reversal of the decision of the late Government. He ought, however, in candour to state that, in all he wrote on the subject, the feeling of the noble Viscount the late Secretary for War (Viscount Cardwell) seemed to be that the Cavalry barracks were not destined to remain on the present site at Knightsbridge; and the noble Viscount left on record that it had been his intention to go into the question in the year 1874, had the Government of which he was a Member remained in office. Under the late Government, Mr. Lowe, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed a scheme for the removal of the Barracks; but he understood that an important part of the plan of the right hon. Gentleman was to sell the ground on which the Barracks stood, and to apply the money received for it to the erection of new barracks on another site. He believed, also, that if the War Department had given up the Barracks the Woods and Forests would have stepped in and claimed the land. He thought, therefore, that all proposals based upon the sale of the site at present occupied by the Barracks must be abandoned. He thought it would be found, also, that no suitable site could be obtained elsewhere without considerable difficulty. The noble and gallant Lord asked the grounds on which the Secretary of State had arrived at his decision. He had arrived at it entirely on military grounds. It was not for him (Earl Cadogan) to enter into the military advantages of the site; but it had been recognized by the Duke of Wellington and other military commanders. He was sure the noble and gallant Lord would not allow his great authority to be made use of for private interests, but based his opposition to the decision of the Secretary for War on military grounds and the good of the soldier, in whom he took so deep an interest. He (Earl Cadogan) hardly liked to characterize the agitation which had been carried on in opposition to these Barracks, or the proceedings of the promoters of that agitation. One of the objections put forward was the unhealthy character of the Barracks. Now, last Session he had the honour to lay on the Table Reports which gave a very favourable account of the sanitary condition of the Barracks. Again, charges had been made against the conduct of the soldiers quartered in the Knightsbridge Barracks. He thought he might say that no more unfounded charges were ever made against any body of men. He was not afraid to say that it would be difficult to find an equal number of men filling any other position in this country whose character would stand examination better than that of the men of the Household Cavalry. Another ground of objection to the continuance of the Barracks at Knightsbridge was the number of public-houses in the neighbourhood. Last Session he was able to show that those public-houses were not frequented by the soldiers. Those who were anxious for the closing of some of them ought to apply to the licensing magistrates instead of agitating for the removal of these Barracks. Neither the Government nor the Legislature was responsible for the "bulling" and "bearing" of house property in the neighbourhood which had been caused by the proceedings of persons who might have been speculating on the removal of the Barracks. He was not aware of any general wish for the removal of the Barracks, nor did he see any prospect of the Government being able to obtain a site as little open to objection as that at Knightsbridge. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would approve the decision at which Her Majesty's Government had arrived after a full consideration of the subject.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he had no fault to find with the statement of the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War that no decision had been arrived at by the late Government with respect to these Barracks; but lest he should convey a false impression if he left the noble Earl's statement where it stood, he thought he ought to amplify it by some further explanation. When, in 1868, the late Government succeeded to office, he found that the question of the Knightsbridge Barracks was not only being considered, but was giving rise to no little excitement. He thanked the noble Earl for having given him access to the official correspondence which was in the Office at the time to which he referred, and in that which passed in 1866, when General Peel was Secretary for War, he found these passages, after considering Report of Army Sanitary Committee—

"Quartermaster General informed for His Royal Highness that it appears to the Secretary of State most desirable that no time should be lost in acquiring a new site. Under all the circumstances of the case, and the difficulties attendant thereon, it appears to the Secretary of State that the site at Millbank may be worthy of consideration, and he would be glad to be favoured with the further opinion of His Royal Highness

"... had under consideration, and in the absence of any better site which can be obtained within a reasonable distance His Royal Highness recommends that the ground now occupied by Millbank Penitentiary should be made available."

That was not a decision of the late Government, he admitted, and he did not wish to convey the impression that it was; but it showed what were the views of the War Office in 1866, and upon which it was acting at that time. He was not aware that there was any trace of his immediate predecessor having adopted the same view—he believed he did not adopt it—but when he (Viscount Cardwell) came into office it was his impression that the feeling of the community and the feeling of Parliament was in favour of the removal of the Barracks; and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time (Mr. Lowe) caused notices to be served in respect of property extending from Albert Gate to Knightsbridge Barracks. The idea was that the sum of money derived from the sale of the site would go materially towards the erection of new barracks at Millbank. The noble Earl opposite seemed to be under the impression that the site of Knightsbridge Barracks was not capable of being made of pecuniary advantage to the country if the Barracks were removed elsewhere. That was not his impression, nor had it been the view of his right hon. Friend, who had expected that it would realize a large sum. The notices, however, came to nothing, and he (Viscount Cardwell) therefore never had the opportunity of deciding conclusively upon what might have been a great improvement. He had never ventured to throw any doubt on the military opinion expressed by the Duke of Wellington, nor had he ever joined in the least imputation on the admirable soldiers quartered at Knightsbridge. The objection against the site which, to his mind, seemed to have great force was that it was not large enough to admit of the erection of the new Barracks, if they were to be built in accordance with modern requirements. Millbank was a site which had been very much considered by high authorities, and in both military and sanitary points it had been much commended, and anybody who only looked at the map could see the position it occupied between the Barracks at Chelsea and the Wellington Barracks, connected with both by a broad way, flanked on one side by the Thames, and commanding a ready access both to the Houses of Parliament and to Buckingham Palace. He did not, however, wish to say a word by way of military opinion. He took part in this conversation rather as a witness than as assuming to himself the right to speak as an authority on points of strategical opinion.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he fully endorsed what had been said by the noble Earl and the noble Viscount, so far as his knowledge went; but he took issue with the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Sandhurst) who had brought this question under the notice of their Lordships. The noble and gallant Lord seemed to be under the impression that there were other sites which, on military grounds, were preferable to that at Knightsbridge; but the Duke of Wellington and other high authorities had expressed their opinion that no other site in this great Metropolis was so suitable for the purpose to which the site of the Barracks at Knightsbridge was applied. Considering the very limited number of the Household troops there could be no more convenient place than the Parks for exercise, while the site gave immediate access to the Park, and thence to every part of the Metropolis. The noble and gallant Lord expressed his hope that the troops at Knightsbridge might never be called on to assist the civil power. He (the Duke of Cambridge) also hoped sincerely that there never would be occasion for it; but they could not ignore the possibility of its arising. The noble and gallant Lord must know that, whenever the civil arm had been found insufficient to do what was required of it in ordinary times, it had been on those extraordinary occasions supplemented by military aid—but this on all such occasions must be most tenderly applied. He appealed to noble Lords on both sides of the House whether that had not been the case in this country; and he appealed to his noble Friend (Earl Spencer), who had lately filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether in that country he had not called on the Commander-in-Chief to support the civil power with military aid, which had been afforded with ready alacrity, but which he had felt bound to apply with that tenderness and delicacy which should always characterize any assistance rendered by the military to the civil power. But the noble and gallant Lord said that in a sanitary point of view the site was unsuitable for Cavalry Barracks. He concurred with the noble and gallant Lord in wishing they had more space for the purpose; but when the noble and gallant Lord spoke of the necessity, in a sanitary point of view, of the men being separated from the horses, his reply was that he believed it would be found that the most healthy Cavalry Barracks in the country were those in which the rooms of the men were over the stables. During the time the noble Viscount presided over the War Department Cavalry Barracks were built partly on the one plan and partly on the other; and all the officers of Cavalry regiments which had had experience of both plans, including the medical officers, were of opinion that the men who slept over the stables enjoyed better health than those who slept in buildings away from the stables. If men were separated from the stables they would walk to and from stable duty without coats or jackets, and so contract colds. No doubt there was a certain miasma from stables; but by good shafts and good ventilation that could be got rid of. The conduct of the men had not been impeached in this debate, and therefore he need not say anything on that point. As to the injury to property in the neighbourhood, it must be remembered that it was not the Barracks which were going among those who had created the property there, but it was those persons who created property there who had come to the Barracks. It was speculative landlords who had taken property in Knightsbridge—and that was quite a different thing from bringing down Barracks upon the improving owners of property. But he did not see why, with a proper elevation, a Barracks at Knightsbridge might not be made a very agreeable-looking building. He quite admitted the document which had been quoted by the noble Viscount; but he had agreed with the matter stated in that document solely because he believed that at the time the question had reduced itself to that of the choice of another site. As to his ever having expressed any desire to remove the Barracks from the admirable position at Knightsbridge, he believed there was an abundance of documentary evidence to prove that he never had expressed such a desire.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, that the Duke of Wellington used to say that the defence of London must be chiefly carried on from the Parks, which permitted the concentration of troops to any amount; and in this respect the Barracks at Knightsbridge possessed the same advantage. He concurred with the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Sandhurst) that it was a calamity for the military to have to aid the civil power; but the best way to prevent that calamity was to provide against it. The noble and gallant Lord was against providing for such a contingency.

LORD SANDHURST explained that his objection was to any particular body of troops being placed in the invidious position of being specially told off to assist the civil force in case of disturbance; this remark especially applying to the Household Brigade—the Royal Body Guard.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, that the object of having the Barracks in that particular place was not that any particular troops should be employed for that purpose, but of having a large open space in which troops could be readily assembled in case of need. The late Government had considered the different advantages offered by other spaces in the Metropolis for that purpose, but had been convinced that the present site for the Barracks could not be improved upon. The movement against the Knightsbridge Barracks was no more than a cabal of builders, house-agents, and shopkeepers.

SCOTTISH TEINDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS. RETURNS.

LEGISLATION.

THE EARL OF MINTO asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether certain Returns moved for last Session relating to Scotch Teinds (Tithes) have been completed, and will be soon distributed to Peers; also, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure to place the Law of Teinds on a reasonable and an equitable basis? The very fact that he was obliged to ask his first Question was strong evidence that the Office of Teinds in Edinburgh, no less than the whole of the antiquated and unjust procedure and law connected with teinds, stood urgently in need of thorough reform. Early last Session, in the month of April, certain Returns calculated to throw considerable light on the defects of the present system were ordered by the House; and that now, 10 months later, he was unable to learn whether they had been completed, or even commenced. Unless there was good reason for such extraordinary delay, he thought an immediate inquiry ought to be instituted into the condition of the Office, to ascertain whether it must be attributed to the negligence and incompetency of the officers at the head of it. His second Question required no explanation.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND and GORDON, in answer to the last Question, said, that in view of the various Bills Her Majesty's Government had in hand, and intended to introduce before Parliament, he could not give the noble Earl any assurance of being able to deal with the Question to which he had referred during the present Session. With regard to the noble Lord's first Question, he had correctly stated that on a Motion made by him in the early part of last Session, an Order was made for certain Returns relating to Scotch Teinds, which Returns certainly ought to have been prepared and laid upon the Table long before this time. He could not account for the delay, but would promise to take immediate steps to ascertain why the Returns had not been prepared, and would, so far as was in his power, insist upon their being laid on the Table forthwith.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Thursday next,
half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 29th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act (1869) Amendment [74] [House counted out].

Select Committee—Epping Forest * [66], nominated.

Committee—Report—County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace [53]).

Withdrawn—Borough Franchise (Ireland) * [17].

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY BILL. NOTICE.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Sir, I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I will ask the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Claud John Hamilton), whether he is a Director and Deputy Chairman of the Great Eastern Railway Company; whether the Company was concerned or interested in preventing the second reading of the Bill promoted by the Metropolitan Railway Company for the extension of the line from Aldgate to Whitechapel, and from Hammersmith to Walham Green and Fulham; whether, under the circumstances, he issued to large numbers of Members of this House private circulars asking them to attend the House, and to support the Motion for rejection of the second reading of the Bill; whether in this circular the name of a Member of this House was mentioned as the Mover of the second reading; and whether the names of the Members at the back of the Bill were also given? Should the noble Lord reply in the affirmative, I shall ask the highest authority in this House the following Question:—Whether the practice of rejecting Private Bills on the second reading, by a majority in this House, through the private solicitation of Members, will or will not tend to restore the evils which this House proposed to redress when it abolished Committees of the Whole House and established Select Committees; and further, whether a Deputy Chairman of a Railway Company interested in the question is acting in accordance with the spirit of the Rules and Orders 435, 436, and 437, by privately soliciting Members to refuse a hearing for petitioners for a Private Bill?

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

MR. SPEAKER: I must put it to the hon. Member that the Question proposed to be put to the noble Lord goes far beyond the limits of a Question, and should it be submitted to the House, it should assume the form of a substantive Motion.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Of course, Sir, I bow to your decision; but I beg to give Notice that on Thursday next I shall repeat the Question in another form.

THE SUEZ CANAL SHARES—COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer Whether he can inform the House whether the Khedive of Egypt paid a commission to agents in Egypt on the sale of the Canal shares to the English Government; and, if so, the amount of the commission?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had no information on that subject; but he would be exceedingly surprised if anything of the kind stated in the Question had occurred.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS—ROYAL COURT OF JERSEY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intend to give their sanction to the Election of any more Jurats of the Royal Court of Jersey?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Lieutenant Governor of Jersey, but had not received a final answer from him. As far, however, as he understood the matter, the Jurats were elected for life by the ratepayers of the island, and the Secretary of State, therefore, had nothing to do with their appointment.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intend to fill up the appointment of Viscount of the Royal Court of Jersey?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed that the Government were bound to fill up the appointment of Viscount of the Royal Court of Jersey. The delay in doing so had arisen because the office had hitherto been generally performed by deputy; and he was endeavouring to see that the person to be appointed should be one who would do the duty, and not leave it to a deputy.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the officers of the Royal Court of Jersey are not all paid by fees, and consequently have a direct interest in cases being postponed from time to time?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he could only refer the hon. Member to the Report of the Commission which sat on that subject, from which he found that the Procurator General's salary was £100 annually, besides official fees, which might amount to much more. The Secretary and another officer had smaller salaries. Neither of those persons received any fees for conducting criminal cases; but each of them might act for private parties in civil cases.

PUBLIC-HOUSES (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it be true, as reported in the Irish newspapers, that the police force has been employed in Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Derry, and other places, counting the number of people who went into the public houses in those cities and towns on certain Sundays; and, if so, whether this course has been adopted with a view to any legislation this Session, by Her Majesty's Government, on the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he had thought it would be an important addition to the information on that subject already in possession of the Government if they were aware, as far as it could be accurately ascertained, how far any shortening of the hours during which public-houses were open on Sunday or the total closing of public-houses on that day would interfere with the convenience of the public in Ireland, and therefore he had directed that information should be obtained by the police in certain towns in Ireland as to the number of persons who were in the habit of frequenting public-houses in those towns on Sunday. He had no doubt this information was obtained in the way mentioned by the hon. Member. It was not obtained with a view to legislation by the Government this Session, but that the Government might have before it all possible information in considering the proposals on that matter which had been introduced by the hon. Member for the county of Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth).

PRIMARY EDUCATION (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

DR. WARD asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend this Session giving effect to the following recommendations of the Commissioners on Primary Education in Ireland issued in 1870, viz.:—

“That the existing Provincial Model Schools should be gradually discontinued.”

“That all existing Provincial Model Schools which cannot be carried on by Local Committees as Elementary Schools on the present system, receiving only such sums as may be earned by their scholars or may be due to teachers, may be granted on lease to any body applying for them as Training Schools on easy terms, such as will provide for their maintenance and repair?”

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he had no intention of making any proposal this Session.

DR. WARD gave Notice that he would on an early day call attention to the subject and move a Resolution.

LOCAL FINANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is prepared to present to the House, during the present Session, any Annual Statement of Local Finance; and, if so, when he proposes to do so?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the President of the Local Government Board, but he was not at present able to say in what form it would be most convenient that the statement should be made. He hoped, however, that it would be made before the Budget.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—OVERLOADING.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he has any objection to extend the Return granted to the honourable Member for Sheffield, on the 24th February, by including in it all vessels detained for alleged overloading, and specifying the cases where they were lightened, and in all cases, whether of unseaworthiness or overloading, stating the name of the surveyor at whose instance the vessel was detained?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: There is no objection to the hon. Member moving for the addition to the Return; but there would be an objection to the surveyor's name being published, as no good, but only mischief to the public service could ensue from such publication.

LOCAL TAXATION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PELL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce the measure as to local burdens which was promised in the Speech from the Throne?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was the intention of the Government to introduce the measure relating to prisons which was promised in the Queen's Speech, and he hoped that it would be introduced about the time that the Budget was brought forward.

MR. BEACH asked the hon. Member, Whether he would not think it advisable to postpone his Motion as to Local Taxation, in view of the statement just made, until after the Government had had an opportunity of announcing their intentions upon the subject?

MR. PELL said, that in consequence of the announcement just made, he believed that he should consult the wishes of those who had usually acted with him upon this question by postponing the Motion of which he had given Notice until after they had heard the statement of the Government.

CIVIL BILL COURTS (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

In reply to MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the second reading of the Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill would not be taken until the 23rd of March, as that day he believed would suit the convenience of Irish Members on both sides of the House; but he hoped there would be no objection to proceeding with the subsequent stages of the Bill as soon as possible, so that by Easter they might have made some substantial progress in Committee.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—ASH WEDNESDAY.

MR. DISRAELI moved, "That this House do meet To-morrow at Two of the clock."

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he ventured very respectfully to express a hope that the Motion would not be pressed. Wednesday was always a very short business day, and was much more convenient than the days when the House sat till a late hour; and to-morrow a very important Irish Bill, in which he was sure the Government would take much interest, was on the Paper. He would not interfere between the Government and the Order of Business, were it not that he thought that the First Lord of the Treasury felt himself compelled by long-established custom and his love of precedents to make the Motion; but really there would be no person better pleased than himself if independent Members would support him, and show that there was no necessity for wasting two hours on Wednesday. It was time that they left off coming down with solemn faces and virtuous airs to cut off two hours from business on a Wednesday afternoon, while they knew very well that hon. Members could not speak on the subject to each other in the Lobby without putting on the attitude that was assumed by Roman Augurs towards the decline of the Roman Empire. If they were right in keeping from work for two hours, it was clearly wrong for them to meet at all, and therefore he thought that if there was to be any interruption at all they should get a whole holiday.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he hoped before this Motion was put that they might be informed what was the intention of the Government with regard to the Business on Thursday. He understood that the Army Estimates would be the First Order on that day; but, as he saw that the Commons Bill stood first upon the Orders at present, he wished to ask whether it was intended to proceed with the Committee upon the Bill on that day? As the debate upon the second reading was taken at rather a late hour at night, and there was not then a very full discussion, as he understood that there were a very considerable number of Amendments to be moved in Committee, and as the matter was looked upon with great interest both in Parliament and in the country, he hoped that the Committee would be taken at a time when the subject could be fully discussed. He also wished to know when the second reading of the Royal Titles Bill would be taken?

MR. BUTT said, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland had already postponed the second reading of an important Irish Bill to the 23rd. Between this and the 23rd of March many Irish Members would be obliged to be absent, and what he wished to ask was that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would not allow any Irish business to be taken for the next fortnight or three weeks. [Laughter.] He could not understand the laughter of hon. Members opposite, who might think it unreasonable if Irish Members asked them to come over to Ireland during the English Assizes, and who never seemed to consider any Irish subject except in the light of a bore.

MR. DISRAELI: The Army Estimates will come on on Thursday, and I thought it was clearly understood by the House that such had been decided upon. In case the Estimates occupied the whole evening, we should not ordinarily think of going on with the Commons Inclosure Bill. However, we feel there has not been sufficient time for the House to put down Amendments, and therefore we will not proceed on Thursday with it. With regard to the Royal Titles Bill, I propose to take that on Thursday week. As to the appeal just made to me by the hon. and learned Member, of course it would be very agreeable to me to meet his wishes and prevent the prosecution of any Irish business at this moment; but I do not think my duty to the country would justify that course. I should always be happy to meet the convenience of individual Members; but, at the same time, we must proceed with Business according to the regular routine. I hope we shall have the pleasure of the presence of the hon. and learned Member and his Friends when the Irish Votes are before the House, and I shall be sorry if we have not. In regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), what he says as to the decline of the Roman Empire does not agree with my memory. I thought the Augurs who made the observation lived before the commencement of the Roman Empire. Cicero was one of those Augurs. I assure the hon. Member for Leicester that he only does me justice when he thinks it is gratifying to me to respect and reverence old-established customs. I cannot agree with him in this instance, that in reducing the hours of our attendance here to-morrow, we should be acting logically in not coming at all. The reason why we do not meet to-morrow till 2 o'clock is in order that we should attend Divine service; and after having fulfilled that solemn duty, there is no reason at all why we should not give our renovated energies to the transaction of Public Business.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, what Business would be taken on Thursday next after the Army Estimates?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that if time permitted the Civil Service Estimates would be taken after the Army Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, that several hon. Members near him challenged the Motion when it was put in the usual way.

MR. SPEAKER said, that no negative voice reached his ears.

UNREFORMED MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (ENGLAND AND WALES).

RESOLUTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE—Mr. Speaker: The 29th of February is a day on which it has not been given to everyone to bring forward a Motion in the House of Commons; but I can assure the House that the day fixed for the discussion of this Motion is not odder than many of the topics of which it will be necessary for me to treat.

It will be remembered that last year I called attention to the subject of unreformed municipal corporations with special reference to the cases of New Romney, Queenborough, and New Woodstock. This year it is my intention to refer in illustration of my general arguments to one other unreformed corporation of Kent, and to those of Sussex, the Isle of Wight, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall. I gave nearly three weeks' notice to those Members of the House who represent the counties in which the boroughs which I have to name in a hostile manner are situated, except in two cases, and in those cases one week's notice. If I do not escape alive from the House to-day it is to the Members from Cornwall that my destruction most probably will be due.

I moved last year for Papers which were granted, and obtained from Government a list of the whole of the unreformed corporations of England and Wales. I told the House last year that the letters which I had received, and the inquiries which I had made led me to believe that there were 97 or 98 of them in existence. The Return makes them 102 in number, but three or four of them are now extinct, and the town of Newport, in the Isle of Wight, is, I believe, wrongly included, it being a reformed municipal corporation, so that the number 97 or 98 stands correct. Since the publication of the Return I have made special inquiry into the condition of such of these corporations as lie south of London—not that I believe that the southern boroughs are the worst, but because they are the most easily reached. When I say that they are probably not the worst I must tell the House that I have received a vast number of letters from the respectable inhabitants of a great many of these towns, and that it is a singular fact that in every one of these letters the inhabitant who writes it informs me that the unreformed corporation of his particular borough is undoubtedly the least efficient and the most corrupt of all. The fact is that each writer knows only the case of his own town, and, knowing how bad that is, cannot conceive that there can be any worse. I do not deal to-day with the southern boroughs in any belief that in a monetary sense they are the most important, for the property wasted in the unreformed boroughs of the East Coast, and by some of those in the North is far more considerable than that which the southern boroughs have to waste. Wasted it is, in almost every case without exception, so far as I have yet gone: muddled away in some cases; in some cases stolen; but made effective use of in hardly one.

When I spoke last year I pointed out that in all these boroughs we have the same general features. A very small number of persons, self-elected, let the town lands to themselves at ridiculously low rents, and spend the town property without account. In most of them, those persons or their nominees exercise criminal jurisdiction over persons who have nothing whatever to do with their election, and it will be observed that in the Notice that I have given I have attached peculiar importance to this matter of jurisdiction.

Before I pass to the new cases with which I shall deal to-day, I wish to make a short reference to last year's debate. The only answer which was given to my charges in the House was that of my noble Friend who sits for Woodstock. The noble Lord said that the property of the corporation of Woodstock was not public property at all. I would ask, in reply, not as to Woodstock only, but as to any of these corporations, if their property is not public property what in the world then is it? I should doubt whether any man would venture to assert that it is purely the private property of those individuals who happen at any particular moment to be the members of the corporation. Certainly, Parliament in 1835, when it took away all the property of all the corporations named in the Municipal Reform Act, did not pay compensation to individuals or treat that property as property of a private nature. I have, before I pass on, one other remark to make upon the last year's speech of the noble Lord. When I quoted the memorable words of the mayor of Woodstock, uttered on the solemn occasion when he was fined for repeated breaches of the Licensing Act—namely—"That in the past he had always had a high respect for the police, but in future he should have none;" the noble Lord, making perhaps the cleverest, and certainly the most audacious reply ever made to such a statement, said, that the words the mayor had really used were these—"That he had always in the past had a high respect for the police, but in future he should have more." I have but one comment to make on that defence, and it is this—The mayor was again fined for a fresh breach of the Licensing Act on the very day on which he was thus defended by my noble Friend. The noble Lord was aware of that fact at the time at which he spoke, but unfortunately I was not, and he knew that I was not.

When I said that no other answer was made last year to the charges which I brought forward, I forgot an answer in the Kentish papers by the town clerk of the corporation of New Romney. His long rambling statement was replied to at the time, and the correspondence revealing no new points was not of interest, except as showing the singular partial blindness which affects unreformed corporate authorities. The town clerk said, that neither he nor the mayor had ever seen any scurrilous hand-bills directed against the corporation. I replied to this in the best way I could by posting to both of them copies of the worst.

Since last year's Motion the inhabitants of New Romney have broken out into poetry:—thus we find—

" . . . out of a thousand a-year
They pocket eight hundred, it is very clear."

Mr. Stringer's reply to me is thus touched—

"The town is well-drained, says their legal wit!
Of its own rights, it is, for they crib every bit."

In dealing with the corporations of the South of England I shall name 16 which I have examined with equal care to that which I gave to the three into which I went last year. I shall incidentally allude to five others that are in the list, and shall thus have dealt when I sit down with 21, and 3, or 24 in all out of the 102, leaving 78 that I shall not have mentioned. Judging from the letters which I have received, I have no doubt that the 78 are just as bad as the 24 whose cases I have happened to investigate.

Going across England from east to west I have to name in Kent, in addition to Queenborough and New Romney, the corporate borough of Fordwich. A gentleman who had been mayor of this interesting place for many years had informed a friend of mine that his venerable corporation was "a positive nuisance, and ought to be got rid of without delay." But, on local inquiry, I have come to the conclusion that it was not so very bad a one when compared with many of the others. The rector of Fordwich has since written to me that he believes it to be "the worst corporation that exists on the face of the earth." I name this only to show that those which I think white, by comparison with the really black, are not so considered by the inhabitants who have less experience than I have now acquired of the depths to which municipal corporations may descend.

These are the facts about Fordwich. The charter, which is lost, was granted by Edward the Confessor, and renewed by Henry II. The corporation consists of six persons, only one of whom is resident. Any friend of the six by paying £10 may become a seventh, and ex officio a justice of the peace. These persons hold sessions at which they try criminal offences, and they licence public-houses. No accounts are published, but they have lands, tolls, and a trading tax. These six self-elected persons also levy a rate. They have sold land, and the way in which the proceeds were disposed of is unknown. The rector writes, that—"During the 24 years that I have lived in the parish I have never known the corporation expend a single shilling for anything of material benefit to the borough." The official meetings are held at a public-house, "where rowdies collect and drink at the expense of the corporation." The present mayor has been mayor for 28 years, and a previous mayor ruled for 44. The latter was the person who, may I say, stole the property. The present mayor is mayor by force, for the Coutumier directs that "if a man refuse to serve, the freemen shall go to his house—if he have one—and the same by hooks, or any other means, shall pull to the ground."

In Sussex, I have to mention Pevensey and Seaford. Both these towns have special privileges as Cinque Ports, and it may be said "the Cinque Ports are venerable institutions which ought not to be touched." These privileges of the Cinque Ports thus enjoyed by Pevensey and Seaford were not granted by the Crown without consideration. The ports were bound to supply ships and men, and this supply in return for special trade advantages was the only system of naval defence existing in England in the early middle ages. The Cinque Ports now claim to keep their privileges although the consideration for which they were granted is altogether gone. Pevensey and Seaford, like New Romney, although Cinque Ports are not now ports at all. Just as the sea retired from New Romney and from Winchelsea, so the sea has retired from Pevensey, and the river Ouse from Seaford, and the harbours of both are bowling-greens.

Pevensey returned itself in 1835 as having an income of £85 per annum for corporate purposes, although the village possesses only one house that is rated at £16 per annum. It is a tiny place of one street, with a butcher, a grocer, a parson, a Dissenting minister, and two publicans. The county magistrates have no jurisdiction within the liberty, and a grand jury is summoned to make presentments. They sometimes present that they have nothing to present; they sometimes present that the parish pump is out of repair; but whatever they present, as usual, in these cases, they end their arduous duties by a feast. The corporation licences public-houses. The election takes place in the church, as at New Romney. The corporation possesses a large amount of enclosed land in Pevensey Marsh, and its income ought to be a great deal above the £85 a-year at which it was returned in 1835; but the corporation, in addition to its revenue from lands, raises a "liberty rate." It makes no statement to the inhabitants of the purposes for which this rate is required, and it, of course, publishes no accounts. In 1835, the corporation used to spend a large proportion of the revenues on dinners to members of the corporation, and I believe that they still dine together frequently at the public expense. One of their payments in 1835 was an annual one to the Hastings corporation to which I invite the attention of my hon. Friends the Members for Hastings. Pevensey was what was called a limb of the Cinque Port of Hastings, and this payment is the Pevensey share of the wages of the Members of Parliament for Hastings for which I would recommend my hon. Friends to sue the corporation of their town. In addition to all their revenue from land, and from the liberty rate, the corporation are trustees for a charity worth £100 a-year at least—the ancient hospital of St. John Grogilston.

Seaford is returned as possessing a property of only £60 a-year, but it must be remembered that in all these cases the properties are valued greatly below the mark, and sometimes enormously below the mark, the lands being exclusively let to members of the corporation. As to a considerable portion of the corporation lands of Seaford, the corporation, induced by the bribery of a majority of their members, gave a lease to the late Dr. Tyler Smith, one of themselves, for 300 years, or, some say, for 199 years in consideration of the sum of £500. The inhabitants believe that the corporators divided that sum of £500 among themselves. I have in confirmation of that statement, which, of course, I cannot prove, there being no accounts, a written declaration from one of the freemen, whose name I am willing to give privately to the Attorney General, and a verbal declaration from another, that the £500 was thus appropriated; but another authority has informed me that part of the money was spent upon law costs in an action, and that it was only what remained which was "shared out" among the members of the corporation. This last authority, a very good one, thus goes on, "all surplus is shared out at the end of every year; the neighbourhood regards the corporation as a sharing-out club, and despises them as such." The balance is now, being smaller, put in a big dish on the table on bailiffs' day, at Michaelmas, and the host is ordered to supply liquor to that amount. It seems to me that many of these corporations ought to come under last year's Act as "dividing benefit societies." The corporation of Seaford have lately saved £20 a-year by withdrawing their subscription to the National schools. It appears that the present vicar of Seaford is a High Churchman, and the views of the corporation being Evangelical, they have quarrelled with the vicar, and put the money in their pockets. The original charter of the town gave all the inhabitants a voice in the corporate elections. I need hardly say that here as elsewhere in these boroughs "commonalty" has been defined by the corporation to mean only their own nominees, and the lodging-house keepers who, from the growing favour of Seaford as a place of summer resort, have begun to be numerous in the town, are entirely excluded from any voice in the government of a place, the prosperity of which, if it is ever again to be prosperous, they must make. This corrupt corporation, like that of Pevensey, licences the public-houses, though the chief brewer is one of the members, and here is a side of this unreformed corporation question which touches the Home Office, and into which inquiry should be made. The corporation has criminal jurisdiction—one of the magistrate members has been three times bankrupt under doubtful circumstances, and has also been fined by his own colleagues for breaking a man's head in the street. I have a solemn written declaration by a well-known gentleman of high standing that he has known judgment delivered by a magistrate drunk and a colleague interested in the case, and that he has known a prosecution "squared" in Court for a quart of ale. The chamberlains who collect the revenues, and keep those accounts which are never shown, are with singular irony rewarded for their services by the rent of Hangman's Acre. But of them one is yearly elected hangman to the corporation! Just as the corporators of New Romney sit round a tomb to elect their mayor, and, locking the gate of the church to keep the people out, declare themselves a public meeting of the inhabitants, so the freemen of Seaford on Michaelmas Day of each year march in a body to an ancient gatepost, near West House, and there elect their bailiff. Freemen only, because while the word "commonalty" is always taken to mean inhabitants generally when privileges are pleaded, when an election is held it is interpreted with, as I think, illegal strictness. This is the present state of a borough for which Pitt was Member.

Coming to the Isle of Wight we find the corporation of Newport, included as I have said in the list by mistake, and in addition those of Yarmouth and of Brading.

At Brading, the Town-hall and the stocks are the only outward and visible signs of the existence of the corporation. A Town-hall, only 8 feet by 10. The corporation of Brading performs no duties whatever; its officers are elected at a private meeting, and it differs from all other corporations that I know in being forced to admit that it cannot find its charter. The members of the court leet of 13 jurymen are cautioned at their annual meeting that they must not disclose anything that takes place, but the small tradesmen who are summoned are most compliant, for they do not like to lose the annual dinner which the corporation gives. The corporation returned their income in 1835 at the ridiculous figure of £6 17s. 11d. Though knowing but few out of the many sources of their income, I can prove that it is above ten times that sum. There are taxes upon commencing trade, and fee farm-rents from all the lands, and nearly all the buildings in the borough. I said just now that the corporation of Brading did nothing whatever with their money; I am wrong, for they have lately put up nine oil lamps to light the town.

At Yarmouth, a very large property seems to mysteriously disappear. The accounts, which were reported by the Commissioners in 1835 as not having been published or audited, do not seem any better kept at the present time. The property of Yarmouth, which is given in my Return as only £30 a-year, amounts to £180 a-year from one source alone to my personal knowledge. The quayage dues are not only large, but fast increasing. The corporation do, for the money which they receive, absolutely nothing except, once a-year, hoist a glove on a flag-staff to protect their charter rights. This they do at fair time, but the fair is now extinct. So little public spirit has the corporation that it insisted on a payment being made by the revising barrister for sitting in the Town-hall to revise the county list, which has led him to hold his sittings at an hotel. The right of the corporation to levy quayage dues at all was contested in a law-suit some years ago. This suit was ended by the corporation, in a highly diplomatic manner, electing Mr. Blake and Mr. Bagges, their opponents, to seats upon the Board, and Mr. Blake is now mayor. In 1858, the corporation having a preponderating influence in a company called the Yar

Bridge Company, smuggled a clause into an Act obtained by that company which confirmed the right of the corporation to levy these disputed dues. The corporation of Yarmouth has not only large property at the present time, but also great expectations, for the Yar Bridge property will revert to the corporation after the debt has been paid off, and an inquiry before the Inclosure Commissioners in 1862, arising out of a dispute about the Common, proved that the revenues of Yarmouth, which had been returned by the corporation as being only £30 a-year in 1835, were then £200 a-year, and the quayage dues have greatly increased since that date. My strong impression is that it would be found by a searching local inquiry that almost the whole of these corporations made false Returns to Parliament in 1835.

I come, now, to the Dorsetshire corporations—Wareham and Corfe Castle.

Wareham was returned in 1835 as “having £40 a-year of corporate property received by the mayor without account.” Most of this was spent upon an annual dinner. The feast continues, and, according to the account of a friend of mine who was staying at the inn on one occasion when it took place, “rages from 3 in the afternoon till 11 at night.” The corporation of Wareham licences the public-houses, and the county magistrates having, as I am about to show, failed in the case of Corfe Castle in the legal steps which they took to contest the jurisdiction of the corporate authorities, these licensing powers are still exercised without control. Three brewers are members of the very small corporation, and, I will not venture to say in consequence, there are 20 public-houses in the very tiny town of Wareham. The average number of public-houses to population in small towns of the West of England is 1 to 1,000 inhabitants—in Wareham the proportion is 7 to 1,000.

Corfe Castle is the most peculiar of all the unreformed boroughs that I have met with. It may be said to be a corporation with only one member. There are, so far as I can tell, no revenues, but there are large charities and considerable jurisdiction. The magistrates of the borough with the ordinary powers, and with licensing powers, would be the mayor, and the ex-mayor, if there were an ex-mayor, but there is no ex-mayor.

There ought to be two barons at least to swear in the mayor, and there ought to be eight barons in all, but no one can be discovered who ever heard of a baron in the village of Corfe Castle. In cases which require two magistrates, Mr. John Johnson, grocer and draper, who for many years past has been mayor of Corfe Castle, is willing enough to act as one magistrate, but there being no ex-mayor, the policeman complains that he has sometimes to travel 30 miles before he can find a county magistrate who will come in and sit with Mr. Johnson, grocer and draper. Corfe Castle had, with New Romney, in 1835, the proud distinction of having refused all information whatever to the Royal Commissioners and to Parliament. The lord of the manor is known to have very large chartered privileges, and he possesses by Royal Charter the dignified and beligerent title of Lord High Admiral of the Isle of Purbeck and the adjacent seas. I have heard, with what truth I know not, that he is an inoffensive clergyman. He is also Lord Lieutenant of the Isle of Purbeck, with power to call out the whole population in “musteration,” that is, for military service. The inhabitants of Corfe Castle have all the privileges of inhabitants of the Cinque Ports, and the shores of the Isle of Purbeck are exempt by charter from Admiralty jurisdiction. The mayor hides his charter and refuses all information, but there being no barons it would seem that he must elect himself. As he exercises much licensing and other jurisdiction, he must, I suppose, hold frequent meetings with himself, but I am not aware as to whether he keeps minutes of what passes.

In The Times of the 5th June, 1875, there was a very singular legal proceeding reported at great length. It was an application by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Penrhyn on behalf of the justices of Dorsetshire for a quo warranto against the mayor of Corfe Castle, calling on him to show by what authority he assumed to grant licences to ale-houses. The mayor, with his customary good sense, again said nothing, and, as in 1835, his predecessor had had the wisdom to say nothing, no one knew the facts. Mr. Justice Blackburn said, that there he was, that he was exercising this jurisdiction, and that the presumption consequently was that he had a right to exercise it, and that the other side must show good ground for believing that the mayor had no authority to act. The Lord Chief Justice said—"Can you ask us to assume that he acts without a lawful commission?" Mr. Justice Mellor said—"Must we not assume that he has a title to act, until some reason is shown to doubt it, otherwise any man's title may be questioned." My hon. Friend, at his wit's end, then got a man to make an affidavit that there was no separate commission of the peace for the borough of Corfe Castle. "But," interposed Mr. Justice Blackburn, "he gives us no ground for so swearing." The result was that the quo warranto was unanimously refused by four Judges. I was reminded of a curious event which occurred in India last year, when a Fakir, near Oudipore, uncrowned and untitled, became virtually a king, being invested by himself with authority over a large district. When troops were sent against him by the Oudipore durbar, he said that this was most unfair, inasmuch as there he was, and that it was the business of the Oudipore authorities to show that he was not acting rightfully in the authority that he had assumed.

After my Motion of last year, one of the comic papers had six cuts of "our unreformed corporation from our provincial correspondent." The first was of "our grocer;" the second was of "our mayor;" the third was of "the gentlemen who elect our mayor;" the fourth of "the gentleman who disposes of our public trusts;" the fifth of "the gentleman who benefits by our public trusts;" the sixth of "the Committee appointed annually to look into the accounts of the gentleman who disposes of our public trusts." Each of the six cuts contained one figure. All six were one person in different costumes, from the apron of our grocer, to the velvet robes and gold chain of our mayor, and to prevent any doubts as to identity the distinguished inhabitant was in each cut represented with a large wart on his nose. Last year I thought this a somewhat exaggerated joke, and even the experience of New Romney had not prepared me for its being literally true of the borough of Corfe Castle. A matter which has been perplexing me is what happens when a mayor of Corfe Castle dies. We all of us know the difficulties which occur in Chinese Tartary when a grand Llama ceases to exist. It is found necessary to conceal the fact of the death, and to bring forth from the seclusion of the palace some youth who has been captured for the purpose when a child. I fancy that this must be the system adopted at Corfe Castle in the case of the dynasty of Johnson.

The first of the two Devonshire corporations that I have to mention is that of Okehampton. This is a very important town, incorporated under a charter which, although dated so late as the end of the reign of Charles II., nevertheless, following probably the words of an earlier charter, gives the corporation a jurisdiction which it still holds "concerning all, and all manner of felonies, witchcrafts, incantations, sorceries, magic arts, forestallings, regratings, ingrossings, and extortions whatsoever." The market tolls alone, which belong to the corporation, are let for £300 a-year. But the rest of the property of the town, worth not less than £30,000, has, in consequence of a quarrel in the corporation, been lately handed over to trustees. The corporation still perform large magisterial duties. The "capital burgesses" are nearly all tradesmen, and nearly all related to one another. In 1873, the corporation brought in a private Bill which failed to pass this House. Their town clerk ran them up a bill of £700 for the legal portion of the business, and the market tolls for 1874 and 1875 have been swallowed up by this outlay. No man can say what it will please the unreformed corporation of Okehampton to do in future with this £300 a-year.

Close to the borders of Cornwall is the Devonshire corporation of Plympton Earle. In 1835 no accounts of its revenue were produced, and I had been told by persons living in the locality that the charter had been dropped, and that the corporation was extinct. If it had been so, I should have asked, as I am going to ask in some of the Cornish cases, what then has become of the property? But it is not so. The corporation is not extinct; the charter is not surrendered. A sort of tontine has been formed of the money, and the corporation is in a state of suspended animation. It can revive if it pleases. There is no mayor; there is no bailiff; there are no town-sergeants; the Guildhall is let; no new freemen are created, and when the "capital burgesses" are reduced to one, I suppose that he may claim that all the remaining assets of the corporation are his property. Sir Joshua Reynolds was once mayor of Plympton Earle, and not being able on one occasion to attend the corporation dinner, he sent down his portrait painted by himself to be put in his vacant place. It was afterwards hung in the Town Hall, but after a long period had elapsed the representatives of the aldermen claimed that the portrait had not been given to the corporation, but to the aldermen as private individuals. They sold it, and it is now in the possession of Lord Egremont at Silverton Park.

I turn now to the Cornish boroughs, and first to the town of Saltash, near Plymouth. In 1835, the town of Saltash informed the Commissioners that its corporate property was about £400 a-year, but "could not be accurately ascertained." I will put the matter thus; the Saltash corporation had £400 a-year by their own computation, and a great deal more by the computation of all other persons. I am sorry to say that in 1835 the Commissioners reported that the revenues were misapplied, and that the mayor appropriated the surplus to himself. I fear that England is the only country in which ancient abuses are so tenderly dealt with, that such a report to the Legislature should not be followed by any action. The borough of Saltash bears the arms of Richard king of the Romans on its seal, of which, however, the reverse has been lost, having been carried off in the middle of a free-fight which once occurred among the members of the corporation. Saltash collects, up to the present day, dues on all ships entering Plymouth Sound—a most monstrous power. The country has to pay considerable sums on account of those among these unreformed corporations which possess the power of levying shipping dues. By various treaties we have bound ourselves to give up differential dues directed against foreign ships. These ancient ports, such as Queenborough and Saltash, possess by charter the power to levy differential dues, and they used to tax French ships most severely. Saltash taxes Spanish ships at six times an English or three times a French ship. These differences we now have to pay. For the dues which are levied by Saltash on all vessels that anchor in Plymouth Sound nothing whatever is done, except that £1 a-year is spent upon a trumpery buoy. Rights of bushelage and oystering, the latter let for £110 a-year, are also exercised in the Tamar by the Saltash corporation, and it has absolute jurisdiction over the whole liberty of the Tamar which goes right past the far more flourishing towns of Plymouth and Devonport. During the last few years the corporation has done something towards street improvements, though why all ships entering Plymouth Sound should be made to pay for the improvement of the streets of Saltash it is hard to say.

Saltash corporation elects its own recorder, who is a practising attorney. He has enormous power, which he has exercised so far as to transport persons for the term of seven years.

The muniments of Saltash are kept in a chest which has seven locks, for there are seven aldermen. Each of the seven aldermen has his key, and unless all the seven aldermen are there with their seven keys, the chest cannot be opened.

The town administered by the corrupt body which I have described, and thus governed by a self-elected irresponsible clique of local tradesmen, is growing very fast, and growing, it happens, with a population of a wealthy and a cultivated kind. The new inhabitants say that they are unable to discover why a flourishing community should in these days be ruled by a body as close as the corporation of New Romney. As long ago as 1854, the inhabitants petitioned both the House of Commons and the House of Lords for the abolition of the corporation, and the local papers are at the present time full of histories of their misdeeds. They check trade by levying taxes at markets and fairs; they have sold land; they have largely let land to members of their own body with the customary bad results; they own the living; they own the church; and some time ago they sold its ancient font. General jobbery is also alleged against them.

The conclusion to which this evidence leads with regard to Saltash, is that this is a case in which it would not be enough merely to insist on the revenues being properly applied with due publicity. I confess I think that the dues levied on ships casting anchor in Plymouth Sound ought to be taken away from the corporation.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Passing along the coast from Saltash we come next to East Looe. In 1835, the corporation of this town returned its revenues as £100 a-year, but the Commissioners reported "accounts not published, and not known, and lands much underlet." This is, however, the purest corporation that I have come across; it happens by chance to have fallen under the control of a few public-spirited and honest men of means who have devoted themselves to the welfare of the place, but the objections of principle to the existence of this corporation are the same here as they are elsewhere. A self-elected body licences public-houses and possesses the power to exercise criminal jurisdiction, and there is nothing but chance to prevent this self-elected body from here also becoming a clique, narrow-minded, or corrupt. Even here lands are sold without public competition, and the future of the town is pledged, rightly perhaps, perhaps wrongly, but, at all events, without its own consent.

Divided from East Looe by a narrow river is the sister borough of West Looe, also an unreformed corporation. It is the most interesting case of the class which includes Grampound and Plympton Earle. West Looe is a rather modern borough. It was chartered by Queen Elizabeth, and endowed by her with lands out of the property of the Duchy of Cornwall, the Duchy being at that time held by the Crown. The corporation paid always until its extinction, if it be extinct, a nominal rent of 5s. a-year to the Duchy for these lands. About 40 years ago a kind of tontine was arranged, the corporators ceasing to fill vacancies in their number under the amiable idea that the last survivor would become possessed in his person of the whole of the property of the town. When Nathaniel Hearle died in 1870, he being the last elected mayor, it appeared that the stealing of lands which had been successfully carried out at Grampound, and which, in the absence of inquiry, will be successfully carried out elsewhere, could not be carried out at West Looe because of the singular character of the charter. In most cases the lands have come down from times before all documents, or have been purchased by the corporations with the proceeds of dues and tolls, or have been given by individuals, but in this case they had been granted along with the charter, and with a nominal rent reserved by a still existing body corporate—the Duchy of Cornwall. In 1870, accordingly, the Duchy claimed that the charter had been forfeited, and it stepped in and resumed its grants. The Duchy, in 1874, reconveyed the whole of the property to trustees for the benefit of the town for a rent which, though no longer nominal, is very small. But just as the corporation had exceeded their powers, so the Duchy seems to have exceeded its powers, and an action of ejectment brought last year to turn out a person who paid no rent wholly broke down and failed, and I believe that unless we pass a confirming statute the trustees will find that the corporation property of West Looe no longer exists.

The next borough of which I have to speak is one that has been long dead, but I mention it in order to show that the infamies of the extinction of these corporations are as great as the corruption of their lives. Grampound, a borough for which in the 17th century there sat as a Member of the House of Commons John Hampden, but which, in the 19th century, was extinguished by Parliament for its gross corruption, was reported by the Municipal Commissioners as being almost without property, its lands having been, between 1822 and 1835, stolen by members of the corporation. The very small portion which remained in 1835 has, I believe, been stolen since. David Varcoe, who was mayor at the time of the disfranchisement of the town, sold most of the lands and bolted with the money, after burning the whole of the corporation books. But 13 years after this the corporation was for a time revived, and it might be revived again. The last mayor informs me that at the time of his election the property had entirely disappeared. He refused to serve, believing his election to have been illegal from informality. All these dead corporations are still called over by the Clerks of the Peace at the county Quarter Sessions as though they survived. Let us put an end to the walking of the earth by their ghosts, for as matters stand their jurisdiction might undoubtedly be re-established. The calling over of their names reminds me of the reading on the muster roll of the French grenadiers—La Tour d'Auvergne, but it cannot be replied of Grampound Mort sur le champ d'honneur.

Tregoney is also dead like Gram-pound. It had property in 1835, but no accounts to produce. The farm of Treswallen belonged to the corporation, and in what manner that corporation has become extinct, and with what financial arrangements no person in the locality can say.

Returning to the coast we find the town of Fowey. The Commissioners stated that its charter was forfeited in 1826, and it is not one of the boroughs returned as existing in the paper of last year. Nevertheless, there are certain statements which have to be made in regard to it which, I think, will prove of interest. Fowey, which was the town which sent most ships and men to the siege of Calais, and which in the days of Elizabeth was almost the first seaport of England, but which now is a mere village, had the misfortune to quarrel with its lord, Mr. Treffry, lord of the manor and steward of the town. A great Chancery suit was pending in 1835, but the Commissioners stated in their Report certain points with regard to the administration of the town, and, among others, that lands which were worth £250 a-year had been let for the sum of £8. Mr. Treffry obtained an injunction in Chancery against the corporation for mismanagement, but Chancery proceedings were pending for 19 years before Mr. Treffry took other steps which had the effect of bringing the existence of the corporation to an end. He seized the Town-hall, the muniment chest, and the records by force, and I believe that the Treffry family possesses the mace and other insignia at the present day. What I want to show is that if we look at the worst of these corporations, committing, with the least caution, the most illegal acts, we shall see that there is not the smallest chance of putting them down unless under such purely exceptional circumstances as those which existed at West Looe or at Fowey. At West Looe it will be remembered that the Duchy of Cornwall proved the original grant of the lands to the corporation. At Fowey, Mr. Treffry had the prestige of the great local family in fighting the corporation, and he also was able to show a grant by his ancestors in the year 1421 of considerable estates to the town. Yet even here the case was pending for a vast number of years, and the Treffry property was mortgaged to the extent of £40,000 on account of the law suit. The lands are now held and managed for the benefit of the town by trustees, and nine-tenths of the land on which the town stands is in their hands. No entry as to the property of Fowey is made in my Return, but I believe it to be very valuable, and I know not upon what it is expended, except that £30 a-year is given to the church and £80 to the church school. My strong impression derived from local inquiry is that the balance goes to the Treffry estate. There are heavy tolls and quayage dues, and this unfortunate town has in addition to pay another £40 a-year to the neighbouring unreformed corporation of Lostwithiel. The Lostwithiel corporation levy 1s. 4d. upon every English ship entering Fowey, and 2s. 8d. upon alien ships, besides bushelage on the cargoes, and we, of course, have to pay the differential dues as I have explained before.

Lostwithiel, which I named just now, is one of the worst places in all England. In 1835, the corporation was composed of six members in all. They kept no accounts, and they stated that their property was worth only £153 a-year, although the Commissioners thought it was worth more. The mayor published his accounts in 1843, and showed that the income of the corporation, even at their own rates of letting, was £400 a-year instead of what they had told the Commissioners. Their rents from lands alone were vastly greater than the £153 which they had named. In addition they had heavy harbour dues and quayage dues, and large receipts from tolls, fairs, and markets. In fact, I have reason to believe that if the property of the corporation of Lostwithiel were let at its full value it would produce, at least, £1,000 a-year.

In 1843 they spent £150 in repairs of the church, but those were repairs such as could be only needed once in a century or so. It was probably on account of this special expenditure of £150 that 1843 was chosen for the publication of accounts, inasmuch as in other years the corresponding £150 had probably gone into pockets which it would not have been convenient to have specified in a Return. In 1843, the corporation appear to have spent a large sum on a dinner to themselves on an occasion called "mayor-choosing."

The corporation of Lostwithiel ought to consist of seven aldermen, one of them acting as mayor, and of 17 assistant burgesses chosen by the seven aldermen. "The seventeen" are mere dummies, having no voice whatever in any matter except "mayor-choosing," and this is always arranged before-hand and is a mere farce. "The seventeen" are sometimes locally styled "the wise men," but they are more commonly known as "the seventeen nines with their tails out off," that is, ciphers. The town is in reality governed by five persons, that is, by five out of the seven aldermen, for one of the seven refuses to act, and another of the seven was a bankrupt and has not lived in the town for 20 years. The five take it in turn to be mayor. Of these five two are tradesmen, and under the thumb of two others who are brothers, and the fifth is their doctor. One of the brothers is a tanner, and one is a tanner and banker. One of these brothers, who was elected mayor the moment he had been made an alderman, was not even a ratepayer of the town. The tan-pit of the reigning family makes a horrible stench in the middle of the place, but nobody dares complain for the tanner is dictator. The sanitary state of the town is disgraceful. There are five slaughter-houses and scores of pig-houses, intended, not for the use of the locality, but for the supply of places around. A thousand sheep a week are slaughtered in the village for the London market, and pigs are fed there on the entrails of the sheep. It is impossible to obtain a conviction in the borough for a breach of the sanitary laws, for the butchers are of "the seventeen," and help to keep the ruling family in office. In 1872 virulent small-pox broke out in Lostwithiel, and carried off no fewer than 36 persons out of the very small population. The conduct of the corporation in sanitary matters has ruined the river Fowey as a salmon and trout stream, although it was one of the best in the South of England, and the tanner who pollutes the stream is one of its "conservators." The refuse from the gas works, and from a yard where railway sleepers are pickled in creosote is all sent into the river to help to feed the fish, and I am told that the few fish left in it are blind upon which they are to be congratulated. I can further tell the Government, who have shown by their Bills that they are in earnest in trying to prevent the pollution of rivers, that the moment the Commissioners' letter was received which announced a local inquiry at this interesting place, the corporation set to work to put a temporary stop to the pollutions, which, however, have become as bad again as ever since that day.

Salaries are paid out of the revenues of the town, not only to the town clerk who is not one of "the seventeen," but to nearly all the members of "the seventeen" themselves. There is an educational charity under the management of the corporation, but the master is one of "the seventeen," and he fills a multiplicity of offices under the corporation; for besides being schoolmaster, he is tax collector, stamp distributor, relieving officer, secretary to the gas company—of which one of the aldermen is chairman, and in which the mayor has an interest, and which has a splendid contract with the corporation—secretary to the sanitary board, and keeper of the corporation accounts, which I have reason to believe might be audited with advantage. He is also vicar's churchwarden. The following officials are also assistant burgesses or members of "the seventeen;" two town-sergeants, two beadles, two constables, a swine driver, an ale-taster, two regulators of weights and measures. Another of "the seventeen" is the salaried organist of the church, also paid by the corporation. I can prove that fifteen out of "the seventeen" are in the pay of the corporation. I believe that a sixteenth is in their pay, and it is possible that all seventeen are. "In the pay of the corporation" means, as I have shown, in the pay of the mayor whom they elect. "The seventeen" dine together, as I have said, at the corporation expense at "mayor-choosing," but they also compose the court maritime of Fowey, and being again called together, as such, 14 days after "mayor-choosing" they then get another dinner.

I turn, now, to the jurisdiction of the Lostwithiel corporation. There is a Recorder of the town, appointed by the Aldermen, but he never comes, and one of the Aldermen acts with all authority as his Deputy. The Deputy-Recorder is bound by the words of the charter to be "sufficient," which, I believe, means sufficient in the law, that is, versed in the law; but the present Deputy-Recorder is the tanner and despot of Lostwithiel. The magisterial decisions of the ruling authorities of the town of Lostwithiel are curiosities in our judicial annals. The sentences may be judged of from the fact that a local ruffian was lately fined the sum of 6*d.* for an assault on one of the county police. The county police do duty in the town, although salaries are paid out of the accounts, as I have shown, to the constables and other similar officers of the corporation. When the police catch a noisy drunkard on the bridge, which is half in the borough, they always try to push him over to the county half of it, because if they take him there they can get him convicted, otherwise not.

The living belongs to the dictator of the corporation. It was held by the late incumbent for 55 years, and he died three years ago at the age of 86. For a long period he had been one of the Aldermen of the town. The living had been his, and it was only a few months before his death that he sold the living for a low price to its present owner. Now, the church is kept up out of the income of the corporation, who completely control it—for instance, instead of one of the churchwardens being chosen by the parishioners in their vestry, the vicar's churchwarden's colleague is nominated by the Aldermen, and is one of "the seventeen." He is, indeed, the painter and glazier who effects the repairs of the church for the corporation. The present owner of the living sits and votes money out of the Town income towards his own church. The present vicar was appointed only for six years, and the owner of the living has another brother who is preparing to take orders. Of this person, I will only say that he was formerly in a cavalry regiment, which he had to leave, and that he is not a fit person for the office. It is understood that when this person is made vicar he will at once be chosen Alderman, and then the three brothers, even without their dependents, will carry all before them. The corporation are paying an additional income to the present vicar, who lives in a corporation house rent-free.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

The corporation of Lostwithiel, like the corporation of New Romney, but even to a larger extent, has sold, without account and apparently without reinvestment, freehold property of the Town. We ought to know to whom the property was sold, and at what price; and also what houses and lands belonging to the Town are held on lease by Aldermen. It is believed in Lostwithiel that they let their own lands to themselves at perpetual leases.

It may naturally be asked why a self-elected body should be kept thus in possession of uncontrolled power to squander a property certainly worth £500 a-year, and probably worth £1,000 a-year; why, in Lostwithiel, the county magistrates should have no jurisdiction, and the law be administered according to the judicial ideas of country tradesmen. What crime have the inhabitants of Lostwithiel committed that they should not enjoy the same rights and privileges as the rest of the people of England, and that they should be refused all voice in the government of their own town.

The last of the Cornish corporations with which I deal are those of Marazion, Camelford, and Tintagel. Marazion, or Marghasieuve, has attracted much local attention since my Motion of last year, but is unimportant. The mayor gets three guineas a-year to spend on cakes. There is in Camelford a revenue from fairs and markets, and from land; the members of the corporation are, as usual, self-elected; the rector, who is one of them, is non-resident, which here, as at New Romney, is said to be illegal; there is an educational charity for teaching Latin to six poor scholars, the conditions of which are said to be violated; and another charity, the money of which is said to be mis-spent.

The Tintagel property appears to have been resumed by the Duchy of Cornwall on a claim of forfeiture of charter, though the charter was granted by Richard king of the Romans; but the Duchy did not here, as in the West Looe case, hand over the property to trustees for the benefit of the town, but sold it. The mace was carried off by one of the freemen, who also made in his own person and name a sale of the Town-hall and market-house. At Tintagel, the vicar is, under the old charter, constable of King Arthur's Castle. Presuming on this position he has introduced rabbits, and is said to have ruined the sheep-feed of the Duchy; but thorough reliance cannot be placed on the local statements in regard to him, because he is making a large income out of quarrying slate on the glebe land, which the inhabitants hold to be illegal. The place is so dangerous that no insurance office will pay on ships loading under King Arthur's Castle—one of them was, indeed, totally lost there last year.

I believe that the whole of the unreformed corporations are very like the 19 that I have carefully examined. As for the corporations of Wales, for instance, the most frightful abuses exist in the case of Conway, the mayoralty of which curiously enough is in the gift of the Crown. In the summer of last year Mr. Vernon Darbyshire, of Pendyffryn, a member of the corporation of Conway, brought forward an unsuccessful Motion in favour of its dissolution. I hear that the account-book of the corporation has been made into a picture-album by the grandchild of the agent to the corporation. There is at Conway a large income with the ordinary abuses, and with even more than the ordinary sale of corporation lands. The town of Henley-upon-Thames is also one of those possessing unreformed corporations, where a Motion for the dissolution of the corporation was brought forward in consequence of my Motion of last year, with the usual want of success. Relationship, as at New Romney, is essential for election to the corporation, and Dissenters, as at Woodstock, have been till lately rigidly excluded from the body. Since my Motion of last year, and the local stir in Henley which it caused, some of the leading Dissenters have been asked to join the corporation. With one exception they have all declined, although some years back they would have consented. They have declared, to quote the words of their manifesto—

"That they will not become members of a body the very existence of which is a stumbling-block to that political life which is necessary for the welfare and progress of the town."

Henley was returned, in 1835, as possessing a property of only £72 a-year; but I have a statement by a leading member of the local board to the effect that the unreformed corporation of Henley does, in fact, administer property worth £1,600 a-year. It is impossible for me, in the total absence of evidence, and complete concealment of accounts, to even pretend to say whether it is the corporation Return or the local statement that is right; but there is this confirmation of the local view, that in 1858 some accounts were published which showed a balance in a single year of £350 unexpended monies. This balance, moreover, existed in spite of some of the lands being let to members of the corporation at half their value. The discrepancy between the sum of £72 returned by the corporation, and the sum of £1,600 a-year, always alluded to in the local papers, and named on high authority to me, of itself shows the urgent need which there is for inquiry into the funds held by unreformed corporations.

I have also received many letters about the case of Higham Ferrers in Northamptonshire. There is property estimated at £300 a-year; no accounts; criminal jurisdiction exercised in sessions by the mayor and ex-mayor, ex officio, and licensing jurisdiction. The members of the close body let their land to one another in the usual way. With the exception of a sum of £25, the inhabitants assert that the corporation "scramble" their large funds among themselves.

With regard to the jurisdiction of the corporations, it seems to me so clear that persons neither nominated by the Crown for fitness nor elected by their fellow-subjects should not be allowed to try criminal cases, that I shall conclude my speech by moving that we forthwith abolish all criminal jurisdiction exercised by unreformed municipal corporations. Here is a case of jurisdiction for the House—At Havering-atte-Bower, in Essex, the steward, who is magistrate with criminal jurisdiction, is nominated by the lord of the manor, though the manor has been sold for money. This is selling a right to sit and try one's fellow-subjects! Liberty sessions are held every fortnight, and all the privileges of the ancient "Horned Monastery" are claimed.

With regard to their property, however, and their administration, I think that a local inquiry by means of a Commissioner should be held. There may be some objection to this course, and I will not make any Motion as to it, but I will instead, with reference to this branch of the subject, proceed to shortly put to the Attorney General certain legal questions as to which I have given him full private Notice.

It is my impression, and this is one reason why I make no Motion with regard to the funds of these corporations, that there does exist a manner of reaching some or all of them under the present state of the law. It is not free from difficulty, and it needs the intervention of the Attorney General. Here is the point to which I ask his careful attention. "A charity," by 43 Eliz. c. 4, includes all property held by corporations, partly for municipal and partly for church or educational purposes. In the great majority of cases these unreformed corporations have some such claims upon their money. In all these that circumstance seems to bring the whole of their property under the legal obligations of the Charity Acts. Comparing the 61st section of the Act of 1853 with the 44th section of the Act of 1855, the trustees, or, in the case put, the corporations have to send accounts annually to the Charity Commissioners. This law is broken by the vast majority of the unreformed municipal corporations holding mixed properties partly under charitable, educational, or religious trusts. Again, under section 29 of the Act of 1855, trustees, or, in the case put, the corporations, are forbidden to make, without the approval of the Charity Commissioners, any sale, mortgage, or charge of the estate, or any lease, in reversion, after more than three years of any existing term, or for any term of life, or in consideration, wholly or in part, of any fine, or for any term of years exceeding 21 years. This law is also broken by the great majority of unreformed municipal corporations holding mixed properties. These corporations, if written to by the Charity Commissioners, would reply that they do not hold upon charitable trusts. Now, when trustees deny that they hold on charitable trusts, or, as it is called, when they hold adversely, the Charity Commissioners by the 15th section of the Act of 1853, are precluded from demanding any information. I wish to ask the Attorney General whether if, in the case, for instance, of the Lostwithiel corporation, who, undoubtedly, hold part of their lands upon a charitable trust, inhabitants were to ask him to assist them, he would, if written to by the Charity Commissioners, help them under Clause 20 of the Act of 1853?

The clause to which I call the Attorney General's attention is the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, s. 20, which enacts that in any case in which it shall appear to the Charity Commissioners that the institution of legal proceedings is requisite or desirable with respect to any charity—and the Lostwithiel corporation is, as I have shown, for these purposes a charity—it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to certify such case to the Attorney General, and thereupon the Attorney General, if upon consideration of the circumstances he think fit, shall prosecute such legal proceedings as he shall consider proper by application to the High Court of Judicature.

With regard, then, to the property of these corporations, I feel that local inquiry by a Commissioner is desirable; but while I urge the Government that they should grant it, I will not make a Motion to that effect. I have shown how in many of the cases, if local inquiry is refused by the Government, we shall be able, although with the difficulty which is caused by local fears and local pressure, to procure applications to the Charity Commissioners. I ask the Attorney General with regard to these, whether, in the event of such applications coming to him, backed by the authority of the Charity Commissioners, he will prosecute? I wish also to ask either the Attorney General or any other Member of the Government whom it may more properly concern, whether I may have, as an unopposed Return, any correspondence which has lately taken place between the inhabitants of Lostwithiel and the Charity Commissioners upon this point?

Upon the other, and, as I think, the clearer branch of the question where both are clear, because I know not what answer can be made to our case, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to forthwith abolish all criminal jurisdiction exercised by unreformed Municipal Corporations or their officers, with the exception of that of the City of London, for which due provision has been made by statute,"—
(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. Baronet, and he understood that the question which had been put, was whether, if the Charity Commissioners should ask one of these corporations for information with reference to its property or an account of the disposal of its property, and the corporation should decline to give any information or any account, the matter should be certified; and he understood the hon. Baronet to have asked him whether in such a case he would direct legal proceedings to be taken against the corporation. In a moment or two he would answer that question as definitely as he could; but before he did so he would ask leave to call attention to the position of these corporations with reference to the property they held. He believed it had been decided, over and over again, that corporations, whether Ecclesiastical or Civil, except charitable corporations, were not trustees of the corporate property—that was to say, were not to be considered primd facie as trustees. In order to make them trustees of the corporate property it was necessary to show that the property was subject to some specific trust, public or private, by some Act of Parliament; some will, deed, or instrument of some kind or other. Primd facie these corporations were not trustees of separate property. If they had been, no doubt many of the abuses alluded to by the hon. Baronet would have ceased, because those interested in the trust property would have taken proceedings against them and had it properly administered. With respect to municipal corporations under the Municipal Corporations Act, they were trustees of the corporate property. That Act made them trustees, and provided that the corporate property should be trust property. But unfortunately the Municipal Corporations Act did not apply to the corporations to which reference had been made, and therefore those provisions which made their property trust property were not applicable to them. Then came the question as to what proceedings might or should be taken under the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853 and 1855. The Act of 1853 said that the Commissioners might make inquiry as to all property held on trust for charitable purposes; and if they came to the conclusion that any property was held on trust for a charitable purpose, and they thought that charity was not being duly carried into effect, they might certify the case to the Attorney General for the time being, at the same time giving him all the information they could afford with regard to the particular property or charity and a full explanation of the case; and if the Attorney General, on considering the explanation thus given to him, thought it was a proper case in which proceedings should be instituted, then it was within his power, and it would undoubtedly be his duty and also, he thought, his pleasure, to direct that proceedings should be instituted. But to deal with the specific case alluded to by the hon. Baronet—namely, where the only fact submitted to the attention of the Attorney General was that the corporation, having been applied to for information with respect to its property or for an account of its proceeds, simply refused to give the information or the account—whether, in that case, the Attorney General would be justified in directing proceedings to be instituted, he should very much doubt. As at present advised he should hesitate to direct proceedings to be taken against any of the corporations on that simple fact being established; because it was clear that until, at all events, a primd facie case had been made out of the existence of a trust, the corporations were not bound to answer such a question put to them by the Commissioners, and could hold themselves adverse, so to speak, to the Commissioners. But though he might not be justified in directing proceedings in specific cases like those, a very little evidence showing that there was a trust in some persons would induce him to consider it a fair case for investigation and to direct proceedings to be taken. In such cases it would not take much to satisfy him that the property held of the corporations was held upon trust. If it was made out that it was in any way a charitable trust, then it would come under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, and he should have much pleasure in directing that there should be an inquiry, in order that that property should be administered as the donor had desired. The question put to him having been one of a somewhat vague nature, it perhaps did not admit of a more distinct answer than he had given.

MR. GREGORY could have wished that the Notice of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had been more specific, and had given some intimation of the charges he had made against individuals. The Municipal Corporations Act of 1835 distinctly recognized the antecedent right of the corporation to the property vested in them, and it protected not only the right of property of individual members of the corporation, but even those of their wives and families. That fact did not bear out the statement of the hon. Baronet; but, on the contrary, it confirmed the view of the law laid down by the learned Attorney General. The hon. Member then referred to the corporations now in question which were within his own district, leaving other hon. Members to deal with those existing in their respective neighbourhoods. The corporations of Pevensey and Seaford had been referred to by the hon. Baronet. Pevensey, he said, was a place of very great antiquity, having, in fact, been a Roman town. It was, perhaps, the oldest corporation in England, its original charter going back to the time of Edward I. It contained a population of between 1,100 and 1,200. The corporation consisted of 40 freemen and seven jurats, or elected magistrates, the latter being a body of gentlemen than whom none more fit for the office they held could anywhere be found. The corporate property was very small, not exceeding £110 a-year; it was expended on education or in charity and on other purposes useful to the inhabitants, and he did not know that any grievous error had been alleged against the corporate management. The hon. Baronet had alluded to a charity under their administration; but it was now administered under a scheme settled some 15 years ago by the Charity Commissioners. As to the rates they levied, they were, in fact, county rates for police and lunatics, levied under a precept sent to the jurats by the quarter sessions. He came next to the borough of Seaford. The corporation consisted of about 45 corporators; their income was £40 a-year, and they had expended about £540 for improvements, and £500 for building a guyne or sea-wall. It was true the corporation granted a lease of their property for 299 years to a gentleman named Tyler Smith, under the impression that he would carry out certain improvements, and would, among other things, erect a sea-wall. The speculation, however, failed, and the works were not carried out. As far as the corporations on whose behalf he spoke were concerned, he would say for them that they had no objection to any inquiry which might be instituted, nor would they resist such alterations in their constitution as Parliament, in its wisdom, might think necessary. What they would consider a grievance, however, would be any proposal involving their utter annihilation as corporations.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the admissions made by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down in reference to the corporation of Seaford furnished a strong argument in favour of the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea. They had leased their property for 299 years to Mr. Tyler Smith without taking any precautions to secure his carrying out works for the public good, and having received £500 from Mr. Smith, they divided it among themselves. He would not dispute with the Attorney General the law which he had stated, that corporations were possessed of property not affected with any trust, but that he would be glad to imply a trust. This was not, however, a question of trust, but a question of policy for Parliament to deal with. Under the Municipal Corporations Act Parliament said that corporations should be treated as trustees acting on behalf and for the benefit of the public in the vicinities over which they had control, and how these corporations had escaped the net he did not know, but it was quite time that they should be brought into it. Last year the Home Secretary dealt with the brick and mortar rookeries existing in different parts of the country, and it was to be hoped that he would now take in hand the municipal and political rookeries which still remained in the shape of these small unreformed corporations. Anything more scandalous than the condition of some of these corporations could not be conceived. Some were better and some worse than others. Those which were better would not suffer from inquiry, but those which were worse ought to suffer. All bodies of this kind ought to be made to do their duty, or else they ought to cease to exist. He considered the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had been very wise in confining his immediate Resolution to the most objectionable of all powers held by these corporations—namely, the exercise of criminal jurisdiction. How was it possible that hon. Gentlemen whom he addressed, who formed the best part of the magistracy of the country, and who were desirous of maintaining its authority, could desire that side by side with the magistrates under the authority of the Lord Chancellor, who were nominated by the Lord Lieutenants, there should sit a body of men exercising criminal jurisdiction who were elected in the manner stated, and who were under no authority? What did anyone know of these men, and what guarantee was there that they were persons who ought to be charged with such authority as that they were possessed of? The administration of the Licensing Act was one thing which he was sure the Home Secretary would not think was a fit subject to be left to persons elected in this manner. Therefore, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would let the House know whether he was prepared to give in some form or other support to a Motion the object of which was to do away with the flagrant abuses.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he felt sure the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea would admit that every facility had been afforded him by the Government for bringing the matter forward. He was equally sure that the House was indebted to the hon. Baronet for having taken a vast amount of trouble in ferreting out what he took to be abuses requiring remedy. On one occasion the right hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Henley) described the sport of ferreting out ecclesiastical abuses as being something better than a rat hunt. In the same spirit the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had delivered to the House what was not only a useful, but an amusing speech. The Attorney General had not spoken of the question of policy, but had wisely and properly confined himself to the question of law; but he (Mr. Cross) did not see how it could well be considered that the property held by corporations had not trust attached to it. However, he would be ready to give any help that he could in bringing about an inquiry into these corporations and in providing a better state of things. As to the question of the administration of justice by these corporations, that was a matter of the greatest importance, and if there were any division he could not divide against the Motion of the hon. Baronet. In all boroughs, whether large or small, justice ought to be properly administered, and fit persons only should be entrusted with the important duty of administering it; and as to the Licensing Laws he thought that only justices of the peace ought to be intrusted with the powers conferred by the Acts of Parliament. He hoped the Motion would not be pressed to a division by the hon. Baronet until he had heard the reason why these things had been allowed to remain for so long untouched, and why they were not mentioned in the Report of the Commission of 1835. It was supposed that the exercise of the criminal jurisdiction had ceased. In the case of Romney Marsh, although a Court of Session was held before the Bailiff, the offenders were very few, and there had been no cases of felony for three or four years. They would find that the criminal jurisdiction had practically ceased in the views of the Commissioners. Now that the matter had been brought before the House and the country, he felt bound to say that it was time the whole question should be looked into, and the corporation put upon a better footing; and if the hon. Baronet would trust him, he would promise to take such steps as the Government might think best in order that that should be done.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he was anxious, in consequence of being absent last year when this question was brought on, to say something on behalf of New Romney, which was once one of the Cinque Ports. The corporation of that borough was an ancient one. Its charters had been confirmed by several Sovereigns, and the last was granted by Queen Elizabeth. There were at New Romney a mayor and five jurats, and certain freemen and commonalty. One of the charges made last year by the hon. Baronet was that the corporation was not legally constituted, that the number of jurats ought to be 12; but the charters stated that there might be any number of jurats not exceeding 12. In the time of Queen Elizabeth there were five, and from that time to the present the number had varied from four to 11; therefore, he thought that charge of the hon. Baronet had broken down. As to the mayor, who had been alluded to, it was true that he had a residence a mile and a-half away, but he had large property in the borough, and went there daily. The mayor and corporation had applied the property which they held for the benefit of the town. Leases had been granted according to the valuation of surveyors, and a great deal of property had been reclaimed from the sea, much money having been spent for that purpose, and they had applied the residue of their funds for the benefit of the borough, paying out of them the borough, police, paving, and lighting rates. There had been no borough rate from time immemorial; therefore, so far as New Romney was concerned, the charge of maladministration had not been sustained. Of the mayor and jurats two were county and borough magistrates, appointed by the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor. Those gentlemen did not wish to oppose any inquiry, nor to oppose anything that the Government might think desirable. As to the election of the mayor being in the church, that was required to be done by the charter, in the absence of all but the commonalty and freemen. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE; The commonalty?] Yes; but the hon. Baronet would, if he read the charter, see that commonalty and freemen meant the same persons. As to the borough of Queenborough, no doubt it once possessed some property, but the corporation engaged in the speculation of oyster breeding, and in the year 1845 the corporation became bankrupt, and the whole of its property, under an Act of Parliament, was sold to pay its debts, and they were paid off, and now the only property which it possessed was the Guildhall, a house, and the advowson of the living, and its income was, on the average, £50 a-year, which was applied purely towards corporation purposes. Of the corporation of Fordwich he knew nothing, as he had had no communication from the borough. On the part of the other corporations there had never been any desire to make concealment.

Mr. CHADWICK, in support of the Motion of the hon. Baronet, said, that never had a better case for an inquiry been made out. He thought that if these corporations were not affected with a trust for charitable purposes they held their property in trust for the public good, and not for themselves personally; and he also thought that the answer of the Attorney General would be looked at by the public as a legal quibble. He would venture to suggest that there should be either a Royal Commission or a Select Committee appointed by the Government to inquire into and report upon the whole matter, as regarded the constitution, funds, forms of government, and the mode of appointment in all these boroughs. Such a Report would form the only sound and reliable basis for any proposed reforms.

Mr. H. T. COLE said, he was of opinion that the hon. Baronet had conferred a great benefit on the public by his able exposure of the defects and anomalies of these corporations. He could add one fact with regard to Corfe Castle. The mayor of Corfe was himself an elective officer; curiously enough he had the power of appointing a deputy who acted as a justice of the peace, who sat at licensing sessions, and exercised all the other powers conferred on those magistrates appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of the county or by the Lord Chancellor. That was, he believed, the only case known in which a mayor could exercise such a power.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department—who, he was sure, would do what was right in the matter of jurisdiction—he would not press his Motion to a division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER (CLERK OF THE PEACE) BILL.

(Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Holt, Mr. Clifton.)

[BILL 53.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Appointment of deputy clerks of the peace).

Mr. RATHBONE moved, page 1, line 17, after "him," to insert—

"Provided always, That each deputy clerk to be appointed shall be a solicitor of ten years' standing, and shall have an office within the district for which he is appointed, and the clerk of the peace shall have no interest in the emolument of any deputy clerk."

If the patronage was to be taken from the hands of the Chancellor of the Duchy, in whom the public would have confidence, they should have some security that it would be properly exercised. In every instance where there had been decentralization the results had been more gratifying than the most sanguine persons could have imagined.

Large centres of population like Manchester and Liverpool were entitled to have some security that the persons appointed should be competent for the discharge of their duties.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 17, after the word "him," to insert the words "Provided always, That each deputy clerk to be appointed shall be a solicitor of ten years' standing, and shall have an office within the district for which he is appointed, and the clerk of the peace shall have no interest in the emolument of any deputy clerk."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the question of the division of the county of Lancaster might arise, and if the proposition were started he should be prepared to consider it; but so long as Lancashire was one county, so long did he think it necessary that there should be one clerk of the peace. He had enjoyed considerable experience in this matter, for he had sat as chairman of quarter sessions in the extreme north and in the extreme south of the county, and he thought the same clerk of the peace should follow the magistrates round. He could conceive nothing more inconvenient than three clerks of the peace, acting on different lines, instead of there being one clerk of the peace whose business it was to go all round the county. He was willing to adopt any safeguards for the appointment of a proper deputy, and was ready to adopt the Amendment to the extent of requiring that he should be a solicitor of seven years' standing. It was better to leave it to the magistrates to say whether he should have his office within the district. Whether his office were in the south-west or south-east of the county, it was necessary, however, that there should be a head office.

MR. RATHBONE expressed his readiness to accede to the insertion of seven years instead of ten years in his Amendment.

Amendment amended, by leaving out the word "ten," and inserting the word "seven."

MR. HARDCASTLE moved to omit from the Amendment all the words after the word "standing."

Amendment proposed to proposed Amendment, as amended, to leave out from the word "standing," to the end of the Amendment."—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment, as amended."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 53: Majority 8.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY (METROPOLIS) ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL.
(Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Forryth, Mr. Twells.)

[BILL 74.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. G. Hubbard.)

MR. GOLDSMID objected to the Bill being disposed of without some further explanation than had been given of its provisions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the measure was one to which he entertained very serious financial objections, and pointed out that the Bill introduced by the President of the Local Government Board proposed to repeal the Act with which the present measure dealt. He thought it would be inconvenient to proceed with the discussion of this measure at present until the House had heard some statement on the subject.

MR. GOLDSMID begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time on that day month.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Goldsmid.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, the object of the Bill was to mitigate the assessment of Imperial taxation on all real property in the metropolis, reducing the rateable charge on the gross rental of the property by the outgoing necessary to maintain it. Nothing could be more equitable, and the President of the Local Government Board proposed to apply the same principle to the whole of the country which it was sought by this Bill to apply to the metropolis. In 1870 or 1871 the gross value of property assessable in the metropolis was £24,000,000. Since that estimate was made the rateable value of the metropolis had been raised from £24,000,000 to £28,000,000, not absolutely by increased value, but by the system which had been very diligently pursued by the assessment committees and surveyors of surcharging the value of the houses whenever there was any excuse for doing so. He could mention instances in which the valuation of houses had been doubled and even trebled, although their actual value had not been increased. The consequence of this was that £4,000,000 had been added to the gross value returned for the metropolis. If his proposition were accepted he believed the Government would receive, owing to the enhanced value of property in London, nearly as large an amount in property tax in 1876 as they received in 1871.

MR. GOLDSMID begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he hoped his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) would withdraw his Bill, or consent to an adjournment for a long time. There was nothing in his statement peculiarly applicable to the metropolis. If it were right to charge property tax on rateable value instead of gross value in London, it would be equally right to do so in the country, and he apprehended there were few people who complained more of the property tax in that respect than the owners of land. The Government also had before the House a Bill in which it was proposed to consolidate the general law of the country as to valuation, and therefore the present Bill was inopportune. Besides, if they interfered with the rating under Schedule A they must also interfere with that under Schedule B, and thus upset a system which had been in existence for many years. He hoped his right hon. Friend would rest satisfied with having placed his views on this interesting subject before the House, and would consent to withdraw his Bill.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at Eight o'clock.

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 1st March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—First Reading—Intoxicating Liquors (Scotland) * [91].
Resolution [February 28] reported—Ordered—First Reading—Telegraphs (Money) * [90].
Ordered—First Reading—Trade Union Act (1871) Amendment * [92].
Second Reading—Municipal Franchise (Ireland) [7], put off; Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies) * [26]; Burgesses (Scotland) * [48].
Committee—Offences against the Person * [1]—
R.P.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 7.]

(Major O'Gorman, Mr. Butt, Mr. Richard Power, Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MAJOR O'GORMAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to amend the law relating to the Municipal Franchise in Ireland. But before he proceeded to the consideration of the provisions of the Bill, he must be permitted to say that he deeply regretted that the task which he had risen to perform had not fallen to the lot of some one of the brilliant Colleagues by whom he was surrounded; and he was the more nervous because his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) had given Notice of an Amendment to reject the Bill. He felt that he (Major O'Gorman) was not a foe worthy of the steel of the hon. Gentleman who was an accomplished rhetorician, and whose words, like Ulysses of old, flowed from him like honey: "Glukiern Melitos recu aude." He felt the difficulty of comparison with a Gentleman so highly gifted. Yet he was not completely discouraged. The great leader of the party to which he had the honour to belong had ordered him to take charge of the Bill, and he had obeyed. That House was the judge and jury, and he should be satisfied with its verdict. In proposing the present Bill he asked for nothing that was revolutionary, he asked for nothing that was even unusual, but he asked for that which all honest men believed to be just. He met daily with gentlemen who sought to draw him from the allegiance which he owed to his country, and they addressed him with this plea—"Your country now possesses all the rights and privileges which England possesses. What more do you require?" His answer was that he did not require more, and his countrymen asked for no more. But was it the fact that his country did possess those rights? He answered No; and he would instance in proof the difference which existed between the municipal franchise of the two countries. Was the municipal franchise of Ireland similar to that of England? Ireland was not upon an equality with England in this respect, as he should be able in a very few words to show. In 1835 the municipal corporations of England were reformed, and every person rated to the poor for three years became a burgess. In Ireland the reform of the corporations did not take place till 1840, and then the franchise was fixed at £10. This state of things still continued in Ireland, except in Dublin, for which a special Act was passed in 1850, assimilating the franchise there to the English franchise at that time, so that all persons who had been rated to the poor for three years should be burgesses. Three or four years ago, however, the franchise in England was lowered, and now, in England everyone who was rated was entitled to the municipal franchise; whereas in Dublin a man was not entitled to the privilege until, as before, he had been rated for three years; and in all other towns in Ireland there was no franchise under £10. A decided difference between the two countries was thus established. He would draw the attention of the House to the result of this difference, and would make a comparison between four towns in England and four in Ireland. He found that Leeds, which contained a population of 259,212, possessed 52,784 municipal electors, while Dublin, with a population of 267,727, had only 5,284. Again, Bradford, with a population of 145,890, had 24,450 electors, although Belfast, with a population of 174,418, had but 5,525. The number of municipal electors in Swansea, with a population of 80,772, was 8,692; while Cork, with a population of 100,518, possessed but 2,000 municipal electors. Gateshead, too, with a population of 48,267, had 10,221 municipal electors, while Limerick, with a population of 49,853, had no more than 1,139. That was to say that Leeds, with a population of 8,503 persons less than Dublin, had 47,200 municipal electors more than Dublin; that was to say that Bradford, with a population of 28,588 less than Belfast, had 23,927 more municipal electors; that was to say that Swansea, with a population of 19,746 less than Cork, had 6,692 more municipal electors; that was to say that Gateshead, with a population of 1,586 less than Limerick, had 9,112 more municipal electors. Could anything, he would ask, be more monstrous than the inequalities which those facts disclosed? He wished, in the next place, to call the attention of the House for a moment to one or two passages from a journal which was said to lead the people of England. The Times of the 23rd of April, 1874, speaking of the Bill which had been introduced by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), for the purpose of assimilating the franchises in England and Ireland, said its provisions were conceived in a spirit absolutely antithetic to Home Rule—a sentiment which he was sure would give the greatest possible satisfaction to the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly)—that its effect must be to make more real the fusion between the two parts of the Kingdom separated by St. George's Channel, and that it ought to recommend itself to all those who sought to render the political union between both as intimate as possible. Now, the present Bill proposed to make uniform the municipal franchise in all the towns in Ireland by extending to them the English franchise. He asked no more, and he certainly thought the people of Ireland were entitled to have their request granted. A similar Bill to this was read a second time in 1872, and also in 1873; but it did not proceed further for want of time. On those occasions it was supported by the Government of the day, though in 1874, when it was brought in again, it was opposed by the then Government, and it was thrown out upon the Motion for second reading. With those few remarks he begged to leave the matter in their hands. He left it to the justice and the honour of the House of Commons.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Major O'Gorman.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that as a representative of one of the 11 corporate towns which would alone be affected by this measure, he rose to move that it be read a second time that day six months. But in doing so he would take occasion to say that the leader of the party to which his hon. and gallant Friend belonged had acted very wisely in selecting him to submit the question to the House; because while he recommended himself to hon. Members by his bonhomie, he had shown by his speech that day that he could not merely amuse them, but place his views before them clearly and forcibly. Now, as to the object of the Bill, it was said that it was intended to give to Irishmen the same rights as to Englishmen with regard to the municipal franchise. That, however, he maintained, was a misleading fallacy. The Bill, if it became law, would do a great deal more than assimilate the municipal franchises of the two countries; because, whereas in England the municipal franchise was carried only to the basis of the Parliamentary franchise, the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend would carry it below that point in Ireland. For good reasons, as he believed, the borough franchise in Ireland extended only to the £4 householder; but this Bill would give every rated occupier the franchise, no matter whether his tenement was rated at 5s. or £10 per annum. The subject was one, he might add, on which the supporters of the Bill seemed never to have been able clearly to make up their minds. It was introduced in 1870, when a measure was brought in to carry the municipal franchise down to the £4 rated householder. That measure was, however, withdrawn; and no attempt at legislation on the subject was made in 1871. But in 1872 a Bill was introduced for the purpose of conferring the municipal franchise on rated householders of three years' standing, and this Bill was allowed to drop. In 1873, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) brought forward another Bill—a 12 months' householder Bill—and this Bill also was allowed to drop. Throughout those years neither the hon. and learned Gentleman nor his supporters, it would appear, could make up their minds as to the specific propositions which they should adopt;—and now the basis of the franchise was to be lowered. But who asked for all those measures? Not a single Petition had been presented in favour of any one of them from 1870 until now. And why was that so? Because nobody, he believed, wanted legislation on the subject, and if he was not mistaken the present Bill was repudiated by one of the Liberal papers connected with the city which he had the honour to represent. But, whatever its merits or demerits, it was, at all events, a Bill which was not likely, as the others to which he had referred, to be abandoned, because he knew the pluck of his hon. and gallant Friend would lead him to fight the battle out to the end. It was, however, very important to see that there was no real demand for a measure that sought to transfer power from those who paid rates to those who scarcely paid any rates at all. His hon. and gallant Friend seemed to think that he had made out his case when he referred to the comparative population of English and Irish towns:—but that was only one element in the case. What about property? for the effect of the Bill, he contended, would be a practical confiscation. In the town of Belfast, for example—and he held in his hand the real facts of the case as stated by the town-clerk—there were 35,000 separate holdings, 25,000 of which were under the £8 valuation line, while there were 10,000 above it. Now, the 10,000 above the line paid in the shape of local rates £70,000 a-year, but the 25,000 below it paid only £15,000; in other words, if the present Bill were to become law, five-sevenths of the electoral power would be given to those who paid only three-seventeenths of the taxation; and it was no wonder, therefore, that although there was in Belfast a large amount of political activity, no steps had been taken in support of such a proposal. The question of the Parliamentary franchise was to be argued on a different basis, having to do with the making of laws and with considerations of Imperial policy: but municipal corporations were elected to raise local funds for executing local improvements; and they had to take care, in the first place, that they had good government; and, in the next place, that those who had to pay should have an influence over the mode of levying and expending the rates, and that power should not be engrossed by those who had little to do with paying. Although the landlord was rated for the lower class of houses, the tenant, who in many cases did not either directly or indirectly pay the rate, nevertheless had the vote. Yet, this Bill proposed not to enfranchise the landlord, but to enfranchise the occupiers of all those small tenements who, in nine cases out of ten, did not pay a farthing of the rates. In the City of Limerick the total number of tenements was 7,254, of which no fewer than 3,187 were assessed under 40s. a-year. The number of houses under £4—the Parliamentary line—was 4,681 out of the whole 7,254, or much more than one-half; so that in Limerick, as in Belfast, the preponderating voice as to what improvements should be executed at the expense of the ratepayers would by that Bill be handed over to the smallest class of householders, who not only contributed little or nothing towards them, but whose rates were paid by the landlord. In the City of Waterford there were 4,544 separate holdings, of which 1,878 were assessed under 40s. a-year; while the number under £4 annual value was 2,717. In the municipal borough of Drogheda there were 3,564 tenements altogether, of which 2,709 were under £4 annual value, and only 855 over that value. This Bill, therefore, would transfer from those who were liable to pay four-fifths of the rates and taxes in those corporate towns a preponderant power to those who practically paid only one-fifth of those imposts. He would ask the House was that fair? The assimilation of the municipal and Parliamentary franchises even in England had led to the introduction of politics into local affairs and to the driving out from the municipal councils in many boroughs of the élite of the community, because the legitimate influence of property, intelligence, and talent had been disregarded. Would they take the same course again in England if they had the opportunity? But the present Bill would reduce the municipal franchise in Ireland even lower than the Parliamentary franchise. It might be said that the Parliamentary franchise itself was one of the grievances of the supporters of that Bill. He would be prepared to argue that question also when it came before them; but as long as both Parties in that House, and the Governments which had been selected from them, had deliberately said that the time had not come when the borough franchise in Ireland should be exactly the same as it was in England, let them not take a step which, if they had it to do again in England, they would hesitate to take with the lights of present experience, and which would also involve that direct confiscation of existing rights which he had described. A statistical comparison between English and Irish towns was inapplicable unless it could be shown that there was the same relation between the small and the large tenements in the towns so compared. He denied that there was any Irish grievance in this matter, though he would admit that there might be some change in the municipal government of Ireland; but that change ought to follow the lines of enfranchisement traced in the measure of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh)—though he would not commit himself to all its details—rather than those of the present Bill, which he earnestly called on the House to reject. The hon. Member concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

MR. COLLINS said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. C. Lewis) had failed to give sufficient reason why the law of England and Ireland should not be equalized in respect to the municipal franchise. The hon. Member had told them that the introduction of the humbler class of householders would have the effect of swamping the present municipal constituencies of Ireland, and that, moreover, they would be incapable of properly controlling the management of municipal funds. He (Mr. Collins) denied that assertion, and observed that the tendency of legislation since the commencement of the present century had been to confer privileges on the lower classes and enable them to participate in the privileges and rights possessed by those above them. The present Prime Minister conceded the principle of this Bill when he admitted all male householders in English boroughs to the Parliamentary as well as to the municipal franchise:—and he did not believe that right hon. Gentleman regretted the step he had taken, or would think of retracing it if he had the opportunity, for to that step he owed in a great degree his present high position. It was neither wise nor expedient to deny the humbler householders a voice in the management of local matters seriously affecting their interests and comforts. In the 11 Irish towns which had been referred to, only one in 40 of the population possessed the franchise; whereas in similar towns in England, the proportion was one in eight. There was one point in the question which had not been sufficiently ventilated. A working man in an Irish town who was rated at 20s., probably occupied a tenement for which he paid a rental of 50s. or £3. If that same man came to England and found employment, he would immediately enter on the occupancy of a tenement for which he would pay, at least, £8 a-year. It was easy to explain why in Ireland in all probability a man of that class would receive wages amounting to 15s. a-week, out of which he would pay 50s. or 60s. a-year for his tenement; but the same man coming to this country would receive 24s. to 30s. a-week; so that he could afford to pay 3s. a-week for his house. So that the man who was denied the franchise in Ireland was admitted to it in England, not by reason of any improved mental qualification, but simply because he received higher wages and could therefore pay a higher rent. There was another point. Suppose you wanted to raise £100 upon a valuation of £2,000 in Ireland, 1s. in the £1 would give the requisite amount, but suppose for the purpose of raising this £100 you should value the tenements at £4,000, that would give you an apparent reduction to 6d. in the £1. Therefore mere rating was not a sufficient ground to go upon in deciding this question. The opposition now raised to that Bill was but another illustration of the old story of one class being possessed of privileges and desiring to withhold a share of them from another class. The last speaker asked whether, if they had to do over again what they had done in England in that matter, they would not hesitate to do it? The Prime Minister could answer that question, for he had enfranchised the people of England, and he now enjoyed their confidence as the result of his liberality.

MR. KAVANAGH said, he opposed the Bill on the ground that, not only were many of its provisions bad in themselves, but also because he regarded it as part of a mischievous attempt for dealing with the question. It must be considered in connection with another

Bill before the House. What was the real object of the Bill? The avowed object was set forth in one of the clauses as being "with the object to lower the franchise." Now, that was explained in connection with a Rating Bill, and, so far as he understood the question, it appeared to him that the purpose in view was to give the occupiers all the votes, and oblige the owners to pay all the rates. He did not know whether he interpreted the motives of the promoters truly; but certainly, as far as he had been able to read and understand the two Bills, taking them together, that appeared to his mind to be the meaning. Now, they had heard a good deal about the assimilation of the laws of England and Ireland. He was not opposed to that assimilation; but he was not one who thought that the institutions of England should be forced upon Ireland, merely because they existed in England. They should first consider the circumstances of the case. He hoped the House would not allow itself to be led away by the plausible cry that had been raised for assimilation without pausing to ask what was proposed to be done towards assimilation by passing the Bill. He denied that any assimilation would take place under it. He need not go into the matter of franchise in the two countries. That part of the question had been ably dealt with by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis.) But the assimilation of which they had heard was only a delusion and a snare. It was assimilation in theory, but not in fact. By the Bill they would have a large increase in the number of persons who should be admitted to the franchise. But there would be a great difference in the character of the class into whose hands the control of municipal expenditure would be thrown. The hon. Member who last spoke said the reason why opposition was offered to the Bill was on account of class feeling, because one class desired to keep to itself certain privileges which they ought to share. Now, that he utterly denied; but he did say that the Bill made an endeavour to get up a feeling in the minds of the people that there was an attempt to deny them certain privileges which it was held they should have. He was not opposed to a proper extension of the municipal franchise where it could be granted. He fully admitted the principle that taxation and representation should be coequal. But they could not stop half way with the principle. He maintained that the men who paid the larger portion of the rates should have the larger control over the expenditure of those rates—a larger control than men who paid only a small portion of the rates. Now, those questions should not be started merely for Party purposes. What was asked for was not a fair extension, but a one-sided extension. Last Session an attempt was made to deal with the question; but when he recalled all the circumstances he must say he was convinced that the purpose with which the Bill was concocted was to swamp the representation of property, and to put the whole power connected with the dealing with large rates into the hands of the lower classes. Now, that was not a method of proceeding which should be sanctioned. The hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the other side would not object to take this advice from the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett.) What had he said?

“It must never be forgotten that there are two ways by which people can be deprived of representation—one, by keeping the right to vote from them; the other, by placing them in so hopeless a minority, that virtually they must be without representation.”

Recognizing the all-importance of the truth that true democracy consisted in securing as far as possible the representation, it followed that if the most intelligent sections of opinion were unable to obtain representation, many of the best men in the country would naturally withdraw themselves from political life, and thus the representation would surely and steadily deteriorate. That would be the result of passing such a measure as this. He believed this precipitate and indiscriminate extension of the municipal franchise would lead to an utter disruption of all good municipal government. Take, then, sanitary matters. The Sanitary Commissioners reported that the evidence before them showed abundant proof that sanitary reforms were in many cases rendered impossible, because of the hostility of the inhabitants of towns. The clause contemplated by the Bill would assuredly create difficulties in the way of sanitary reform. But he was not opposed to inquiry with a view to enlarge the constituencies upon just principles. He should desire to see the whole question of municipal reform inquired into by a Commission who should sift it thoroughly; but a Bill like this would stand in the way of such a project, and he therefore hoped the House would reject the Bill.

MR. BUTT said, with reference to the Local Government in Towns (Ireland) Bill, he would express a hope that the British House of Commons would never pass a Bill which would give the nomination of one-half of the corporation of every town in Ireland to the landlords. He could not congratulate the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) on the accuracy of his statement as to the history of that question. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the lowering of the municipal below the Parliamentary franchise as if it were something new in England—he seemed, indeed, not to know that there had ever been a difference between the municipal and Parliamentary franchise in this country. Now, in 1832, the Reform Act fixed the Parliamentary franchise, both in England and Ireland, at £10 in boroughs. After that, in 1838, a Corporation Reform Act was passed for England, which did not place the municipal franchise on the level of the Parliamentary franchise, but gave it to every occupier who had been rated for three years. [Mr. C. LEWIS said, he had made no reference to England, but to the state of things in Ireland at that time.] The hon. Member had certainly appealed to the House not to do for Ireland what had never been done in England, and not to degrade, as he called it, the municipal franchise below the Parliamentary franchise. The real animus of the opposition to this Bill was revealed in the question of the hon. Member, when he asked if in the same circumstances they would do the same thing for England. This was the reactionary principle avowed by the hon. Member, and it was evident that he would, if he dared, deprive England of her popular municipal franchise also. As for his own part in the matter, he had steadily persevered in the endeavour to obtain for Ireland the same municipal rights as England enjoyed, and if he had supported on any previous occasion a less radical measure than the present, it was simply with the view of obtaining a part, if he could not get the whole of what he wanted. The extension of the franchise in Dublin had not produced any disastrous results. Since that event 25 Lord Mayors had been elected, and

porate towns which would alone be affected by this measure, he rose to move that it be read a second time that day six months. But in doing so he would take occasion to say that the leader of the party to which his hon. and gallant Friend belonged had acted very wisely in selecting him to submit the question to the House; because while he recommended himself to hon. Members by his bonhomie, he had shown by his speech that day that he could not merely amuse them, but place his views before them clearly and forcibly. Now, as to the object of the Bill, it was said that it was intended to give to Irishmen the same rights as to Englishmen with regard to the municipal franchise. That, however, he maintained, was a misleading fallacy. The Bill, if it became law, would do a great deal more than assimilate the municipal franchises of the two countries; because, whereas in England the municipal franchise was carried only to the basis of the Parliamentary franchise, the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend would carry it below that point in Ireland. For good reasons, as he believed, the borough franchise in Ireland extended only to the £4 householder; but this Bill would give every rated occupier the franchise, no matter whether his tenement was rated at 5s. or £10 per annum. The subject was one, he might add, on which the supporters of the Bill seemed never to have been able clearly to make up their minds. It was introduced in 1870, when a measure was brought in to carry the municipal franchise down to the £4 rated householder. That measure was, however, withdrawn; and no attempt at legislation on the subject was made in 1871. But in 1872 a Bill was introduced for the purpose of conferring the municipal franchise on rated householders of three years' standing, and this Bill was allowed to drop. In 1873, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) brought forward another Bill—a 12 months' householder Bill—and this Bill also was allowed to drop. Throughout those years neither the hon. and learned Gentleman nor his supporters, it would appear, could make up their minds as to the specific propositions which they should adopt;—and now the basis of the franchise was to be lowered. But who asked for all those measures? Not a single Petition had been presented in favour of any one of them from 1870 until now. And why was that so? Because nobody, he believed, wanted legislation on the subject, and if he was not mistaken the present Bill was repudiated by one of the Liberal papers connected with the city which he had the honour to represent. But, whatever its merits or demerits, it was, at all events, a Bill which was not likely, as the others to which he had referred, to be abandoned, because he knew the pluck of his hon. and gallant Friend would lead him to fight the battle out to the end. It was, however, very important to see that there was no real demand for a measure that sought to transfer power from those who paid rates to those who scarcely paid any rates at all. His hon. and gallant Friend seemed to think that he had made out his case when he referred to the comparative population of English and Irish towns:—but that was only one element in the case. What about property? for the effect of the Bill, he contended, would be a practical confiscation. In the town of Belfast, for example—and he held in his hand the real facts of the case as stated by the town-clerk—there were 35,000 separate holdings, 25,000 of which were under the £8 valuation line, while there were 10,000 above it. Now, the 10,000 above the line paid in the shape of local rates £70,000 a-year, but the 25,000 below it paid only £15,000; in other words, if the present Bill were to become law, five-sevenths of the electoral power would be given to those who paid only three-seventeenths of the taxation; and it was no wonder, therefore, that although there was in Belfast a large amount of political activity, no steps had been taken in support of such a proposal. The question of the Parliamentary franchise was to be argued on a different basis, having to do with the making of laws and with considerations of Imperial policy: but municipal corporations were elected to raise local funds for executing local improvements; and they had to take care, in the first place, that they had good government; and, in the next place, that those who had to pay should have an influence over the mode of levying and expending the rates, and that power should not be engrossed by those who had little to do with paying. Although the landlord was rated for the lower class of houses, the tenant, who in many cases did not either directly or indirectly pay the rate, nevertheless had the vote. Yet, this Bill proposed not to enfranchise the landlord, but to enfranchise the occupiers of all those small tenements who, in nine cases out of ten, did not pay a farthing of the rates. In the City of Limerick the total number of tenements was 7,254, of which no fewer than 3,187 were assessed under 40s. a-year. The number of houses under £4—the Parliamentary line—was 4,681 out of the whole 7,254, or much more than one-half; so that in Limerick, as in Belfast, the preponderating voice as to what improvements should be executed at the expense of the ratepayers would by that Bill be handed over to the smallest class of householders, who not only contributed little or nothing towards them, but whose rates were paid by the landlord. In the City of Waterford there were 4,544 separate holdings, of which 1,878 were assessed under 40s. a-year; while the number under £4 annual value was 2,717. In the municipal borough of Drogheda there were 3,564 tenements altogether, of which 2,709 were under £4 annual value, and only 855 over that value. This Bill, therefore, would transfer from those who were liable to pay four-fifths of the rates and taxes in those corporate towns a preponderant power to those who practically paid only one-fifth of those imposts. He would ask the House was that fair? The assimilation of the municipal and Parliamentary franchises even in England had led to the introduction of politics into local affairs and to the driving out from the municipal councils in many boroughs of the élite of the community, because the legitimate influence of property, intelligence, and talent had been disregarded. Would they take the same course again in England if they had the opportunity? But the present Bill would reduce the municipal franchise in Ireland even lower than the Parliamentary franchise. It might be said that the Parliamentary franchise itself was one of the grievances of the supporters of that Bill. He would be prepared to argue that question also when it came before them; but as long as both Parties in that House, and the Governments which had been selected from them, had deliberately said that the time had not come when the borough franchise in Ireland should be exactly the same as it was in England, let them not take a step which, if they had it to do again in England, they would hesitate to take with the lights of present experience, and which would also involve that direct confiscation of existing rights which he had described. A statistical comparison between English and Irish towns was inapplicable unless it could be shown that there was the same relation between the small and the large tenements in the towns so compared. He denied that there was any Irish grievance in this matter, though he would admit that there might be some change in the municipal government of Ireland; but that change ought to follow the lines of enfranchisement traced in the measure of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh)—though he would not commit himself to all its details—rather than those of the present Bill, which he earnestly called on the House to reject. The hon. Member concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

Mr. COLLINS said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. C. Lewis) had failed to give sufficient reason why the law of England and Ireland should not be equalized in respect to the municipal franchise. The hon. Member had told them that the introduction of the humbler class of householders would have the effect of swamping the present municipal constituencies of Ireland, and that, moreover, they would be incapable of properly controlling the management of municipal funds. He (Mr. Collins) denied that assertion, and observed that the tendency of legislation since the commencement of the present century had been to confer privileges on the lower classes and enable them to participate in the privileges and rights possessed by those above them. The present Prime Minister conceded the principle of this Bill when he admitted all male householders in English boroughs to the Parliamentary as well as to the municipal franchise:—and he did not believe that right hon. Gentleman regretted the step he had taken, or would think of retracing it if he had the opportunity, for to that step he owed in a great degree his present high position. It was neither wise nor expedient to deny the humbler householders a voice in the management of local matters seriously affecting their interests and comforts. In the 11 Irish towns which had been referred to, only one in 40 of the population possessed the franchise; whereas in similar towns in England, the proportion was one in eight. There was one point in the question which had not been sufficiently ventilated. A working man in an Irish town who was rated at 20s., probably occupied a tenement for which he paid a rental of 50s. or £3. If that same man came to England and found employment, he would immediately enter on the occupancy of a tenement for which he would pay, at least, £8 a-year. It was easy to explain why in Ireland in all probability a man of that class would receive wages amounting to 15s. a-week, out of which he would pay 50s. or 60s. a-year for his tenement; but the same man coming to this country would receive 24s. to 30s. a-week; so that he could afford to pay 3s. a-week for his house. So that the man who was denied the franchise in Ireland was admitted to it in England, not by reason of any improved mental qualification, but simply because he received higher wages and could therefore pay a higher rent. There was another point. Suppose you wanted to raise £100 upon a valuation of £2,000 in Ireland, 1s. in the £1 would give the requisite amount, but suppose for the purpose of raising this £100 you should value the tenements at £4,000, that would give you an apparent reduction to 6d. in the £1. Therefore mere rating was not a sufficient ground to go upon in deciding this question. The opposition now raised to that Bill was but another illustration of the old story of one class being possessed of privileges and desiring to withhold a share of them from another class. The last speaker asked whether, if they had to do over again what they had done in England in that matter, they would not hesitate to do it? The Prime Minister could answer that question, for he had enfranchised the people of England, and he now enjoyed their confidence as the result of his liberality.

MR. KAVANAGH said, he opposed the Bill on the ground that, not only were many of its provisions bad in themselves, but also because he regarded it as part of a mischievous attempt for dealing with the question. It must be considered in connection with another

Bill before the House. What was the real object of the Bill? The avowed object was set forth in one of the clauses as being "with the object to lower the franchise." Now, that was explained in connection with a Rating Bill, and, so far as he understood the question, it appeared to him that the purpose in view was to give the occupiers all the votes, and oblige the owners to pay all the rates. He did not know whether he interpreted the motives of the promoters truly; but certainly, as far as he had been able to read and understand the two Bills, taking them together, that appeared to his mind to be the meaning. Now, they had heard a good deal about the assimilation of the laws of England and Ireland. He was not opposed to that assimilation; but he was not one who thought that the institutions of England should be forced upon Ireland, merely because they existed in England. They should first consider the circumstances of the case. He hoped the House would not allow itself to be led away by the plausible cry that had been raised for assimilation without pausing to ask what was proposed to be done towards assimilation by passing the Bill. He denied that any assimilation would take place under it. He need not go into the matter of franchise in the two countries. That part of the question had been ably dealt with by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis.) But the assimilation of which they had heard was only a delusion and a snare. It was assimilation in theory, but not in fact. By the Bill they would have a large increase in the number of persons who should be admitted to the franchise. But there would be a great difference in the character of the class into whose hands the control of municipal expenditure would be thrown. The hon. Member who last spoke said the reason why opposition was offered to the Bill was on account of class feeling, because one class desired to keep to itself certain privileges which they ought to share. Now, that he utterly denied; but he did say that the Bill made an endeavour to get up a feeling in the minds of the people that there was an attempt to deny them certain privileges which it was held they should have. He was not opposed to a proper extension of the municipal franchise where it could be granted. He fully admitted the principle that taxation and representation should be coequal. But they could not stop half way with the principle. He maintained that the men who paid the larger portion of the rates should have the larger control over the expenditure of those rates—a larger control than men who paid only a small portion of the rates. Now, those questions should not be started merely for Party purposes. What was asked for was not a fair extension, but a one-sided extension. Last Session an attempt was made to deal with the question; but when he recalled all the circumstances he must say he was convinced that the purpose with which the Bill was concocted was to swamp the representation of property, and to put the whole power connected with the dealing with large rates into the hands of the lower classes. Now, that was not a method of proceeding which should be sanctioned. The hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the other side would not object to take this advice from the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett.) What had he said?

"It must never be forgotten that there are two ways by which people can be deprived of representation—one, by keeping the right to vote from them; the other, by placing them in so hopeless a minority, that virtually they must be without representation."

Recognizing the all-importance of the truth that true democracy consisted in securing as far as possible the representation, it followed that if the most intelligent sections of opinion were unable to obtain representation, many of the best men in the country would naturally withdraw themselves from political life, and thus the representation would surely and steadily deteriorate. That would be the result of passing such a measure as this. He believed this precipitate and indiscriminate extension of the municipal franchise would lead to an utter disruption of all good municipal government. Take, then, sanitary matters. The Sanitary Commissioners reported that the evidence before them showed abundant proof that sanitary reforms were in many cases rendered impossible, because of the hostility of the inhabitants of towns. The clause contemplated by the Bill would assuredly create difficulties in the way of sanitary reform. But he was not opposed to inquiry with a view to enlarge the constituencies upon just principles. He should desire to see the whole question of municipal reform inquired into by a Commission who should sift it thoroughly; but a Bill like this would stand in the way of such a project, and he therefore hoped the House would reject the Bill.

Mr. BUTT said, with reference to the Local Government in Towns (Ireland) Bill, he would express a hope that the British House of Commons would never pass a Bill which would give the nomination of one-half of the corporation of every town in Ireland to the landlords. He could not congratulate the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) on the accuracy of his statement as to the history of that question. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the lowering of the municipal below the Parliamentary franchise as if it were something new in England—he seemed, indeed, not to know that there had ever been a difference between the municipal and Parliamentary franchise in this country. Now, in 1832, the Reform Act fixed the Parliamentary franchise, both in England and Ireland, at £10 in boroughs. After that, in 1838, a Corporation Reform Act was passed for England, which did not place the municipal franchise on the level of the Parliamentary franchise, but gave it to every occupier who had been rated for three years. [Mr. C. LEWIS said, he had made no reference to England, but to the state of things in Ireland at that time.] The hon. Member had certainly appealed to the House not to do for Ireland what had never been done in England, and not to degrade, as he called it, the municipal franchise below the Parliamentary franchise. The real animus of the opposition to this Bill was revealed in the question of the hon. Member, when he asked if in the same circumstances they would do the same thing for England. This was the reactionary principle avowed by the hon. Member, and it was evident that he would, if he dared, deprive England of her popular municipal franchise also. As for his own part in the matter, he had steadily persevered in the endeavour to obtain for Ireland the same municipal rights as England enjoyed, and if he had supported on any previous occasion a less radical measure than the present, it was simply with the view of obtaining a part, if he could not get the whole of what he wanted. The extension of the franchise in Dublin had not produced any disastrous results. Since that event 25 Lord Mayors had been elected, and of these 12 were Protestants and 13 Liberals and Roman Catholics. This fact surely went to prove the existence of a spirit of moderation among the class whom it was now proposed to enfranchise. It was contended that under the Bill property would not have its due share of representation, and that under it the power would pass into the hands of the smaller householders; but he ventured to say that this was the case in every English corporate town: and it was neither a Conservative nor a constitutional principle that a preponderating influence should be given to property, either in the House of Commons or in their municipal bodies. Property, intelligence, and rank would always command influence, and it was a mistake to suppose that the poor were not as much interested in taxation as the rich—a penny might be worth as much to the artizan as a pound to his wealthy neighbour; and seeing that no people in the world were more Conservative than the Irish—more ready to pay due deference to rank, ancient lineage, wealth, and station—it was unreasonable to deny them the privilege proposed to be conferred on them in the Bill. All they asked for was an assimilation of the Irish municipal franchise to that of England, which had been recognized as one of the chief causes of the tranquillity and contentment of this country; and on what ground it could be maintained that the cases of the English and the Irish artizan were different he failed to see. He would remind the House that the power of taxation of Irish corporations did not go beyond 3*d.* in the pound. The poorer classes had just as much interest, or more, in keeping down rates as the wealthy, and it was absurd to suppose that they would first confiscate their own property in order to confiscate the property of the rich. The Irish people, when they expressed dissatisfaction with the existing state of things, were often told that they lived under the same Government and enjoyed the same privileges as the people of England, but that was not the case. An artizan of Limerick who went to reside in Liverpool, and having resided there for the space of one year, could, if he contrived at all to keep a house over his head, take a part in municipal elections. After a time, however, he returned to Limerick, and then found he could not exercise any such privilege there until he had resided for three years in a house rated at £10. Did they think that man would not contrast the liberty which he enjoyed in the English town with the curtailment of liberty which he suffered in the Irish town, and at the same time contrasting the prosperity which he had seen in Liverpool with the poverty which prevailed in Limerick, come to the conclusion that these several conditions of things had not some dependence on each other? The municipal franchise which had succeeded in England would no doubt succeed in Ireland too; and he warned the House that if they rejected this measure, they would impress the belief on the minds of the Irish people that England was determined still to govern Ireland in the old spirit of conquest, and so they would promote that feeling of discontent which he and those who acted with him had done their best to allay.

Mr. Butt

MR. MULHOLLAND said, those who supported the Bill had failed to prove that there was any real practical grievance to complain of. They had on the previous day heard of practical grievances in connection with English corporations, arising out of existing anomalies; but in the present case the arguments were altogether founded upon a wish to produce an idea of symmetry which commended itself to hon. Members on the other side of the House. They proceeded upon the principle that in all cases the legislation should be the same as the legislation in England. That had not always been the principle upon which legislation was asked for in that House—it was not many years since very important measures were passed in reference to Ireland which were founded not altogether upon a principle of identity. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) had referred to Belfast, and the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had controverted some of those statements. The hon. and learned Member must have been misinformed, when he stated there was a compact on the part of Belfast for a private Bill to enlarge the franchise there. If he (Mr. Mulholland) recollected the circumstances, it was rather this—that there was an understanding made that the rates upon the lower division of the ratepayers should not be raised beyond a certain point. The hon. Member for Londonderry had brought out so forcibly the effects which the change would have upon Belfast, that it was unnecessary for him to repeat his observations; but there was one point which the hon. Member for Londonderry did not allude to, and that was that the amount of the rates upon the different owners in Belfast were very limited. Not only were those which were rated below the £8 so situated that, though only paying one-fifth of the entire amount of the rates, whilst numbering five-sevenths of the whole in point of number, but the amounts were very much less than the rate paid by the higher class. One effect of the change proposed in the present Bill would be that the rates would be assimilated—and he questioned very much whether that class for which the hon. and learned Member professed so strong a sympathy, would conceive it a boon if their rates were nearly doubled. He found that the police rate upon houses below the £8 franchise was only 9d., and above that 1s. 9d. in the pound. He also found that the general purposes rate was 1s. 6d. upon the class below £8, and the class above that 2s. in the pound. Therefore, there was a very substantial equivalent to those who, under the present franchise, were not directly represented. But, further, the rates were only contributed by those who had the franchise. The rates upon houses below £8 were in all cases paid by the owner, and not by the occupier—he did not say that, indirectly, the owner did not get it in the rent. What was the result of the present system in Belfast? He believed everyone who had visited Belfast would be struck with the extraordinary development of the town, and that was mainly owing to the good arrangement of the present Town Council. They had opened new works, new streets, and had otherwise developed the town in a most satisfactory way. He was not himself intimate with the state of affairs in Dublin, but he heard that the result of the lowering of the franchise there was not satisfactory. In Dublin the franchise was similar to that in English boroughs; and they saw that Belfast had improved vastly under the present system, and he believed it would be found practically that the higher franchise gave more satisfactory results than the lower one. But this was a very broad question. It took up the whole question of local government and local taxation—for the duties that were at present entrusted to municipal corporations were very much more extensive than they were at the time when they were first entrusted to them. It was only last year, or the year before, that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) introduced a Bill on the principle that the ownership of property had an equal source of weight with the occupancy of property. The reason of the same principle being applied to municipal corporations was that the functions of corporations were not limited to paving, lighting, and watching; but were extended to matters of large sanitary improvements, the purchase of gas and water works, &c. This carried the interest far beyond that of a mere occupant. In such a case, it was only just that those upon whom the reversion fell should have, at least, an equal voice in the expense. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick had taken the hon. Member for Londonderry to task, for stating that probably if the municipal corporations of England were to be again founded they would probably not be founded on the same principle as to representation. He shared with the hon. Member for Londonderry that belief. He hoped that in the interests of Ireland the House would not pass the Bill, but prefer that of the hon. Member for Carlisle, which embodied the principles he had mentioned.

MR. LAW said, he was unable to discover that any good reason had been advanced for making a distinction between Ireland and England in the matter of the municipal franchise. It was quite plain indeed that the objections of hon. Members opposite applied equally to England and Ireland. They seemed in fact to mourn over the course of municipal legislation for the last 40 years, and now to desire to undo what was deliberately done as far back as 1835; for since that time the municipal franchise in England had been an occupation rated franchise, as proposed for Ireland by the present Bill. It appeared to him to be extremely desirable that in all cases where no special reason for difference could be shown, the laws of the two countries should be assimilated. What was good for England ought, generally speaking, to be good for Ireland also; and, in his opinion, ought to be provided for both countries, if possible, by one and the same Act. It had indeed been urged by his hon. Friend who had just spoken as a reason for not extending the municipal franchise in the way proposed, that sanitary powers had been conferred of late years on municipal authorities. In his view, however, that was rather a reason why the franchise should be made as wide as possible, for the poor man was at least quite as much interested in sanitary matters as the rich. He must say too that he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick that municipal corporations were not to be regarded as merely money-spending bodies, whose only business was with such matters as paving and lighting. They were also centres of political life and energy; and he should fear for the political life of a country whose municipal institutions were so reduced, perhaps, he might say degraded, as to exist merely for the purposes to which some hon. Members would restrict them. He should for these reasons give his support to the Bill.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS: Sir, I do not see that any advantage could arise from the passing of the proposed Bill. Some remarks have been made as to the excellent manner in which the municipal affairs of Belfast are managed, but I am sorry to say I cannot speak so favourably on behalf of the Corporation of Dublin as regards its works of usefulness. The principal citizens of Dublin and the largest ratepayers are, I am bound to say, altogether dissatisfied with the corporation. The taxation of Dublin is almost unprecedentedly heavy, and it is increasing. The duties of the corporation, I am sorry to say, are to a great extent neglected. Very often when most important business is to be brought before that body, the roll is called and a quorum is not present. I also regret to say when politics are to be brought before the corporation there is a full attendance. How the reduction of the period of occupation from three years to one would improve the state of things I am at a loss to know. In the other boroughs it is proposed to reduce the qualification from £10 to what it is now in Dublin, which is practically a household franchise. In Dublin the number of separate ratings at and under £8 is 10,598, or 40·6 per cent of the whole, and their total valuation is £45,961, or 8·3 per cent of the whole; while the number of ratings over £8 is 15,519, or 59·4 per cent of the whole, and their total valuation £509,147, or 91·7 per cent of the whole, so that in Dublin the payers of only 8·3 per cent of the taxation may possess 40 per cent of the votes. In the other 10 municipal boroughs the number of ratings over £8 is 20,063, valued at £639,843; whilst the number of ratings at £8 and under is 52,470, valued at £183,003, so that the proposed reduction of the qualification will confer the franchise on a body of new electors two and a-half times greater than the number of existing electors, although they will only pay one-fourth as much of the taxes. In fact, the payers of less than one-fourth of the taxation will possess three-fourths of the votes. Theoretically it may be desirable that every man should have a vote; but I do not see why property should not have its due weight in the administration of municipal affairs. Therefore, I must oppose the measure now before the House, and I entreat the House not to pass it, inasmuch as we have in Dublin an example of what may be expected in other corporate towns in Ireland if the change proposed by this Bill be made.

MR. M. BROOKS said, Dublin, in some respects, reminded him of the conditions of Venice, from which the greater part of the resident gentry had departed, and if its houses were not left in ruins, the city was, at least, nearly desolate. In Belfast, under the auspices of what he would not say was the dominant race in Ireland, but certainly the favoured race, prosperity had fallen in a very remarkable degree, and the population had increased, whereas in Dublin the population had fallen away. With regard to what had been done by the corporation of Dublin, he might refer with pride to the waterworks of that city. A supply of the purest water was brought from a distance of nearly 50 miles, and distributed, not merely in the city, but in the district around. In the whole world there was not a better or more efficient supply of pure water than that which had been secured to Dublin by the Corporation. He admitted that the condition of the sewerage and the streets would not bear comparison with Belfast or London; but that was not owing to any want of desire on the part of the Corporation to do what was needed. No one could venture to say there had been any malversation or misappropriation of money in Dublin. Indeed, he had heard the charge made of undue frugality, and with a desire to refrain from spending money. They had power to borrow from the Government £500,000, but they refrained from exercising that power, because they believed the poorer rate-payers were unable to pay the interest. With regard to the loyalty of the Corporation, he had been a member of it for 20 years, and he had never heard political opinions advanced in it unworthy of any assembly in the United Kingdom. He had never heard within the City Hall a single disparagement of the Government or person of the Sovereign, nor had he ever heard any political proposition advanced which he could have wished withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS rose to Order. He had never said there was any exhibition of disloyalty in the Corporation.

MR. M. BROOKS did not suppose his hon. Colleague had, for it would have been impossible. But the hon. Baronet did say that the extension of the franchise would make the Corporation exclusive. He utterly denied that that had been the experience of the past—he asserted that the affairs of the Corporation were as well administered as those of any similar institution in the United Kingdom.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he hoped they would be able to discuss this question without travelling beyond its proper limits. The question before them simply was, whether in 11 Irish towns a change should be made which would greatly affect the constitution of the bodies charged with the administration of municipal government and with the power to levy local taxation. The hon. Members who promoted the Bill proposed so to lower the franchise that it would let in a large number of additional voters of the poorer class. The Bill started on the principle stated in the Preamble—namely, that it was expedient and just that the municipal franchise should be the same in Ireland as in England. But he thought it would be admitted by the House that before they could arrive at that conclusion they should be satisfied on one or two points which did not appear to have been clearly proved in the debate. The first of these was, Had the action of the Legislature in past times with regard to municipal institutions in England and Ireland been identical? Secondly, was the prevailing system of town government in England and Ireland, except with regard to the amount on which the municipal franchise was fixed, identical? and, third, were the circumstances of the people of these towns identical in both countries? The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had referred to the Municipal Reform Act for England of 1835 and the Municipal Reform Act for Ireland of 1840, and to the English and Irish corporations as they existed before that day. The system before that time was to a great extent identical, for there could be no doubt that the municipalities before those Acts were passed were close corporations in both countries, and that neither householders nor occupiers within the municipal boundaries had, as such, anything to do with the choice of those who were to govern them and spend their money. The Municipal Reform Acts brought about a different state of things in both countries; but they brought it about in a different way. Last night they had a debate on unreformed corporations, from which it appeared how tenderly the English Act dealt with the rights of corporations existing before its passing, and there were now 78 corporations, besides the great Corporation of London, which were entirely exempt from its provisions. What was the case with regard to the Irish Act? It absolutely swept away all the corporations then existing in Ireland, and provided for the re-establishment of 10 of them. It provided further that every town desiring in future to become a municipality could apply for a charter to the Government. Now, what led to that difference between the Irish and English Reform Acts—a difference deliberately made by Parliament? The English Act was intended to inaugurate a new system of town government for towns in England as a whole, and with rare exceptions it had been applied to all important towns. But in Ireland at the time of the passing of the Irish Act, there was in operation the Act of 9 Geo. IV., under which several towns had placed themselves, which instituted a different system of town government from that which was established by the Irish Municipal Reform Act, and was based on a more popular qualification. Since that date what had happened? He had said that only 10 Irish towns were by the Act made municipalities, and that power was given to others to come in; but since 1840 only two applications for charters had been made, one of which had been granted and the other refused. He thought this circumstance, added to the fact that not fewer than 30 Irish municipalities had, between the Union and the Act of 1840, expired of inanition, proved that the municipal system, which was an English and not an Irish system, was not very popular in Ireland. In 1854 the Towns Improvement Act, the provisions of which were very similar to those of 9 Geo. IV., already referred to, was passed, and it had been adopted by no less than 76 Irish towns, and many of these towns were more thriving and important than some of those which were covered by this Bill. He thought that this proved that the Act of 1854 was more popular or more suitable to Ireland than the Municipal Reform Act, and that when they proposed simply to alter the franchise laid down by the latter Act they did but touch a small part of the question. Neither of the franchises which existed under the old Acts were so low as the qualification proposed under the present Bill; that fixed by the Act 9 Geo. IV. being £5, and that under the Towns Improvement Act £4. There was under one of these Acts an owners' franchise; but it seemed that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick objected to that, when embodied in the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlow.

MR. BUTT said, he did not object to that. He objected that the landlords were allowed to name one-half of every corporation.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he very much sympathized with what the hon. and learned Gentlemen said with regard to the proposal that the owners should select half of the corporation; but the owners' franchise was no new thing. He ventured to say that, viewed in this light, the Bill now before the House dealt imperfectly and but very partially with the franchise. He had endeavoured to show that in past times Parliament had dealt differently with town government in Ireland and England, and consequently there was a different system existing in the two countries. He would now proceed to the more important point—as to how far the circumstances of the two countries were so identical that they could pass identical legislation for both. Viewing the legislation which had taken place, the presumption was that they were not identical. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis) showed that there was a great difference in the circumstances of the occupiers in the Irish towns as compared with those in England. It was a matter of regret, but it must be admitted that there was not in Ireland, as there was in England, a large and influential middle class between the higher and lower class of occupiers. Comparisons had been made by the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Gorman) between English and Irish towns; but he (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) wished to carry that comparison a little further on a Return issued in 1872, on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. The hon. and gallant Member had compared Gateshead and Limerick, and had stated that Limerick, with a nearly equal population, had a much smaller number of municipal voters than Gateshead. No doubt the figures had been stated correctly; but the circumstances of the two places were materially different. He found that in Limerick the occupiers not exceeding £4 value were, in 1872, 5,094, and the number above that value were 1,732. In Gateshead, which the hon. and gallant Gentleman selected by way of contrast, matters were precisely the reverse. The number of occupiers below £4 was 1,654, and above that sum, 5,556. And yet they were asked to consider the circumstances as identical, and to establish an identical franchise. The hon. and gallant Member had, in the same way, compared Swansea and Cork; but in Swansea, in 1866, the occupiers under £4 were 2,601; above that sum, 8,100. In Cork, in 1872, there were, under £4, 6,732; above £4, 6,013. He could go on quoting figures telling the same tale. Any hon. Member who had seen an ordinary Irish town knew full well the miserable cabins which clustered on the outskirts, and nothing could be found to compare with these tenements, as a rule, in England. He found in Kilkenny that 69 per cent of the total number of separate ratings were below the annual value of £4. In Drogheda the proportion was 75 per cent, and in Waterford 54 per cent below that value. If he were told that Irish valuation was below the real value, and that £4 represented a higher figure, he would ask the House to consider what sort of a tenement a £1 valuation, be it high or low, could be considered to represent; and to remember that 27 per cent of the separate ratings at Kilkenny and Drogheda, and 13·9 per cent of them at Waterford, did not exceed even that figure. It was said this argument must not be pressed, and that higher wages here had something to do with the difference; but if higher wages meant a better house, they also meant, as a rule, greater intelligence and independence than could be found among the occupants of these wretched cabins. The effect of the Bill would be to greatly enlarge the number of municipal electors in Ireland belonging to this class. In Dublin the municipal electors would be increased from 5,500 to 16,000, and in eight other boroughs from 5,000 to 23,000. Figures like these showed that the measure would have a very large influence in determining the government of the Irish municipalities, and with regard to the taunt that those who opposed this Bill begrudged the extensions which had been made in England, he thought he need not deal with that. The question was not what was good for towns' government in England, but what was good for it in Ireland, and on that issue only he trusted the House would now decide. His hon. Friend (Sir Arthur Guinness) had touched upon a subject which disclosed some difference of opinion between him and his Colleague; and although it was not for him to decide whether, under the present system, Dublin was efficiently governed, he was bound to say when his hon. Friend (Mr. Maurice Brooks) compared that charming city with a city on the Adriatic, he thought he was going to carry out his comparison by reference to the odours which, at certain times of the year, were but too perceptible on certain waterways in both cities. When his hon. Friend spoke of so many tenements being desolate, he could not but remember that perhaps the dislike of capitalists to invest their money in improvements might be the very heavy rates which, from whatever cause, were levied by the municipal authorities in Dublin. He would not say whether Dublin was efficiently governed, but he had noticed that the duties of lighting, cleansing, and mending the streets were not very efficiently performed. ["No, no!"] Well, writers of all kinds of politics, from The Daily Express to The Freeman's Journal, were unanimous on this subject. He fully admitted the importance of accustoming all classes of the people to the management of local affairs and the valuable character of that self-education. He did not defend the present limit of the Irish municipal franchise. He should be glad to see it lowered, but he ventured to say a far more pressing question with reference to town government in Ireland than the extension of the franchise was the existing composition and efficiency of the bodies who controlled those towns. They ought to attempt to inaugurate municipal reform in Government as well as in the franchise; and if the whole subject were carefully considered, it was possible that both objects might be attained through the adoption of a system of local representation, which had been carried out of late in this country with satisfactory results. He meant the cumulative or minority system, under which the School Boards and some Members of that House were elected. He noticed in the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) proposals which were absent from that of the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), substituting for a complicated and varied system of town government a system which had at least the advantage of being uniform. He (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) wished to see the whole question dealt with in an impartial spirit by the House, and therefore he trusted the House would not agree to the Bill, but that it would adopt a Motion which, in the event of the rejection of the Bill, he proposed to place on the Paper this Session, as he did last, for a general inquiry into the system of local government of towns in Ireland. He thought that this course was one which might result in the adoption of a change which would be free from the objections to which he considered the Bill now before them was liable—a change which would at the same time widen the basis on which these local institutions rested, and attract to the work of municipal administration the talent and the ability of the community.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 176: Majority 28.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

SEA INSURANCES (STAMPING OF POLICIES) BILL—[BILL 26.]

(Mr. Serjeant Simon, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Rathbone.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to remove a serious evil. Where there were several distinct interests insured in one policy, and the stamp duty had been paid upon the aggregate, and had not been calculated upon each of the separate interests, the policy would not be available in any Court of Law or Equity, but for all practical purposes would be absolutely void, if the stamp duty upon the separate interests exceeded what had been paid upon the aggregate. The insurer was not even allowed to cure the error by payment of the correct amount. Now it continually happened that the separate interests were not ascertainable, where there were several shipments from abroad, until the last shipment had been notified to the correspondent here, so that the law as it now stood imposed an impossible duty. The object of the Bill was to remedy this defect. It would enable the merchant, who had insured on a time policy on the aggregate amount of the shipments, and had stamped his policy accordingly, to cure any deficiency by stamping it correctly within a reasonable time after the separate interests of the shipments had been ascertained.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought everybody would agree that the object of the Bill was a good one. The Treasury had communicated with the Board of Inland Revenue, and they had inserted certain alterations in the Bill, which he believed the hon. and learned Gentleman would accept. Under these circumstances, the Bill had the hearty support of the Government.

Motion agreed to : Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

BURGESSES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Yeaman.)

[BILL 48.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'LAREN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that in England the word "burgess" and "householder" were equivalent and convertible terms. It was so once in Scotland; but now burgesses had dwindled down to a comparatively small number, and the charities and other advantages connected with the burgesses were now monopolized by comparatively a few persons. The object of this Bill was to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England, subject to this qualification, that, whereas by a recent Act a burgess in England required only one year's residence, the Bill before the House required three years residence, and required also not only that the poor rates should be paid, but that rates of every kind should be paid. Under these circumstances, he hoped there would be no objection to the second reading of the Bill. He had taken an opportunity of consulting the Lord Advocate, and he understood that his Lordship had no objection, but believed it to be a good Bill, and worthy of passing the Legislature.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not think it right that he should allow this Bill to be read a second time in silence in the absence of the Lord Advocate. He did not actually know what the views of the Lord Advocate were upon this matter, and therefore he should reserve his opinion on the Bill until it came before Committee.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON
BILL—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, the real object of this Bill was concealed by a new name, and to that extent it was misleading—more especially as there was another Act in existence which was known by the same title. It was formerly called the Infanticide Bill; now it was entitled Offences against the Person. It had been well described as a Bill to imprison a woman because she was not in her mind. He had received a number of letters from ladies who said that women should not be held responsible for the injuries they might inflict upon their children at the time of their confinement, because their agonies distracted them, and there was something painful in the idea of an Assembly composed entirely of men, and elected by men, legislating with such severity for the other sex. The crime against which this Bill was directed could not be stamped out by legislation. You might as well attempt to get rid of the smallpox by cutting out each pustule as to get rid of this disease in society by brutal repression. The hon. Member concluded by moving the postponement of the Committee to that day six months.

Amendment proposed to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. P. A. Taylor,)—instead thereof.

MR. CHARLEY said, he hardly expected that the Bill would come on that day, and if the House assented to the Motion for leaving the Chair he would consent to the reporting of Progress at once, so that more time might be given for consideration. The object of the Bill was to protect poor helpless children. This was the fourth time that it was presented to the notice of the House. In three previous years it passed the House without any opposition, and he could not understand why the hon. Member (Mr. P. A. Taylor) at the eleventh hour opposed it. The Bill was not open to the objections which had been raised by the hon. Member, because it could not touch women who inflicted injuries on their children during puerperal mania, because the acts which it would punish must have been done maliciously. The Bill rested on the authority of a Royal Commission composed of some of the most distinguished Members of the two Houses of Parliament.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that human nature was outraged by this Bill, and he should oppose it at every stage.

MR. STAVELEY HILL also opposed the Bill as an attempt to deal with a small part of a large subject.

MR. DODSON suggested that the Bill had better be postponed at once, because there was not time on that occasion to discuss this subject.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 82: Majority 26.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.

Then other Orders of the Day being taken—

It being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House till To-morrow, without putting the Question.

TELEGRAPHS (MONEY) BILL.

Resolution [February 28] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 90.]

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the sale by retail of Intoxicating Liquors in Scotland.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, Mr. DALRYMPLE, Mr. MAITLAND, and Mr. EDWARD JENKINS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 91.]

TRADE UNION ACT (1871) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MUNDELLA, Bill to amend "The Trade Union Act, 1871," ordered to be brought in by Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. THOMAS BRASSEY, Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, and Mr. MORLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 92.]

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 2nd March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL.—*Second Reading—
Referred to Select Committee—Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees (3).*

ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES AND FEES

BILL.—(No. 3.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, their Lordships would remember that last year he introduced a Bill which dealt with a portion of the difficult question of Ecclesiastical Fees. It provided that all persons hereafter appointed to any of the offices treated of in this Bill should hold the same subject to such regulations as to fees as might hereafter be made by Parliament and should make the returns to the Treasury of the amounts they received. While the Bill was under discussion the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack declared that he concurred in a hope expressed by the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Carlisle that that small Bill might be regarded as a solemn pledge that the whole question of fees would be dealt with without delay; and he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) also expressed his concurrence in that view. In 1872 a Bill, of which the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) took charge dealing with the whole question, was carried through this House, but did not make progress in the House of Commons; and that measure was in succession to Bills, having the same object, introduced in 1870 and 1871, one of which was the product of the labours of a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. Their Lordships would therefore see that the question was not a new one, that it had been very thoroughly considered, and that there was great difficulty in passing any measure with regard to it. It would give some idea of the difficulty and complication of the question with which they had to deal when he stated that as he was informed there were more than 100 Acts of Parliament relating to ecclesiastical offices, and that about 60 of them were still in full force. The present measure, so far as it dealt with ecclesiastical offices and fees, was as much as possible a reproduction of the well-considered Bills introduced in the previous Sessions by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), to whom all who took an interest in the question of ecclesiastical fees were so much indebted. But first their Lordships must consider for a moment whether it was wise or necessary to press any measure upon the Legislature on this subject. It was an opinion not uncommonly held by those who had not looked into the matter that the whole of the offices to which this Bill referred were sinecures, that the duties performed by the persons who held them were of no use to anybody, and that the sooner the whole system fell to pieces the better. But he thought that those who had examined the question would be of opinion that the offices proposed to be preserved in this Bill were necessary for the welfare of the Church and the community, and that in seeking to regulate and to diminish the number of these offices he was undertaking to make really effective an important part of the machinery of the Church. He need hardly point out that when a young man was ordained to the ministry of the Established Church he acquired certain civil privileges; and consequently some registration of the act of ordination was indispensable in order that his civil rights might be secured. Again, when a building was set apart for the services of the Church and the celebration of marriages, civil consequences resulted from the ecclesiastical acts performed which made a careful registration absolutely essential. Again, inconvenience would of course arise if the clergy were under no discipline, and unless there were means of inspecting the mode in which their duties were discharged, or of punishing any offence which they might commit in derogation of their sacred character. The act of visitation, therefore, was of a judicial nature, and the proceedings accompanying it must of course be registered; and therefore certain officers, who were not distinctly ecclesiastics and yet had to do with these ecclesiastical matters, had been called into existence. Institutions, collations, and inductions of the clergy into their offices were all matters involving important civil consequences, and certain officers were necessarily required to see that these various acts were duly and properly performed, and that a register of what had taken place was properly kept, in case future civil action arose with reference to them. As he had said, a great number of officers had sprung into existence whose duty it was to watch these various judicial processes. But he was not prepared to say that the number of such officers was not excessive, and it was one of the objects of this Bill to unite different offices in the same person, and thereby diminish the number. He, as Archbishop of Canterbury, had the honour of commanding the services of a Dean of the Arches, a Master of the Faculties, a Registrar of the Court of Arches, a Registrar of the Court of the Faculties, a Vicar General, a Registrar of the Vicar General's Office, a Chancellor of the Diocese of Canterbury, and a Registrar and a Deputy Registrar of the Diocese, besides a Secretary and Apparitors. As it would be absurd to suppose that the duties of these persons were so onerous that they could not be united this Bill proposed to reduce the staff. Officers of the like character, though not quite so numerous, existed in every diocese; and in addition there were the Archidiaconal officers; for, though the Archdeacon's Courts had been abolished, officers of those Courts still existed. The fact was, that the existing machinery was partly the remnant of an old system altered by legislation; but, as a matter of fact, two or three persons in each diocese might perform the whole of the work for which a large staff was now maintained. Up to 1857 the Dean of the Court of Arches had to do with not only the ecclesiastical business of the Province of Canterbury, but with the whole of the marriage law as it then existed in that Province; and the Dean presiding over the Prerogative Court had to do with testamentary affairs. But in 1857 a change took place—testamentary and matrimonial causes were withdrawn from the Archbishop's Court, which was consequently left in a somewhat ruinous condition. When a new Court of Probate and Divorce was established, the late Lord Cranworth, who was at that time Lord Chancellor, was asked how the Judge of the Arches Court was to be remunerated in future for the work which he was to be called upon to discharge—the amount he received as

Judge of that Court being about £15. From 1857 till this year the difficulty was overcome by the Archbishop of Canterbury asking the Judge of Admiralty to undertake the duties of the Arches Court. Thanks were due to the learned Judges who complied with that request; but delays naturally arose in the discharge of the business of the Arches Court, which ought to be completed with as much despatch as possible. The delays arose from no want of diligence on the part of the learned Judges—they were inevitable under the arrangement existing at the time. Under the new Judicature Act it became no longer possible for the Judge of the Admiralty Court to hold an ecclesiastical office. The question therefore arose, how, under existing conditions, the Judge of the Court of Arches was to be remunerated? It was indispensable that a conclusion should be arrived at on that point. Last July a noble and learned Lord—who was not now present (Lord Penzance)—undertook the duties of the Judge of the Arches Court, and in the present Bill it was proposed that a system should be established whereby proper remuneration should be given to the holder of the office now filled by that noble and learned Lord. The amount of that remuneration was left open in the Bill; and the same course was adopted with regard to the remuneration of several other officers. Before settling the question of remuneration, care should be taken to secure, so far as the regulations of Parliament could effect it, that all persons to be appointed were perfectly fitted to discharge their duties. It was accordingly proposed that all persons who held the office of registrar or any other office dealt with by the Bill should discharge the duties of their office in person, and that the registrars as well as the chancellors should have certain legal qualifications—such as should give security to the country that they were fitted for the discharge of their duties. The time, perhaps, was past when there could be any very serious abuse in that way; but still it was a fact that not very long ago the office of registrar was held in one diocese by a gentleman who was a missionary of the Free Church of Scotland, and who, he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) supposed, had been in the enjoyment of the post since the time he was in his cradle. Again, it was not so very long ago when a noble and learned Lord, while speaking vigorously in their Lordships' House against the present system, was reminded by a right rev. Prelate who interrupted him that he himself was a registrar. The noble and learned Lord was so surprised that he could scarcely continue his argument. There had been a great deal of difficulty in obtaining a statement of the amount of fees which were at present collected by the various ecclesiastical officers; but a very moderate computation made them amount altogether to £46,000. Of these marriage licences produced about £18,000; general fees to Bishops' officers, £21,000; and, so far as he could ascertain, the fees paid to archdeacons and their officers, £7,000. That he believed to be the lowest and most moderate calculation. Looking carefully into the matter, it would appear that by giving effect to the provisions of the Bill, and assigning fair salaries to the several officers employed, a saving of about £10,000 a-year might be effected. It might be hoped, therefore, that when the system which this Bill would establish was brought into working order, there might be brought about a diminution in the fees now paid by the clergy and others. Some of the fees were unpalatable in themselves, and others were unpalatable by reason of the mode in which they were collected. Visitation fees—which he thought were not immoderate in amount—were extremely irritating for the second of those reasons. But in some cases almost as heavy a fee had to be paid on giving up an office as on being appointed. It need scarcely be said that such a fee was unpalatable. It was now proposed that all ecclesiastical fees should be paid over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but to provide against any encroachment on the Common Fund of that Commission, it would be enacted that in respect of those fees, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should not pay out more than they received. There was an apparent exception to this in the provision for the payment of £200 to be paid to archdeacons; but they were entitled to this sum under an existing Act of Parliament, though they had not yet received it in full. To sum up, offices were to be united; the number of officers was to be diminished; legal qualifications were to be insisted on before any person could be appointed to office; the officers were to discharge their duties in person; hereafter all ecclesiastical fees, the subject of the Bill, were to be paid into a General Fund and distributed in the way of salaries. It was desirable that the civil machinery of the Established Church should be such as to command respect. It was not desirable to try and prop up a system which was tottering to its fall—they ought rather to put their house in order, and make due provision for the proper discharge of duties which were essential to the maintenance and the welfare of the Church. He anticipated that there would be no violent or very manifest opposition to the Bill; but there would be a steady, he might say stolid determination on the part of some persons that it should share the fate of other attempts in the same direction. The great danger to the measure lay in the fact that sufficient interest would not be manifested in its favour, and that the views of those who feared that it affected vested interests would prevail. This fear was not well founded, because the greatest care had been taken to preserve vested interests. The majority of the ecclesiastical officers now living were valuable servants of the Church, and to them the country was greatly indebted for the zealous discharge of their duties, and they had no reason to fear any injustice from the right rev. Bench. He would earnestly commend the Bill to the consideration of their Lordships, and trusted that they would now give it the second reading.

Moved "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."—(The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY considered the Bill as one of great importance to the interests of the Church, and the thanks of their Lordships were due to the most rev. Prelate for its introduction. The measure would abolish many sinecure offices, and consolidate many more. But it would be necessary to amend the Bill in Committee. As to that part of the Bill which dealt with fees, he did not know whether the House of Commons would agree to the payment of fees by stamps; but he, for one, thought that would be an improvement. Great changes had of late years been effected by legislation in our ecclesiastical system, and it was desirable that the Chancellor and other high officers of the dioceses should be barristers of good standing, and that the registrars should do their duty in person, and not by deputy. The most rev. Prelate had calculated the fees at only £46,000 a-year; but he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) thought the amount would be much larger—he thought it would be found they would realize £71,000—that was the amount at which it was estimated in 1871. He objected strongly to the 42nd clause as containing a principle which he felt sure their Lordships would never approve. That clause was as follows:—

“From and after the commencement of this Act no churchwarden shall be admitted to office unless he produce a certificate of his appointment, signed by the chairman of the vestry at which such churchwarden was appointed. Such certificate shall be made on a printed form, bearing a stamp of the value of five shillings, supplied by the registrar of the diocese at the expense of the churchwarden. Such churchwarden shall be entitled to be repaid the cost of such stamp from any funds applicable to the maintenance and repair of the parish church of the parish of which he is churchwarden, or to the expenses of conducting Divine service in such church. Where more than one churchwarden is appointed at any vestry the certificates of such appointment may be made on one form without any additional stamp. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to exempt any churchwarden from any duty which may now be imposed upon him to attend visitations and to be admitted to office and to make presentments and answers to articles of inquiry thereat; but no fee shall be paid at such visitation by any churchwarden. The expression ‘churchwarden’ in this section shall be construed to include ‘sidesman.’”

He thought that subjecting the churchwardens by Act of Parliament to a fee of 5s. was in itself objectionable; but nothing could be more objectionable than giving churchwardens the power of repaying themselves out of funds applicable to the maintenance and repair of the parish church, or to the expenses of conducting Divine service. Such a power would dry up all voluntary sources of supply. In his opinion, now that the Diocesan Courts were practically abolished, the whole of the ecclesiastical fees ought to be thoroughly revised, and not dealt with in the piecemeal manner proposed by this Bill. They pressed with great heaviness on the parochial clergy, and, as far as they were concerned, he thought that the greater part of them ought to be abolished altogether.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK pointed out that the Diocesan Courts were by no means practically abolished—on the contrary, their efficiency, he hoped, would be greatly increased by recent legislation. It was true that one class of cases were taken from those Courts, but two large and important classes were left to them. With regard to the discrepancy in the aggregate value of the fees as estimated by the most rev. Prelate and by the noble Earl, it should be remembered that the estimate of £46,000 excluded the fees of the Archdeacons, £3,600, and those of the Surrogates, £6,800, which would bring the gross total of the most rev. Prelate up to £56,000. In many departments there would be a saving of from 40 to 50 per cent in the fees to be paid.

THE EARL OF POWIS objected to the measure as one which had a tendency to destroy the independence of the several Dioceses, by sweeping away all the fees into one fund, to be administered in an almost irresponsible manner. The Bill was really neither more nor less than a Bill to provide a salary for the new Ecclesiastical Judge under the Public Worship Regulation Act. The question was, whether this money could not be raised without this Bill, which would disturb all the present arrangements for collecting and paying ecclesiastical fees throughout the country. He thought the payment by stamps would only augment the confusion.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX also objected to the 42nd clause. At present, in the case of many parishes the fees for the admission of Churchwardens was not paid. The Churchwardens had no legal right to recover the amount from a voluntary church rate. In other churches, the funds for the proper maintenance of the services were derived from the offertory; but if people found that their offerings were to be applied to the payment of these fees to a general fund the offerings would probably be much reduced.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not intend to offer any objection to the second reading of the Bill. His noble Friend (the Earl of Powis) had stigmatized the Bill as a measure intended to provide the salary for the Judge under the Public Worship Regulation Act; but, so far from that being the fact, there had been several Bills with similar objects brought into their Lordships' House before the Public Worship Regulation Act was even proposed. He would not go into the question whether or not the Bill went far enough as to the reduction of fees, but the measure comprised a great many details with regard to the amalgamation of various offices which would require very careful consideration. The collection of fees by means of stamps was proposed in some of the former Bills; but it was held to be very questionable whether they could be conveniently and satisfactorily collected in that way. Having regard to the complicated nature of many of the details he would suggest to the most rev. Prelates that their Bill would have a better chance of progressing if it were referred to a Select Committee than if it were dealt with in Committee of the Whole House. If that course were adopted, Her Majesty's Government would render the most rev. Prelates all the assistance in their power.

LORD DYNEVOR thought the Bill did not go far enough in the regulation of fees, for there were many ecclesiastical fees which the Bill did not touch. He also objected strongly to the 42nd clause; and thought that, as the office of churchwardens was not a pleasant one and had no emolument whatever attached to it, no new burden should be put upon them.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he would adopt the suggestion thrown out by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. He wished to point out that the measure did not propose to lay any fresh burden upon churchwardens. Those officers were at present called upon to pay fees varying from 18*s.* downwards, and it was proposed to reduce the fees to an uniform 5*s.* all over the country. With reference to the remarks of the noble Earl (the Earl of Powis) on the subject of the transfer to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of official buildings belonging to registries, those buildings in which the work of the registry was conducted were expressly excepted from the Bill, and therefore they would not pass into the hands of the Commissioners. All the suggestions that had been made would receive the most careful attention when the measure was before the Select Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

The Lord Chancellor

And, on March 7, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

L. Abp. Canterbury.	V. Halifax.
Ld. Chancellor.	V. Cardwell.
M. Salisbury.	L. Bp. Gloucester and
Ld. Steward.	Bristol.
E. Shaftesbury.	L. Bp. Ely.
E. Stanhope.	L. Stafford.
E. Powis.	L. Hatherley.
E. Nelson.	L. Winmarleigh.

APPEALS—STANDING ORDER.

RESOLUTION.

LORD REDESDALE said, that his object in proposing the Resolution of which he had given Notice, of a new Standing Order with regard to the number of Law Lords sitting to hear appeals in their Lordships' House was this—that the Bill relating to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House, which had been introduced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, contained a similar provision fixing the minimum number of Law Lords who were to sit and determine appeals. Under these circumstances, it was desirable that the House, which had ample power to do so, should of its own act do that which the statutable enactment would require to be done. He humbly conceived that whatever was required to be done could be done by their Lordships themselves without any legislation, and in the manner provided by this Resolution. The object of the provision was to meet the evil that had been dwelt upon very much, of a single Law Lord sitting with two lay Peers to hear and determine appeals. The Standing Order which he proposed would make no difference in the practice of the House. It would only provide that three noble Lords, qualified by their previous professional training, should sit on the hearing of appeals, and would not preclude any other noble Lords from attending at such hearings.

Moved to resolve, That no Appeal or Cause in Error shall be heard and determined unless there be present at such hearing and determination not less than three Lords holding, or who have held, some of the following high judicial offices; that is to say, the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, or of Judge of one of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity in England, or of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice or Court of Appeal in England, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, or of the Superior Courts of Law or Equity in Ireland.—(The Lord Redesdale.)

Ordered, That the said Resolution be declared a Standing Order, and that it be entered on the Roll of Standing Orders of this House.

LORD DENMAN said, he was entirely opposed to the Resolution of the noble Lord, the effect of which would be, that if only two Law Lords and a third Peer were present ready to make up a quorum, parties, and attorneys and counsel, even if anxious to proceed, would be obliged to wait for the appearance of some Judge of Appeal whose qualifications were not yet finally settled.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he did not intend to raise any opposition to the Resolution of his noble Friend. On the contrary, the state of things which his noble Friend proposed to bring about by his Resolution was analogous to that which would be produced under the Bill which had been lately introduced to their Lordships' notice. There was at present no danger of their not having the assistance of the requisite number of Judges, as so many of his noble and learned Friends were able and willing to give their attendance for disposing of the legal Business of the House; but he agreed that it was advisable that provision should be made for the attendance of not less than three official personages on the hearing of appeals.

LORD HATHERLEY said, he would not oppose the Resolution, but wished to point out that the wording of the Resolution was too narrow, as it would exclude a Judge of the eminence of the late Lord Kingsdown.

EARL GRANVILLE was afraid that such constant changes in the constitution of the appellate tribunal would by no means add to its dignity.

On Question? resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said Resolution be declared a Standing Order, and that it be entered on the Roll of Standing Orders of this House.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 2nd March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN—William Beckett Denison, esquire, for East Retford; James Clifton Brown, esquire, for Horsham.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES—Committee—R.P.

RESOLUTION IN COMMITTEE—Merchant Shipping [Salaries, &c.]

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Cattle Disease (Ireland) * [94]; Protection to Growing Crops (Scotland) * [95].

Second Reading—Council of India (Professional Appointments) * [69].

Committee — Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000) * [89]—R.P.; Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000) * —R.P.

Committee—Report—Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies) * [26-93].

Third Reading—Marriages (Saint James, Buxton) * [79], and passed.

CHURCHYARDS—OWSTON CHURCH-YARD.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS (for Mr. WADDY) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that the Vicar of Owston had caused a tombstone in the churchyard to be taken up and turned round, and placed close to another tombstone so as to conceal the inscription upon it, solely because the said inscription contained the following words: "A consistent member of the Wesleyan Society upwards of 60 years?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had received a letter from the vicar, in which he stated that the tombstone in question was in the position in which it was placed nearly 50 years ago at the head of the grave facing the eastward. The vicar went on to say that no member of the family was now living in the parish, and 10 years ago the same grave was used for the interment of a person belonging to another family whose relatives placed another stone at the head of the grave which partially obscured the first. He thought that this was a great pity; but if the facts had been as they were stated on the Question he should have thought it a most improper proceeding.

CIVIL SERVICE OF INDIA—REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether any new regulation has been made by the Secretary of State for India, or has been submitted by him to the Government of India, regarding the selection and education of candidates for the Civil Service of India; and, if so, whether they will be laid before Parliament?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: A very voluminous correspondence has passed between the Secretary of State and the Civil Service Commissioners and the Government of India upon the present mode of selecting and educating candidates for the Civil Service of India. The Secretary of State does propose certain alterations in the present system; but these alterations do not apply to the method of selection, but to the subsequent training of the selected candidates. The whole of these Papers are in the printer's hands, and will shortly be presented to Parliament.

METROPOLIS—TEMPLE BAR.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWARDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he purposes taking any steps with reference to the removal of Temple Bar, which is now in so dangerous a condition as to necessitate carriages passing through it at a foot pace, and causes risk as well as obstruction to the traffic in that crowded thoroughfare?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had placed himself in communication with the Lord Mayor on the subject, and he found that negotiations were going on in the City of London with the Office of Works and the Metropolitan Board of Works as to what was to be done with Temple Bar. He was told that in the meantime there was no danger to anyone passing through, and he hoped that before long a final conclusion would be come to on the matter.

NAVY—COLLISION OF THE "ALBERTA" AND THE "MISTLETOE."

QUESTIONS.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has instituted any inquiry into the circumstances of the collision between the "Alberta" and the "Mistletoe;" and, if so, whether he will state the result of such inquiry to the House?

Mr. Lyon Playfair

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any inquiry was made by the Admiralty into the circumstances under which the yacht "Mistletoe" was run down in August last; and, if he will lay upon the Table of the House any Report or Correspondence on the subject; and, whether any payment has been made or sanctioned by the Admiralty to anyone as solatium, or for expenses incurred through the disaster; and, if he will lay upon the Table of the House the particulars of any such payments, and any Correspondence relating thereto?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he proposed to lay Papers relating to the collision between the Alberta and the Mistletoe upon the Table, which would give the information required.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can now state to the House, the number of Public Elementary Schools (Church, British, Roman Catholic, and Board, respectively) in England and Wales on the 31st August 1874 and 1875, respectively; the number of scholars on the register, and the number of children in average attendance at such Schools at the above dates; the amount of voluntary contributions for maintenance of such Schools in each of the above years; and, the number of civil parishes (exclusive of London and Municipal Boroughs) under School Boards, as compared with the number not under School Boards, on the 1st January of the present year?

VISCOUNT SANDON: If I were to answer all the details to which my hon. Friend's Question refers, I should occupy an inordinate portion of the time of the House with a mass of figures very difficult to follow. I propose, therefore, to lay on the Table of the House a full statement of the facts he wishes to know, and only to give now the leading figures. The total number of voluntary public elementary schools in England and Wales in August, 1874, was 11,341; and in August, 1875, 12,081. The number of board schools at the same date in 1874 was 826; in 1875, 1,136. The number of scholars on the register in voluntary public elementary schools in 1874 was 2,276,576; in 1875, the number was 2,392,333. The number of scholars in average attendance in the same schools was, in 1874, 1,540,466; in 1875, 1,609,895. The number of scholars on the register of board schools in 1874 was 221,026; in 1875, 351,967. The number in average attendance at the same schools was, in 1874, 138,293; in 1875, 227,285. The amount of voluntary contributions to the voluntary public elementary schools was, for 1874, £602,836; for 1875, £675,565. The number of civil parishes, exclusive of London and municipal boroughs, under school boards, was, on the 1st of January, 1876, 2,005; the number of civil parishes without school boards was, at the same date, 12,077.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS—PAROCHIAL RELIEF.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction exists among the working men of Merthyr and the mining districts of South Wales owing to the omission from the Parliamentary Register, and thereby the practical disfranchisement, of several hundreds of their number who earned the money they received from the parish, during the lock-out last year, by breaking stones; and, whether money received in payment for work done is to be regarded as "parochial relief or other alms," in the sense which disqualifies the recipient from being a voter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that no complaint had been made from working men of Merthyr and South Wales that they had been disfranchised because they had received parochial relief. The law with regard to the matter was laid down in 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, sections 35 and 36, and declared that the receipt of parochial relief should disqualify, under certain circumstances, the persons receiving it. That enactment was extended to counties by 31 Vict. c. 102, and it was a question for the revising barrister whether particular persons came under the disqualification, and his decision was subject to an appeal. He understood that in the present case no appeal had been made against the decision of the revising bar-rist, and he need hardly add that the Home Secretary had no jurisdiction in the matter.

ARMY—THE RESERVE.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any and what effect has yet been given to the following paragraph in the Recruiting Regulations, and, if not, whether it is intended to give effect to the same:

"Within such limits as may from time to time be prescribed, soldiers may, on the recommendation of their commanding officers, and with their own free assent, after three years' Army service, pass to the Reserve, and complete in that force the unexpired portion of their engagement."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the soldiers in the United Kingdom had already been allowed so to retire, but no application had been received from those on foreign service.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK—STATE OF ROTTEN ROW.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the riding ground in Rotten Row is much out of repair, and in some places dangerous; and, what instructions are given to the park keepers and police as to loose dogs, which jeopardise the safety of those riding on horseback?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: My attention had been called some weeks ago to the unsatisfactory state of Rotten Row. The original mischief arose from very hard frosts with heavy falls of snow and rapid thaws. As soon as I was made aware of the state of things, orders were given, and for the last fortnight the whole of the staff connected with Hyde Park has been employed in trying to remedy the evil. I hope that when a little dry weather sets in, Rotten Row may be again found to be what it ought always to be. With respect to the second part of the Question, the hon. Member is not, perhaps, aware that the custody of Hyde Park is intrusted, not to the gate-keepers, but to the Metropolitan Police, and there is a clause in the Parks Regulation Act which enables them to stop loose dogs or loose riders, or, indeed, any other hotheaded persons who, in pursuit of their own pleasure, are likely to endanger the safety of the general public.

NAVY—H.M.S. "DEVASTATION."

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN (for Mr. A. MOORE) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty have received any Report on the behaviour and sea-going qualities of H.M.S. "Devastation" since last leaving this country; and, if so, whether he will lay such Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, a Report with reference to the subject had been received and would be laid upon the Table.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEGRAPH SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the recommendations of the Civil Service Commissioners embodied in the recent Order in Council will apply to the provincial telegraph staff?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Order in Council would apply to that portion of the staff which was strictly clerical.

THE SUEZ CANAL—SIR DANIEL LANGE.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK, who had given Notice of his intention to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Daniel Lange has been dismissed by his co-directors from the office of director of the Suez Canal Company, remarked that his Question had to some extent been answered in The Times of that morning, and he desired now to put it in a different form — namely, Whether Sir Daniel Lange has been dismissed by the directors of the Suez Canal Company from the position of representative of the Company in England; and, if so, what was the cause of his dismissal?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that no Notice had been given of the Question in its amended form, but that the answer to it had been anticipated by the letter in The Times to which the hon. Member had referred. The information contained in that letter was on the highest authority—namely, that of M.

de Lesseps—and the cause of the withdrawal of Sir Daniel Lange from the position he held in the Company was clearly stated. The Government had no information on the subject further than that published in The Times, and he could only refer the hon. Member to the letter in question. He might add that from M. de Lesseps' statement in The Times it was perfectly clear that Sir Daniel Lange had never been a director, but had been merely a salaried officer of the Suez Canal Company.

MERCANTILE MARINE—BLACKWOOD'S "NIGHT HELM INDICATOR."

QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If, with a view to the prevention of collisions at sea, and consequent loss of life, he will sanction a trial on Her Majesty's ships of Sir F. Blackwood's "Night Helm Indicator?"

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, an indicator of the same kind had already been tried, and he did not know what advantage would be derived if the question were brought forward again. He had not been able to give the matter much consideration, which, however, he would do before he came to a final decision on the subject.

OWNERS OF LAND (IRELAND)—IRISH "DOMESDAY" BOOK.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What is the cause of the delay in the Parliamentary publication of the Returns of the Owners of Land in Ireland, similar to those which nearly a fortnight since were published respecting the Owners of Land in England?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am informed that the reasons for the delay in the publication of the Irish Domesday Book are — first, that the official instructions for the work were not issued to the Irish Local Government Board until January, 1873, some months later than in England; secondly, that the local work fell on the clerks of the unions, who could only devote their leisure time to it, and, as the unions are very large, this caused much delay. I am happy to say that the work has now gone through the Press, and is expected to be ready for presentation about Easter.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, that there was a Return which was furnished to the Government before the Land Act was brought in, which gave an admirable account so far as he was a judge; and he should think that if the Government laid that Return upon the Table it would be very satisfactory to the public.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was afraid that the Return would not answer the purpose, for it would not be correct down to the present time. The Return for Ireland would be, as far as possible, precisely the same as that for England.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY RECRUITING.—RESOLUTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, in rising to move—"That the inducements to enter the ranks of the Army ought to be increased," said, that in the absence of full information as to the increased inducements to enter the Army, of which they had heard, he had found it necessary to proceed with his Motion. He had no doubt that the Secretary of State for War had done his best to make an advantageous change in the condition of non-commissioned officers; but, unfortunately, he was not the only person to be considered, and so the hopes of non-commissioned officers as to additional pay had not been realized. With regard to the class of recruits now entering the Army, military officers as a rule spoke of them as being up to the mark, and the right hon. Gentleman himself, speaking from personal inspection of the men at the recruiting dépôt, had characterized them as highly satisfactory. He (Captain Nolan) had lately been in a very favourable position for forming an opinion on this subject, and his impression was that in three or four years the recruits they were now obtaining would make very fair soldiers indeed. A great many of the men went close to the figure, and had to be passed by special authority. But the point that struck him most was the almost total absence of any reference to the true character of the men, it being taken upon their own statement. Often it was difficult to judge whether the materials were good or bad, owing to the difference which was presented between a man in uniform and a man in civilian's dress. It was far better to depend upon statistics than on individual impressions, and private Members were in a disadvantage in that respect, because those supplied to the House were a year behind, whilst the Secretary of State for War had them made up to the time when he spoke. He found from the Returns for 1874-5, that there were 93,114 men serving that year in the British Islands. Of that number 1,853 were in prison; 5,582 deserted, and as if the men did not return within three weeks their names were struck off the strength of the Army and were not put on again until their return, therefore, he put them down as 400. There were 14,000 courts martial in and out of the British Islands, and of that number he put down 300 as absent on trial and not in prison. There were 15,868 men under the age of 20; and of the 1,648 men discharged for bad character, he put down 1,200 in these Islands. These figures showed the strength of the Army to be 19,621, which was anything but satisfactory. In Russia no man was taken into the ranks under 21, and in Germany under 20, knowing how useless it was to take men as efficient at 17 or 18 years of age, and when it was tried by the First Napoleon, in 1813, after the Battle of Leipsic, the young troops broke down. Last year General Symonds, Inspector General of Fortifications, had brought the pecuniary view of this subject before the members of the United Service Institution. That gallant officer laid it down as a rule that no recruit should be received into the Army at a lower age than 20 years, and he calculated the cost of his training to the country when he was enlisted at a lower age than that. If a lad of 17 enlisted in the Cavalry he did not become of use as an efficient soldier for three years, and cost the country £318. If he was 18 years of age he would cost the country £236; whereas had he been enlisted when just close upon 20 years of age he would have cost only £62 for his training, so that there would be a saving of £174, which was equivalent to 1s. 10d. per day, spread over the remaining years of the man's service. If a lad of 17 years of age enlisted in the Infantry his training cost £132 more than it would have cost if his enlistment were delayed until he came within eight or nine months of being 20 years of age. Spreading that over the three years which remained of his years of service, it amounted to 3*s.* 7*d.* a-day more than his pay; and taking the annual average of lads enlisted under 20 years at 10,000 (in 1873 it was 15,868), it appeared the country might be saved £1,000,000 by giving up the practice of enlisting those who were under 20 years of age. The Secretary of State for War would no doubt say, that because 20,000 had enlisted during the last year that the soldier was satisfied with his position. The statistics for the five years previous to 1873 showed that 6,110 left on completing their first period of service; 12,000 men purchased their discharge; 5,703 were allowed to leave the Army before their period of service had expired; 8,000 were discharged as bad characters, and 17,594 deserted, which showed that the men were not satisfied with their condition. But then how, it might be asked, was it that men were found to enlist if they were not satisfied with the terms which they obtained? Seventy or 80 years ago our system of recruiting was conducted in a way totally different from that which now prevailed, and the recruiting sergeants used to depend very much on treating men at the public-house; but within the last 12 or 14 years all that sort of thing had been given up, and it was no longer sought to enlist men by placing them under the influence of drink. Our hopes now of securing the services of grown men as recruits—for it was not, he thought, a wise course to adopt to enlist mere lads—depended very much on the inducements we held out to them, and the extent to which we were prepared to compete with the employer of labour in the labour market. With regard to pay an Infantry soldier received nominally 14*s.* per week, one half of it being in rations, &c. There was a deduction of 6*d.* for stoppages, for which the men got an equivalent, which made it actually 13*s.* 6*d.*; but if 1*s.* 10*d.*, the value of his pension, was added, because as he only enlisted for six years, he was not likely to get much benefit from his pension, he would receive 15*s.* 4*d.* The ordinary rate of agricultural wages in the North of England was from 18*s.* to 22*s.*, although in the South it might not be more than 13*s.* or 14*s.*, it being still lower, perhaps, in some parts of Ireland. It should, however, be borne in mind that a man seeking higher wages would go, not to the South of England, but to the North, where he would be likely to find a better market, and that, as things now stood, an unskilled labourer would have to give up 4*s.* 6*d.* a-week to enter the Army. He did not attach much consequence to promotion from the ranks, because up to the present time only 115 men who were not Riding or Quarter-masters had risen from the ranks, so that the ordinary soldier's chance of promotion was 1,000 to 1. The only position to which the vast majority of the private soldiers could hope to rise was that of a non-commissioned officer; and the man who attained that rank was rather below the position of a Northumberland labourer. Under these circumstances, it was no wonder that we were obliged to fall back on immature men quite unfit for war. The only other Army raised by voluntary enlistment was that of the United States; and there they had to contend with the same difficulties as we had in this country. The pay of American soldiers was, before the civil war, $13 a month, and it was raised to $16 during the civil war. After the war it was reduced for one year to $13. In that year there was more desertions than previously; but in the next year, when the pay was again raised to $16, the number of desertions fell off very considerably. The American soldier was much better treated than ours with regard to rations and clothing. Our Infantry private got 1*s.* a-day, and out of that he had to pay about 6*d.* for a portion of his clothes and rations. In this respect there was a great discrepancy between the United States and the English Armies, leaving much room for improvement on one side. The question of non-commissioned officers was not merely one of supply and demand. A recruit knew that about one-half of the men eventually became non-commissioned officers, and consequently the amount of pay given to the sergeants would draw men into the Service. With regard to inducements to enter the Army, he thought we might spend our money most profitably on the non-commissioned officers, and beyond this he had no theory whatever. Any inducement which might be offered ought, in his judgment, to be spread over the whole Army, and no distinction not previously existing ought to be made between one corps and another. By getting men of good character we should do away with a very great deal of desertion. If we held out better inducements to enter the Army, we should be able to pick and choose, which we could not do at present, the result being that we now got many men of bad character. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in the proposals he was about to make, would be able to change substantially the present state of affairs. He begged, in conclusion, to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the inducements to enter the ranks of the Army ought to be increased," — (Captain Nolan.)

—instead thereof.

GENERAL SHUTE fully agreed with the general terms of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, and said that the inducements to enter the Army must be increased as the short service system came into operation. He could not endorse all the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member, although he thought many of them were valuable in the extreme, and the House must recollect that his hon. and gallant Friend had lately had many opportunities of being thoroughly up in this subject. It was a great advantage to have in the House Gentlemen who either were actually serving or who had lately served in the Army, although some persons thought that officers on full pay ought not to sit in Parliament. Of course officers on full pay ought particularly to avoid questions of discipline; and, indeed, in his opinion, such questions ought to be regarded as altogether foreign to the debates of the House of Commons. The country ought to be most grateful to the present War Minister for his determination to combine the strictest economy with efficiency. It was easy for irresponsible outsiders to say that they should give larger inducements to men to enter the Army; but if this were not done with discretion certain people would say—

"Here are the Tories come into power again, and there is a large increase of the Army Estimates." Some very extraordinary statements were occasionally made to the more unintelligent portion of their constituents on naval and military matters. The other day an eloquent Hibernian, addressing a mob, asked them what was the use of all the twaddle which had been uttered about ironclads, and after referring to the fate of Admiral Byng, declared his opinion that a public execution in Trafalgar Square under the shadow of the glorious Nelson Column would do more good than any number of speeches in the House of Commons. He rather thought the orator considered that the First Lord of the Admiralty ought to be the victim. More must be spent upon the Army if we wanted a really efficient one. Like other employers of labour, we must make the service better worth having. As it was, one-fourth of our regular soldiers were inefficient from youth, character, or crime, not including men in hospital, who were always more numerous in the case of a youthful army than of one matured. The Army surgeons might, he thought, do more to prevent the possibility of boys of 15 passing themselves off as youths of 19; but the fact remained that in all the regiments which represented maturity by the standard of stature—such as the Guards, the Artillery, and the Heavy Cavalry—we were short of men. He confessed that when he was Adjutant he preferred youths as recruits because they were more easily moulded into good soldiers. But then, with a system of long service, there was ample time for this work of conversion. He was not now going to advocate long service. A Reserve was positively necessary to meet the requirements of modern warfare, and they could not have a Reserve unless they had short service, and they could not have short service unless they had some means by which they could secure men of better character and of more advanced age. The real fact was that, to use the vulgar proverb, old birds worth having were not to be caught by chaff. When he last spoke he had given eight suggestions, and regretted that they had not been reported. He knew, of course, that Members could not expect their speeches to be fully reported except those delivered from the front benches. Still, it was to be regretted that the points of professional speeches were not appreciated and given. He did not, however, blame the reporters—perhaps it was hardly to be expected that they could see the points of professional speeches, and he had therefore sent a copy of the eight suggestions to which he referred to a local paper, in which they had thus been correctly reported. He was strongly in favour of a proposal made in 1872 by Captain O’Hea, who inspected the drill of the industrial schools of London for the Society of Arts—namely, that the boys should be drafted at the age of 16, when their parochial maintenance ceased, into local depôts, there to be trained until they were 18, and then put into the Army. It was calculated that in the London district alone 3,000 recruits might be obtained by acting on that proposal, and they would be soldiers of a better stamp and more suitable for promotion to the rank of non-commissioned officers than the great majority of men enlisted under the present system. Admitting that the inducements with regard to men would be expensive, only just let them think what was done with regard to the officers by the late Government. They had abolished Purchase and the whole plan of retirement; the cost to the country would be £38,000,000, and he only wished that half that sum had been spent on the men. He was immensely glad to see that it was proposed to concentrate two or three corps on a strategical point, because the mere collection of so large a force at a given place would be a most valuable manœuvre. If 150,000 men were concentrated, say, at Redhill, and bivouacked there, even though it were for only one night, put in position, and sent home next day, it would be worth more than dozens of sham fights. The questions affecting the Army and Navy were not of mere Military and Naval, but of great national importance. They were the only real insurance of this country; and if they had a great channel misfortune and a great land misfortune, and London and Woolwich were ever at the mercy of an enemy, they would have to pay four times as much as France. He was sure that neither the House nor the country would grudge the expense that was undoubtedly necessary for their Army and Navy, provided the increased cost would ensure efficiency.

COLONEL MURE said, that the end of next year, when the men who had joined the Army for three years began to go out, the difficulty which they at present had to contend with would be trebled. It was curious to look back into the history of the inducements which had been given from time to time to the Army. If they recalled to mind the pay which the soldier had in the days of bounty and pensions, they would find that whilst the demand in the labour market had been multiplied, they had reduced the inducements which were offered to men to become soldiers. They had also in a great measure increased the labour of the soldier; so that they had these three conditions—namely, a far larger demand on the labour market, decreased pay for the soldier, and increased work. It had been said that it was beginning now to be acknowledged and understood that after all the Army was only a branch of the labour market. He should like to ask how the head of any private firm would be able to get men if, while increasing the work required of them, he at the same time decreased their pay. It was said—“Oh, but the condition of the soldier is improved; we give him now facilities for private theatricals and entertainments in barracks, education, and things of that kind.” Well, supposing an employer of labour went to his workmen and said—“I will increase your work and decrease your pay, but will give you compulsory education and some facilities for private theatricals.” Why, any employer of labour who adopted such a means of trying to get men would be looked on as a lunatic, and his firm would probably soon come to ruin. The question was—What were they to do? It was a curious thing that even now, notwithstanding the enormous difficulties they had to contend with, the Press, and many men apparently qualified to judge, entertained a strong opinion that by short service they would facilitate recruiting in the face of the increased demand on the labour market, which was the inevitable result. He thought nothing would be more calculated to injure the Army than to have shorter service, unless they at the same time considerably increased the pay, so as to get a better class of man. His hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan), who had introduced this subject in a very able and comprehensive speech, had pointed out that one of the means by which they might the better induce men to enlist would be by offering greater advantages to non-commissioned officers. In that he (Colonel Mure) cordially agreed, and he was glad that the Secretary of State for War had taken the matter into consideration in the Army Estimates. There was one point which he (Colonel Mure) would like to press on the right hon. Gentleman; he had now, not only for non-commissioned officers but for privates, offered increased pay—for the deferred pay must undoubtedly be regarded as an increase—but he could assure him that one of the reasons why they had such difficulty in procuring men of a venturesome spirit as recruits was the feeling that there was an immoral atmosphere in the Army. That was always a difficult and dangerous subject to talk about; and when one had been in the Army oneself it seemed, to use a popular expression, like fouling one's own nest. But they had the fact that year after year between 1,600 and 1,700 men were poured out of the Army as bad characters; and he would like right hon. Gentlemen to consider how far men of the right stamp were deterred from entering the Service by the knowledge that bad characters were indiscriminately admitted. He knew, of course, that if they laid down a rule that no man should be permitted to enter the Army without producing a certificate that he was not a felon, they would in some sense diminish the number of recruits. But then it was clear they would not have to turn out of the Army every year 1,600 or 1,700 men as bad characters, and therefore, on the whole, they would be none the worse off in regard to numbers. By enlisting men of bad character they corrupted and destroyed very many other young men of merely weak character. It would be curious to know how many of the 1,600 or 1,700 who were annually discharged from the Army were bad characters when they originally joined, and how many had become bad through entering the Army, and being there contaminated by vicious company. As a general rule, the tendency of military life and discipline was to improve a man's character, and it was satisfactory to know that in a great measure regimental life had the effect of turning many bad, weak young fellows into good soldiers. But it appeared to him that a great deal of that social good was swept away by the evil practice of bringing felons and other bad characters into the Army to contaminate their comrades. He thought it would be worth while for the right hon. Gentleman to try the experiment of refusing to accept a recruit unless he produced a certificate from his clergyman or the magistrates of his district to the effect that he was not a felon. In addition to the other plans which had been proposed, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would take this one into serious consideration.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, that the great problem was how to draw into the ranks a better class of men, and the Minister for War was proceeding in the right direction by giving better pay to non-commissioned officers and deferred pay to private soldiers. The great discrepancy which existed between the pay in civil and military service ought by degrees to be diminished. He was therefore grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for proposing to increase the pay of the Guards; they had always had larger pay than regiments of the Line, and it should be remembered that the expenses they were bound to incur were greater. He would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to increase the pay of the soldiers of the Line, and he believed that many of the reforms which we all wished to see introduced would be greatly facilitated by getting a better class of men. Able as a civilian Minister for War might be, and thoroughly as he might have acquainted himself with the details of his Department, there was one thing he could not learn, and that was how men would behave when they were brought in face of the enemy. Those men who enlisted and then deserted and robbed us, and then enlisted and deserted and robbed us again, and went on doing so, sometimes, as we had seen lately in the police reports, as many as 17 times, in foreign service were apt to leave their comrades in the lurch. Although he had not seen service since the Crimean War, he was not absent a day during the two years in the Crimea, and he had seen all the great engagements and many of the actions in the trenches, and he said deliberately that because a man wore a red coat it was no reason he should be a hero. Although a soldier might not run away, he could, if he were so inclined, avail himself of a great many excuses to evade his duty and keep himself out of danger; and from his (Colonel Loyd Lindsay's) experience he should say that the class of men now coming into the Army were not the sort of men he should like to rely on. It was most essential to get good, reliable men, and that could only be done by offering higher pay and greater advantages than were at present enjoyed by the rank and file of the Army. Now that the short service system was coming into operation, and men were to be passed rapidly through the ranks, if they were not of a higher class than at present the result might be to bring discredit on the Service by distributing through the country a set of men who were unworthy of having worn the Queen's uniform. If the right hon. Gentleman would say that it was necessary that the pay of a soldier should be assimilated to the pay of a policeman or of a porter at a railway, and would ask the House to sanction that, he (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) thought it would do more towards putting the Army on a proper and satisfactory footing than any changes which the right hon. Gentleman might have introduced.

CAPTAIN NOLAN expressed a wish to withdraw his Motion. ["No!"]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

ARMY—MILITARY SCANDAL AT HYTHE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SANDFORD, in calling attention to the recent military scandal at Hythe, said, it appeared that there prevailed among the officers there, as among many of our regiments, two practices which he thought were most disgraceful—namely, that of breaking into an officer's room, and on some occasions pouring water on him, which was called "drawing;" and that of breaking into an officer's room and scattering about the contents, which was called "making hay." An officer at Hythe in the course of last autumn became unpopular with his brother officers. They practised "drawing" upon him, which he did not report; but he did report them when they practised "making hay" in his room. The consequence of his reporting them was that late one evening upon the public parade at Folkestone he was forced to enter into a pugilistic encounter with them. Several other officers stood round, kept a ring, and prevented the astonished public from interfering. The language used by the officers, he was sorry to say, was of such a description that he would not venture to repeat a single word of it to the House. This affair was also reported; a Court of Inquiry was held, and certain sentences were passed. When the country had to pay £14,250,000 for the Army, it was only right that they should know the state of its discipline; but the particular reason why he called attention to this occurrence was that he wished to show to the House the light in which conduct of the kind he had described was viewed by the authorities, as indicated by the sentences passed. What was done to the officers who had broken into a brother officer's room, and he (Mr. Sandford) believed poured water upon him upon the first occasion? They were simply ordered to join their regiments. Was that a real punishment? He had always understood that, according to military discipline, the senior officer present was held responsible; but on this occasion that officer did not appear to have been even reprimanded. Neither had the officer in command of the dépôt been reprimanded for allowing such scenes to occur under his eye. When the second case occurred, and there was a Court of Inquiry, the delinquents were called up for punishment. One was dismissed the Army, and another was "condemned to wear his uniform." The latter sentence he would not further allude to, than by simply observing that a mistake had been made at the Horse Guards in the wording of the sentence. An officer concerned in the "drawing" was only slightly reprimanded. When he found these facts, that the senior officer had not been reprimanded, and that the officers implicated in these transactions had only been slightly reprimanded, it seemed to him that the War authorities were almost condoning the offence. They had heard lately of insubordination among the men; but how could they expect subordination among the men when there was insubordination among the officers? Some persons, he knew, thought his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for

Colonel Loyd Lindsay

War was indifferent on this subject; but he believed that his right hon. Friend wished to put down conduct such as that which had been referred to. He believed that the Commander-in-Chief also desired to put it down. Who, then, was it that stood between their wishes and the just enforcement of military discipline? It was not his present intention to move for the Reports of the Court of Inquiry, because to do so would appear to imply a Vote of Censure upon the Secretary for War or the Commander-in-Chief. All he now asked was that real measures should be adopted to put down the disgraceful practices to which he had referred. He understood that circulars were sent down to the officers in command; that officers were asked whether any practical joking was indulged in, and that none was reported, though such proceedings were heard of. He did not wish the sham circular should be sent round; but that the officers commanding districts, and the senior officers, should be held responsible for occurrences of this kind. If his right hon. Friend would give him a satisfactory assurance upon this subject, he would only be too happy to allow this question to be buried in oblivion; but if, on the other hand, such assurance were not given, he would on the earliest opportunity move an Address, praying Her Majesty to take energetic steps to repress such disorders.

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. R. YORKE rose to call attention to the proposed re-erection of Knightsbridge Barracks on the present site, in reference to which he had given Notice to move—

“That, having regard to the Report of the Barrack Commission of 1863, which pronounces the site of the Cavalry Barracks at Knightsbridge to be ‘especially objectionable,’ and considering that the width of ground available for their re-erection on that site, already insufficient, will be further diminished to the extent of thirty feet by the proposed widening of the Knightsbridge Road, this House is of opinion that the said Barracks ought not to be rebuilt on their present site.”

He was aware that, by the Forms of the House, he could not press the Motion to a division, and he would content himself by calling attention to the subject of it before the House went into Committee. This question had given rise to much misrepresentation and prejudice, and he wished, in the first place, to make a few disclaimers. He disclaimed the charge of intending, by this Motion, to throw any imputation upon those admirable troops who now occupied the Knightsbridge Barracks. He had not come down there to place himself in the ridiculous position of a householder who had female members of his establishment who might be subjected to the insults of brutal and licentious soldiers. During the time he had lived in the neighbourhood he had never to his knowledge seen a soldier of the Life Guards either drunk or in any way misconduct himself. He disclaimed being on that occasion the organ of any interested agitation. If there were any persons specially interested in the removal of those barracks from their present site they were the landowners whose property faced them. Those landowners were, first, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; secondly, the noble Lord the Member for Down (Lord A. E. Hill Trevor); and, thirdly, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). Neither of those three had ever directly or indirectly taken any part in the agitation on that subject. That agitation, no doubt, had been promoted by those who experienced the inconvenience resulting from the narrowness of the road in that neighbourhood, and it was a matter of comparative indifference to those persons whether the barracks remained on their present site or not, provided the road was widened. The Knightsbridge Barracks were erected in the time of the Lord George Gordon's riots, about the end of the last century. They were constructed according to the sanitary views of the period; they were not intended to accommodate women or children, and they stood at a very inconvenient angle to the road. The first official mention he found of them was in the Report of the Barrack Commissioners in 1863, who reported that they were the worst barracks in the Kingdom, owing to their defective construction and the difficulty of effecting any improvement in them, and that the site was most objectionable. The men's rooms were placed over the stables, the smell of which saturated the whole of the barracks, while there was very little free circulation of air. He did not wish to enter into any controversy with the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army, and if it had been stated that an atmosphere impregnated with ammoniacal exhalations was fit for Her Majesty's troops he would not venture to question that statement, not having sufficient knowledge on the subject; but he would commend its consideration to the medical Press and those who were best qualified to form an opinion on the matter. The first move on the subject originated with the Chelsea Vestry in 1863, who represented the condition of the barracks to the then Under Secretary for War (Earl De Grey), who stated that there were no barracks in the United Kingdom so bad as Knightsbridge Barracks for the accommodation of the Household Troops, and that it had long been the wish of the Secretary for War to remove them and make proper improvements. In 1867 again a deputation on the same subject, headed by the Duke of Westminster and the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), waited on Sir John Pakington (now Lord Hampton), who appeared to be much agitated by doubts, and could not arrive at any conclusion on the matter; but he said he was struck with the suggestion of the right hon. Member for the University that the barracks should be removed to Chelsea. General Peel was the first who suggested the Millbank site, which was afterwards taken up by the late Government. There were certain unsavoury associations about Millbank, through its connection with the prison, which might make gallant men not like to occupy barracks there; but if the prison had been removed according to the plan of the late Government he believed the proposal would have been sound, at least financially. Last year an outbreak of scarlet fever, or, as the Secretary of State for War called it, of scarlatina, occurred at the Knightsbridge Barracks, causing great alarm in the neighbourhood, and he received a Petition to present from 800 householders of all ranks living in the neighbourhood, praying that something might be done. The Secretary of State for War then appeared much disinclined to do anything in the matter, saying that those barracks were the most favourite barracks in the Kingdom, and that the men were especially fond of them. He believed, however, that he might now congratulate the right hon. Gentlemen on having since changed his mind. The logic of facts had proved too much for him; the barracks had taken matters into their own hands by their subsidence, and the gallant troops had to yield to necessity. He had not yet seen the plans of the Government, but supposed the House would hear something respecting them in the course of the evening. He believed they might be fairly described as involving the widening of the road 30 feet, and the rebuilding of the barracks on ground before reported by the Barrack Commissioners to be insufficient, and which was now to be curtailed throughout the entire length by no less than 30 feet. He had spoken to many military men on the subject, and, amongst others, to Lord Sandhurst, who stated that, as a matter of common sense, it was absolutely preposterous to propose to rebuild the barracks on such a site. What he (Mr. Yorke) particularly wished to impress upon the Government was this, that this was practically a question of the health of the soldier. Of course, if the site were the only one available, then the £100,000 should be expended on the re-erection of the barracks. But was that so? He had the authority of a gentleman of considerable experience, Captain Douglas Gort, for saying that, in his opinion, another site could be found which would be very much better than the present. The area occupied by the Royal Military Asylum at Chelsea was over 10 acres, and the expenditure of £20,000 would provide all the additional accommodation that would be required; while, at a cost of £40,000, military schools to replace those now existing could be erected in the country. The adoption, therefore, of the Royal Military Asylum for the purposes of the barracks would save a sum of £40,000, and the boys attending the schools could not but be benefited by the change. But he was told that the great objection to the removal of the barracks was founded on strategical considerations. It had been said by the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief in "another place" that he infinitely preferred the present site to any other for strategical purposes. He (Mr. Yorke) had received many military opinions on the point, but there was no unanimity amongst them. If it were necessary that troops should be quartered in the Park, there were other sites available there which were much better than the present narrow one. Let them take, for instance, the Deputy Ranger's lodge, garden, and paddock, and they would have an excellent site, where Cavalry would be placed in the immediate vicinity of the powder magazine, with its 1,500,000 cartridges, which were now protected by one gallant sentry. They had no reason whatever—under the present excellent Government, in which he had the fullest confidence—to apprehend an outbreak of civil disorder; but they should remember that during three years, according to the present proposal, the Park would be without the presence of the military. He had suggested these sites for the consideration of the Government, and should take another opportunity of again referring to the subject. It had been said that certain persons in the neighbourhood were greatly interested, and would benefit by the removal. No doubt the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and some other persons would gain by the increased value of their territory, because instead of looking upon a high and ugly wall they would be able to look into a beautiful garden. He would only add, in reference to the question of site, that the barracks might be built on the eastern portion of the ground occupied by the Exhibition; and if the building was to have, as the illustrious Duke said it would, a handsome elevation, it would look exceedingly well if placed in that commanding position, where it would have all the strategical advantages which had been pointed out as necessary. He did not think the House would be content that £100,000 should be spent on the re-building of the barracks on their present site. When they compared the care which was taken of the health of the soldier with that which was taken of the convict and the pauper, it seemed to him that the natural order of things was reversed. For his part, he considered that soldiers should be better cared for than paupers, and paupers than criminals. Instead of that, however, sanitary conditions were more rigorously attended to in prisons than in workhouses, and in workhouses than in barracks. If the Government carried out the present ill-considered scheme, it would, he believed, be but another and a signal instance of the absurd manner in which such matters were conducted in this country. He hoped, however, that better counsels would prevail, and he humbly submitted that, in consideration of the health of the soldier, the confined space at Knightsbridge was utterly unsuited for the re-construction of the barracks on the present site.

Mr. FORSYTH, in supporting the suggestion of his hon. Friend, desired earnestly to disclaim any intention of casting the slightest imputation upon the soldiers occupying, or who had occupied, Knightsbridge Barracks. If, however, they were angels in white robes and with waving wings, the objections to the present site would remain. Now that new barracks were to be erected, the best possible site for the purpose ought to be chosen. Two objections had been urged against the removal of the barracks—first, that vicinity to the Park was necessary for the purpose of evolutions; and, next, that it was desirable to have troops in the Park to be ready in case of civil tumult. The first objection was met by the fact that if the barracks were placed at Millbank or Chelsea, a trot of 10 minutes would bring the troops to Hyde Park. With regard to the second objection, it should be remembered that for 100 years it had not been necessary to put down tumult or sedition in London by calling in the aid of the military. The people of this metropolis were the most law-abiding people of any country in the world, and he was sorry to hear the probability of sedition or insurrection assigned as the reason for continuing these barracks on the present site. The real objection was not that the soldiers were not orderly, but that unsightly buildings, such as music-halls, public-houses, and tobacco-nists' shops, which now fronted the barracks, must be stereotyped as long as the barracks remained. The authority of the great Duke of Wellington had been cited in favour of these barracks; but since his time an admirable access had been opened up from Millbank to the City, so that soldiers could go at a hand gallop all the way along the Thames Embankment, except in turning round the Houses of Parliament to get upon the Embankment. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, at the banquet of the Royal Academy the year before last, had pictured the idea of Pericles walking from Trafalgar Square to the Mansion House, and had described the ugliness he would see; but he (Mr. Forsyth) would say, let us imagine Pericles setting out from Kensington to go to Apsley House. He would pass by palatial structures, squares, terraces, and gardens, and the Albert Monument, with its beautiful sculptures, until he came to a narrow isthmus, with a dingy red brick wall on one side, and a congeries of the ugliest houses in the metropolis on the other. Pericles would surely think that he had already passed through London, and was entering some insignificant village on the east. As to pecuniary interests, he (Mr. Forsyth) certainly lived not far from the Knightsbridge Barracks, but he did not believe it would make £5 a-year difference in the value of his house if they were pulled down. A lady, however, could not walk with comfort from Prince's Gardens to Sloane Street without hearing sounds and seeing sights which must be offensive. It was said in praise of Augustus that he left Rome of marble, having found it of brick. It was not likely that any English Government would do this for London, but it ought to take every opportunity of beautifying the metropolis; and he trusted that this opportunity would not be lost to rid the neighbourhood of a building which must be unsightly and unseemly.

MR. HAYTER said, he hoped Her Majesty's Government would accept the Motion. During the riots in Hyde Park it became necessary to have 250 troopers to assist the police; but when the Cavalry came out they had not acted until the Infantry were drawn up in line with fixed bayonets, when they formed on their flanks. Consequently, if such proximity was necessary for the security of Hyde Park, they must build Infantry barracks also. Why should not the Government utilize the present barracks at Kensington? They were built only 15 years ago, and could accommodate 200 Household Infantry, and there were stables for 60 troop horses. There was some additional space which the Government might obtain at a small expense, and the barracks might easily be made to accommodate a regiment of Household Cavalry. The troopers at the Knightsbridge Barracks never went into the Park except for exercise, and the Kensington Barracks would be equally near for that purpose, while they would be half a mile nearer to the evolution ground at Wormwood Scrubbs.

Mr. Forsyth

SIR JAMES HOGG opposed the Motion. He could bear professional testimony to the usefulness of Hyde Park for exercising the Cavalry in the Knightsbridge Barracks. It might be that 100 years had elapsed since the military had been employed in aid of the civil power; but he had been in Knightsbridge Barracks when two regiments of Cavalry and a force of Infantry, Artillery, and police were assembled in readiness, in the event of a breach of the peace; and it might again be necessary, when the popular mind was excited, to have soldiers of various arms in the best strategical positions ready to act. Barracks had been spoken of as necessarily unsightly; but he could not see why, if the present building were pulled down, the barracks to be built in their place should not be as handsome as any other building. The Metropolitan Board of Works and the War Office had met each other in a liberal spirit in regard to the widening of the road opposite to the barracks, and when the present eyesore was removed he had no doubt that the new building would be an ornament to the metropolis. As to the character of the soldiers, he believed that a better body of men than the Life Guards and the Blues never had the honour of serving the Queen. There was no connection whatever between the existence of the barracks and the existence of the houses opposite. When soldiers had leave of absence it was for a specific purpose; it was not for the purpose of hanging about the public-houses in the neighbourhood of the barracks, which they would not be likely to do, because if they were seen they would expose themselves to having leave refused in future. Therefore, the public-houses were not frequented by the soldiers on leave, and, if the public-houses were a local nuisance, it was the fault of the licensing magistrates, and not of the military authorities in keeping the barracks there. If the houses opposite were of the ugly character that had been described, why did not the freeholders pull them down and build something else? When the thoroughfare was widened he hoped the improvement would effect all the change that could be deemed necessary. That the district was a healthy one he knew from the experience of himself and of the regiment with which he served for the space of 18 years. He hoped the Government would abide by their determination to keep the barracks where they were.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, there was no doubt that all those living in the neighbourhood would rather have the barracks in some other place. He had nothing to say against the character of the soldiers, and he was very much annoyed to hear one officer after another in this House saying things most disparaging to the reputation of the men in many ways. He was quite of opinion of the illustrious Duke, who said in "another place" that he would be prepared at a very short notice to go anywhere with our troops; but although the men might go to fight our battles, we did not want them at all times in our immediate neighbourhood. The language which was used by the soldiers was not all that could be desired by those who might be passing accompanied by ladies, and he hoped the Government would consider the desirability of removing the barracks to some other place. The public of the metropolis would be pleased if another site were chosen, and there were really no strategic reasons in favour of the present position.

MR. DILLWYN said, it had always hitherto been argued that it would be wasteful to pull down barracks which were sufficient for the purpose for which they were intended, and which he understood the Secretary of State last year to say were good, and answered very well for their purpose; and under those conditions he, for one, had never joined in any agitation for the removal of the barracks. But now he was told that the barracks were tumbling down, and new barracks would have to be built on the same site or elsewhere. It seemed to him now, that so far from being a waste of public money to build them elsewhere, it would be a waste of public money to rebuild them on their present site. The site was inconvenient and ill adapted for the purpose, and to build new barracks there would be to perpetuate the bad class of houses that existed in what ought to be the very best site in London. In saying this, however, he did not wish it to be supposed that he considered the presence there of the Horse Guards to be objectionable as having lived immediately beyond that particular district for 14 or 15 years, and having had very good opportunities of observing the character of the soldiers, he was bound to say that a better conducted set of men than the Household Troops he could not wish to see.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there would be some force in the objection to re-building the barracks on their present site, if in re-building them it were impossible to introduce all those improved sanitary provisions which had been recommended by the Army Sanitary Commission and had already been adopted at Shorncliffe, Colchester, and elsewhere; but, as the reverse would be the case, and no sanitary provision would be neglected, the argument based on the anticipated unhealthiness of the new barracks fell to the ground, for it was admitted that the site itself was healthy and one of the finest in London. As to the disreputable houses, it appeared that they were not frequented by the occupants of the barracks, and would probably remain, even if the barracks were taken away. It had been asserted that the late Government wanted to remove the barracks to Millbank; but he asked what proof there was that they ever came to such a decision? No doubt notices were given to persons holding houses between Albert Gate and the barracks; it was supposed that the barracks were to be removed, and some one said they were going to Millbank. But all the notices were withdrawn, and therefore the Government did not think fit to carry their plan out; or it did not refer to the barracks at all. It had been asked why they did not remove the barracks to the middle of the Park; but there they would be more offensive than in their present position. In such a case there must be a public road through the Park to carry in supplies, and to carry away the manure from the horses. It was this that was suggested as an improvement to Hyde Park. Great pains had been taken to ascertain what could be done on the present site, and the result was there would be full cubic space, proper superficial space, and ample window space, and, indeed, all the requirements of the Army Sanitary Commission would be fully met; and the stables would be ventilated, not into occupied rooms, as in too many gentlemen's houses in London—though he had never heard that coachmen and their families were particularly unhealthy—but by special shafts into the open air, so that the soldiers and their families would not breathe the polluted air of the stables below them. The whole of the agitation against the proposal was confined to the neighbourhood; it was not the public, and scarcely the public of Knightsbridge, who supported it. The secretary seemed to put down his supporters as persons who sooner than not get rid of these barracks would become Republicans and would abolish the regiment of Guards. ["Oh."] The Secretary of the Knightsbridge Improvement Committee said something of that kind, and he was for doing away with the barracks with a very high hand, indeed. He talked about their not giving way to public opinion; but he had not public opinion, and indeed scarcely Knightsbridge opinion, to support him. There were residents in the immediate neighbourhood who had represented to him that there was no necessity for abandoning that site and to take any trouble to find a new one. As to Millbank, he should be ashamed to send the Household Troops there, for everybody knew that, from the associations of the place, they would be called "gaol birds" and all sorts of nicknames of that kind. He should also be ashamed to send them into the Park; because the opinion of the general public had condemned most emphatically the taking of a large slice of the Park for the purpose of a barracks and new roads to it. Why, when Mr. Ayrton, as First Commissioner of Works, suggested taking a small bit from the esplanade of St. James's Park for public buildings there was a great outcry throughout London against depriving the public of any of its open spaces. They had been going on for 12 years seeking, but without finding, an available site, and now they had all these different sites suggested. Well, he was content with the present site. It was given by George III. as a site for a barracks, and he believed it could be made both pleasant and healthy. He could give the assurance that, without any extreme expense, an architectural character would be imparted to the new building which he was sure would be satisfactory. It had been proposed to sell the site of the barracks for houses to be built on it, but that would be an interference with the Park which would be wholly unjustifiable. Besides that, the site was given solely for the purposes of a barracks, and if used for any other purpose it would fall into the hands of the Woods and Forest Commissioners, and the money paid for it must be handed to them and could not be applied to the purposes of a new building. When he had this subject first thrust upon him he was told that the barracks would hang together for many years, and he thought they would. He did not believe in the excessive unhealthiness of the site. That was contradicted by the medical reports. It was far better in that respect than the St. John's Wood Barracks. He was willing, therefore, to take the barracks as they stood, but the foundations had given way, and they could not therefore leave the troops there with safety to their physical condition. In 1851 there was a competition for the building of Cavalry and Infantry barracks, and prizes were awarded. The prize for Infantry barracks was gained by the gentleman who had the superintending of the building of Chelsea Barracks, though not exactly upon his plan. It was understood that whoever got the prizes would be employed to build barracks. Mr. Wyatt, a gentleman of great experience and ability, got the prize for Cavalry barracks, and he had a claim on the Secretary of State to be employed whenever a Cavalry barrack was going to be built. When a Cavalry barrack was to be built at Nottingham he received from the then Secretary at War—Sir George Lewis—the assurance that his claim was admitted. When it was proposed that these barracks should be rebuilt, he might perhaps have said that it was rather a case of re-construction than of re-building; he did object to have an encumbrance of this kind hanging over him in the nature of a claim which had been admitted for 20 years, he therefore sent for Mr. Wyatt. He found him most ready to enter into terms; and, therefore, so far as architecture was concerned, he could say, the building would be in the hands of one of the most competent architects England could produce. He had been employed in every part of England, and the houses he had built fully showed his skill in his profession. It was said they might go to Chelsea; but if the barracks were objectionable on their present site, might they not be equally objectionable in Chelsea? Besides, although Chelsea might be very healthy for boys, it did not necessarily follow that Chelsea would be equally healthy for the Household Troops. Why remove them from their present site if they could find sufficient accommodation? Hon. Members who came from that neighbourhood spoke of the site as a most unpopular one for the Guards; but he rather thought otherwise. He believed it was very grateful to the public to see the troops pass, and those who frequented the Park at early hours must often have seen the people standing in front of the barracks to hear the band play. That, perhaps, was a small matter; but he did not see why, without cause, they should make any change in that respect. He might go further. He objected very much to the terms in which his hon. Friend had couched his Motion. They were not justified by the Report he quoted; and, so far from there being special objections to these barracks the word "especially" applied to Portman Street Barracks, and for reasons given in that Report, such as their being surrounded by high houses which obstructed the free air. An enclosed yard to which objection had been made, would be entirely obviated, because the barracks would practically form an open street with one entrance in the Park and the other in the road, instead of the present narrow, dull, heavy square. They would get rid of one of the most objectionable features in the present arrangement—he referred to the fact that the officers' apartments were over the infirmary. The barn which disfigured the Park would be moved away, and in its place good and ample accommodation would be provided for the forage for the troops. A hospital of a larger kind would be provided, to be shared with the Foot Guards, where the troops would probably receive greater attention. All these great improvements would be effected. Having, therefore, a site unobjectionable in itself—for the barracks had not been proved to be any nuisance to the neighbourhood, though no doubt the new barracks would be a great improvement in that respect—and it should be remembered that the barracks were not brought to the neighbourhood, but the houses in the neighbourhood had come to the barracks, he thought it a little strong to say that the barracks should be removed for the benefit of the neighbourhood. The street would be widened. Twenty feet would be taken off the very widest part; but it tapered away to absolutely nothing, and the road throughout would be 60 feet wide. Of course, he did not wish to incur the expense of putting plans on the Table before he knew that the House would sanction the proposal; but if his hon. Friend would call on him he would be happy to show him the plans. He had carefully considered the whole of this subject. He was responsible for the health of the men, and he believed every measure had been taken to secure their health. With regard to any apprehensions that the services of the troops might be required to be used against our own people, everybody knew that in a metropolis like this a certain number of bad characters might congregate that would require military force to disperse them, and there was nothing more calculated to save human life when the military was called on to aid the civil power than the use of Cavalry instead of Infantry, who were too often obliged to fire to effect that purpose. With regard to recruiting, he would reserve much of what he had to say until he made his statement on the Army Estimates. A proposal had been made for training boys for the Army; but although it was perhaps not an impracticable one, it would involve a serious outlay—as much as £60, probably, for every recruit of 18 years of age. Then it was suggested by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) that men entering the Army should be required to show certificates of good character. If the hon. and gallant Member had known as much about "characters" as he (Mr. Hardy) did, he would probably not have expressed so high an opinion of their utility. A case which had occurred in a village of his acquaintance illustrated rather forcibly how such a proposal would work. A man of notoriously bad character, who was mixed up in most of the mischief of the neighbourhood, took it into his head that he would emigrate. Well, to be assisted by the Emigration Commissioners he required to have a character, and accordingly he went round to the farmers and other people of respectability in the parish, begging them to testify to his good behaviour, which they all did. They gave him a character such as nobody had ever seen or known of before for excellence, in order to get rid of him. No one was more astonished at this result than the man himself, and after looking at his certificate, with its long list of signatures—"Well," said he, "I had no idea I was so much esteemed in the neighbourhood; I think I shall stay." He did so, and no one could breathe a word afterwards against him, because he had this written character stating what an excellent man he was; and it would be something of the same kind if they insisted upon characters with the recruits. A man who made himself obnoxious in a particular neighbourhood and who proposed to enlist would seldom find any difficulty in procuring one. He had given an unusual amount of information in the Estimates this year, which had been used in the speeches that had been delivered before he had had an opportunity of saying a word; but he would reserve his reply until the House was in Committee. He now came to the statement of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford), and on this point he could only say that both the military and civil authorities were determined as far as possible to put down such offences as had been described. The punishment inflicted had been spoken of as small, but dismissal from the Army was a very serious thing. It remained as a stigma on a man's character for the rest of his life, and operated as a serious warning to others. No man set his face more sternly against such offences in the Army than the Commander-in-Chief, and whenever they were brought under his notice they would assuredly not be lightly passed over. For his own part, although he deprecated any discussion in that House on the discipline of the Army, he was not at all sorry to have his attention called to particular cases that occurred, and he could assure hon. Members that officers who misbehaved themselves in any way would find in him a stern judge.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

ARMY—MILITIA QUARTERMASTERS—
PENSIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. PRICE rose to call attention to the case of the Militia Quartermasters. The hon. Member stated that the full pay of those officers, after serving 40, and in some instances 50, years, 20 of which had been spent in the Line, was only £73 a-year, and that was utterly inadequate, as they had to support the rank of captains in the Army. He presumed that the subject had been carefully considered by the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, it was not his intention to move any Resolution, but he hoped some statement would be made on the subject.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. STANLEY explained the case of the Militia Quartermasters. It had been determined some time ago, and he believed it was agreed to by successive Secretaries of State, that it was not expedient to continue the appointment of Quartermasters, as such, to Militia regiments. Under Lord Cardwell's scheme it was decided that there should be a Quartermaster to each brigade dépôt, and that he should perform the duties of Quartermaster of Militia. It was true that the pensions were not on so liberal a scale as he personally wished; but when taken in comparison with the other branches of the Service they were in fair proportion, and there was no reason to suppose that the Quartermasters were in a worse position than other officers. He could not admit the analogy to the special retirements given to the late Militia Adjutants. The duties of the Militia Quartermasters were being more and more transferred to the Quartermasters of the brigade dépôts. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had carefully considered the question, but he had not felt himself justified in coming to the House for an increase of the allowance to Quartermasters.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in moving for the first Vote under the Army Estimates it was usual to make a statement as full as possible as to the condition of the Army, and the proposals which the Government had to make respecting it. He hoped the Committee would do him the credit of saying that in the Estimates which he should put before them there was more plainness, openness, and completeness, than had appeared before. There was an index which would enable anybody to find in a moment what was there referred to, so that any hon. Member would have no difficulty in ascertaining any point which he might have to consider. He regretted very much that it should be his fate to produce before the Committee enlarged Estimates; but again he might ask the Committee to consider the course he had taken in the last two years. During that time, at least, he had not asked for Supplementary Estimates, and he had not exceeded the Estimates assigned to him. That there had been difficulties which caused him some uneasiness he admitted.

He wished to pass over some of the subjects on which he had been addressed, not to get rid of them, but as not being directly connected with the Army Estimates. First of all, promotion and retirement. That question was being most exhaustively and thoroughly considered. That it had become important no one who looked at the position of the officers of the Army could for a moment doubt. Stagnation of promotion was growing rapidly in it—much more rapidly than was expected. At the present moment there was no doubt that great numbers of officers were holding back in order to see what the terms might be on which they might be able to retire. He considered himself bound, as he thought every Secretary of State would be by the pledge given by his Predecessor on the abolition of Purchase—that care ought to be taken that promotion should be as adequate under non-Purchase as it had been under Purchase. That pledge was practically given by Parliament as well as by the Secretary of State, because that was the foundation of the scheme—that promotion should not be suffered to lag behind, but kept up at the same rate as it was before. Therefore, in any proposal he might make for dealing with the subject when they had the Report of the Commission, the evidence, and the actuarial calculations, he should endeavour to effect that object to which his Predecessor pledged himself.

The question of Paymasters had been hanging over, and he considered that it was wrapped up with the question of retirement. At all events, there would be great difficulty in dealing with it finally, unless upon the principle of coming to a decision either that they were or that they were not to assist retirement. His own impression was that they ought to assist retirement. They ought to take great care in appointing Paymasters taken from the Army that their fitness was carefully tested; they should not take them as a matter of course, but require that they should show their competency before they were admitted to the functions of the Paymastership.

He would dismiss, as rapidly as possible, what he called the non-effective Votes, because really these were not very much in their power. There was one point on which the Committee would agree with him in rejoicing that it could be done—that great numbers of officers on half-pay without their own fault had been brought back to full pay. As many as 80 officers had been brought back in this way, and it was a matter of justice to them that they should again have an opportunity of serving their Queen. This had been done so cheaply that he was sure the House would not grudge the small sum of money expended to complete the changes relating to Adjutants in the Militia.

The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) the other night, in speaking of desertion, mentioned a subject which was apposite to a good deal that had passed to-night, and he should take into consideration the suggestion thrown out of marking on the arm, so that everybody should show that he had served his Queen. The honourable profession would not be disgraced in any way by that kind of treatment, and he believed that this might tend to limit the operation of military law as at present. There was another point. In the case of recruiting sergeants finding a deserter and informing against him, they got a greater reward than when they enlisted him. He was far from saying that a sergeant would enlist a man, if he knew him to be a deserter; but if he got a larger amount for detecting the deserter it would keep him on the alert, and tend to check the practice of desertion which was too prevalent at present.

There was another question which was not included in the Estimates, but it affected the amount that was wanted, and that was the Purchase Commission.

He was happy to say, from the information he received from the Commissioners, that they would not require so much this year as last by £172,370, and as the Exchequer receipts would also be in excess of last year, there would be a deduction of nearly £200,000 on that account, which he hoped would balance some of his smaller excesses. As he had usually mentioned the question of fortifications he might now state that, with the exception of one at Spithead, the whole of the forts to be erected under the loan would be completed by the end of 1876-7, and would have a portion of their more important armaments mounted. Last year, when a great deal was done in the way of facing the forts, £230,000 was spent, and he hoped the fortification loan would be brought to a conclusion without exceeding the original Estimates. There was a mistake in the Chaplain General's salary which he should point out. The salary had been put down at £1,000, instead of £800, to which the amount was lowered when Mr. Gleig left, he having received the higher salary under exceptional circumstances.

He now came to the question of the Medical Department, in which since 1873 there had been a good deal of agitation as to the merits of the old regimental system and the staff arrangements, with the general and larger hospitals now in force. He thought the time had come when he ought to pronounce his opinion, and he had come to the conclusion that the idea of going back to the regimental system after what had been done was simply out of the question. It was impossible that it should be done without making re-arrangements and alterations which could never work in time of war. The system which he had approved enabled them to utilize the services of medical officers at the places where they were wanted; whereas under the regimental system they were bound to have medical men in particular positions where they might not be wanted. But by the control which the Head of the Department had in bringing those men to places where they were particularly wanted he was able to have a much larger consulting staff, to select the best operators for one class of cases and the best physicians for another; while he had in those large hospitals means and appliances in abundance which it would be impossible, without enormous expenditure, to have in the smaller hospitals. He believed that the effect of all these advantages would be that the health and efficiency of the soldier would be improved. The Staff system also had the advantages of bringing under the eye of the Chief of the Department everyone qualified to rise; and under the system which he had to propose the principle of selection was one which would conduce to making the higher ranks of the Medical Department more efficient—though he was far from saying they were not efficient now—and of enabling promotion to go on more rapidly and more in accordance with the deserts of the men; and that it would enable them to pass by those who did not wish to go forward, while others would have the opportunity afforded them of obtaining that to which they would be entitled if they continued to serve—namely, a pension. There were two points that were brought prominently before him with respect to the Medical Department—first, the want of candidates to enter the service; and, secondly, the want of promotion for those who were in it. These points he hoped to meet by the scheme he was about to lay before the House. He approved, then, of the general hospital system, and he ventured, with great distinctness and plainness, to say that he was not prepared any longer to listen to complaints on that subject. He had come to a conclusion upon the subject, and it was a conclusion on which he meant firmly to act. His new scheme was this. He proposed most liberal terms. The candidates who would have to undergo a severer examination would, on entering the service, have £250 a-year from the beginning, and at the end of 10 years they would be presented with £1,000 on leaving, and the heads of the Medical Department would have the power of selecting from among them such a number as would be sufficient to fill the vacancies in the higher ranks and to keep up the flow of promotion. That might be regarded as being a very dear system; but he believed it would ultimately be found to be a cheap one. In the first place, much less would come upon the non-effective Vote; and, in the second place, the localization or mobilization scheme would be assisted by the fact that there would be numbers of medical men who would be able to act upon an emergency, and who, although, because of being married or from other causes, they might desire to retire at the end of 10 years, yet would continue to retain their military predilections, and would not regret to find themselves again among their old comrades. Then, the sum of £1,000, though not a very considerable amount, was one which might enable a man to purchase a practice, while it would be known throughout the country that the service was a good service, that the pay was fair, and that it opened to those who were clever and skilful in their profession the prospect of promotion by selection. But, in order to carry out the scheme fully he must go a step further, and he proposed that those who went on after the 10 years, for the first two years should have their pay increased and should have 17*s.* 6*d.* a-day; that at the expiration of 12 years they should become surgeon majors with £1 a-day; and that five years after that they should have £1 5*s.* a-day. By diminishing the supply below, too many would not be brought into the upper ranks. The bottle was a good deal larger than the neck, and as they could not force all the contents into the neck at once, they must draw some off below, in order to get a fair proportion above. In that way the most expensive retirements would be diminished. He should not on the present occasion enter into details which would appear in the Warrant in due course; but he might mention that if a man during his 10 years of service should, from sickness or otherwise, require a provision for retirement at certain periods, he would receive a portion of the £1,000, so that he would not go away as a pauper, but as a man who had done something for his country. The medical officers then would have £250 a-year for 10 years, £320 for two years after that, beyond that time they would have £365, and after five years more £1 5*s.* a day, or £456 a-year. A good prospect would, therefore, he thought, be held out to them. Those who were going on would be placed still more advantageously than those who left, for they would attain rank, more money, a pension, and what men liked in that profession as all others—distinction, the distinction of selection and due reward for the services they rendered to the country. He would add to that the £40 a-year they received for quarters and the £18 for servants. Think what it was for a young man to secure those prospects, and what inducements would be held out to the medical schools to send some of their best young men to us. That had not been the case, for they had 45 vacancies the other day, and only 12 candidates, some of whom had been rejected on former occasions. In some cases, he was sorry to say, they had been driven to accept medical men about whom he might have doubts. At all events, he did not think the Army ought to be obliged to take a low class of medical men in any respect. It ought to get its pick, because they had very delicate and difficult services to render, and very great dangers to encounter; though it should be remembered, to the credit of medical men, how large was their loss in proportion to that of the combatant officers. He proposed, he might add, that Surgeons General and the Deputy Surgeons General should retire at the age of 60 instead of 65, and that their retirement should be compulsory, without any exception, for the making of exceptions only tended to all sorts of inconveniences. Great pressure was sometimes put on the Department to retain men under special circumstances; but it was better that they should receive just compensation for the net loss they might sustain, as would be granted in the present instance on account of the substitution of the age of 60 for 65. He hoped the Committee would see that the proposal which he had sketched was a fair one. The non-effective Vote would, of course, be now increased by the fact that a certain number of men would have to retire at the age of 60, and it would go up for a certain number of years, but it would then begin to diminish again. Up to 1880 it would, he thought, practically remain at about the same point, £90,000 or £91,000; but that was the whole Vote, and was not all caused by these changes. The effective Vote, which was about £200,000 this year, would vary also; but if the system of which he spoke went on it would in 1912 be £150,000 instead of £200,000. He could not, he might add, hope to please everybody; he had long ago given up the idea. As for pleasing all the members of the medical profession, that was also a thing he was afraid he could not accomplish. He had read a great many pamphlets on the subject, and he had been very slow in arriving at a conclusion with regard to it; but every sort of scheme had been tested by calculations, and he must say that that which he had laid before the Committee seemed to him to be the most effective, and likely to be the most beneficial to the soldier. By its means educated, earnest, and able men would, he believed, be induced to enter the Army, some of whom afterwards the heads of Departments might feel justified in promoting to very difficult situations.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

He would now pass from the Medical Department to the Auxiliary Services. With respect to the Yeomanry, he had last year the services of a Committee, to which the country was greatly indebted, for they had investigated the questions relating to the Force at much inconvenience to themselves. That Committee had come to conclusions on which the Department had acted. That was to say, they had determined to treat the Yeomanry as Light Cavalry. The appendage of guns was one that could not be continued with advantage to themselves; and, therefore, with great regret, and with due acknowledgment to those who had maintained and served in those branches of the Yeomanry Corps, they had, for the advantage of the Service generally, got rid of the cars used by the Wiltshire Yeomanry, the Artillery of the Buckinghamshire and Essex, and the dismounted men of Northumberland. Again, they had improved the position of the Adjutants in pay and allowances. So, also, with the permanent Staff. He was aware that the Yeomanry had been made the subject of a good deal of remark; but on consulting military men they found that in the event of that necessity which they all hoped would never arise, of meeting an attack upon this country, the Yeomanry would be in many places of the greatest advantage, from their knowledge of the country and the skill with which the greater number of them could ride. This was not a very easy country to ride over, and it was not a bad thing to have people who, wherever they put them, would be able to ride well.

He must next refer to the Volunteers. To the estimate for that force was added £20,000; but let the Committee be satisfied, for it was entirely in consequence of increased efficiency. He had received very good reports of the Volunteers; but he would not enter into details until the Vote itself was under discussion. He would then be able to show that they had improved greatly in many respects. They had taken very much to camping out and got more drill in the course of a week than they used to do in months, because they were under good Staff officers, were intelligent men, and picked up a knowledge of drill a great deal faster than people thought. In 1873 there were 58 camps; in 1874, 69; and in 1875, 77 camps; and there was a steady increase in the number camping out from 19,000 in the first of those years, to 27,000 in the second, and 31,000 in the last. The progress made in their training would, he hoped, be satisfactory to the country. Again, it was proposed to put the Adjutants on a footing which he trusted would be satisfactory to them. The old Adjutants would be allowed to continue to serve on the old terms, but newly-appointed Adjutants would be treated in the way proposed. The Adjutants of Volunteers would henceforth be relieved from the duty of recruiting, for which, in fact, they had little time.

Now he came to another part of the Army which might be said to be both Auxiliary and Regular—he meant the Reserves. The Reserves, he might remark in passing, were not his Reserves, but had been instituted by others—first by General Peel and then by his noble Friend who was at the head of the War Department in the last Administration (Viscount Cardwell). Everybody admitted that if Reserves could be got they could not have more efficient soldiers. The men would have served six years in the Army, and consequently would, on joining the Reserve, be from 24 to 26 years of age. If they could have them available and to be depended upon, no one could say that they were not most efficient men. Everybody felt, however, that the appearing for pay, and that in advance, was not the sort of appearance which the Reserves ought to put in. Everybody also felt that there were many difficulties in calling out men who were in business and different occupations for any long period of time. Everybody would likewise, he thought, agree that when the men were called out they ought to come, and that if they did not come they ought to be treated as deserters. He wanted to impress on the minds of hon. Members that the Reserve men ought to be treated not as civilians playing at soldiers, but as soldiers on furlough, and that being soldiers on furlough they ought to answer to the call, whenever it was made. He admitted that the pay they received was not very large. He admitted, too, that perhaps there were not all the inducements which might be held out to them in comparison with other services. Therefore, he proposed to increase their pay, and, at the same time, to increase the stringency of the conditions. If any of the men did not like to take the additional pay under the new terms, he should not compel them to do so, for he thought it especially desirable to keep faith with soldiers. He proposed that in future the men, instead of being paid in advance, should be paid in arrear. At present they got £1 to provide themselves with necessaries, and they were then paid a quarter in advance; after which we lost sight of them, and they might be anywhere at the end of the quarter, and might not have done a day's work for the money. He proposed that they should be paid every two months, and that they should appear at the end of each year to be medically examined, in order that we might not keep men who were not fit to remain in the service. When the men came up at the end of each year they would receive an additional 2d. a-day or about £3, from which sum, however, he proposed to deduct the £1 now allowed for necessaries, because that £1 was practically not expended in necessaries. He proposed instead that when the men were called out for active service they should have a free kit. In the autumn he hoped they would answer to the call; but they would be sent back to their business as soon as possible. He wanted to see them; and when an Army Corps was mobilized this year, it was intended to call out also a certain number of the Army Reserve. He hoped that they would appear in their places; and he would take care that no unreasonable service was put upon them, and that they should get back as soon as possible to their avocations. The men must keep the War Office informed of their places of residence, and when they came to the mobilization they must bring with them what was necessary—namely, shoes, two shirts, and two pairs of stockings. There was an increase in the clothing Vote, and part of that was to be attributed to the necessity of clothing those men when they came up, but the sum was not a large one. This year the additional expense of the Reserve would be practically nothing; but when all the 84,000 were called out they would cost £255,000, and if available they would be very cheap at the price.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Now he would pass to the Militia. Although disparaging remarks were sometimes made on that Force, even the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) must admit that the Militia, considering the amount of drill it received, presented a very creditable appearance. The recruits had three months' drill and one month's training. He should like to add to what he said the other night the authority of two very distinguished officers. General Knollys, who had had a great deal to do with the Militia during the Crimean War and afterwards, had written to him that he was ready to bear testimony to the fullest extent as to the excellence of those troops, and the rapidity with which they could be brought to efficiency. Again, Sir Thomas Steele, the General Officer in command at Aldershot, stated that many of the Militia regiments at Aldershot would, with very little additional training, be able to take their place by the side of the Regulars, and he added that in general appearance, drill, and discipline they were highly satisfactory. A good many questions had come before him as to the billeting and encamping of the Militia. The proposals of his noble Friend who preceded him in office was that training barracks should be erected in certain places for the Militia. He was sorry that more of these barracks had not yet been provided; but the truth was that great difficulties had arisen in coming to terms about land. Still, the erection of barracks was being pressed on, and he hoped that in many instances there would be training barracks to which the Militia could be sent instead of being exposed unnecessarily to camp life. As for billeting, he was most anxious to get rid of it wherever he could. In connection with the Militia, he might mention that its Medical Department had been transferred to the Medical Vote. He should have a few words to say later on respecting the mobilization; but he desired now to remark that his proposal would necessarily involve some Militia regiments being brought to the head-quarters named for them. This, he believed, they would readily agree to. A great many questions were daily arising about the Militia, and he had felt a great inclination to do in regard to them what he had done with the Yeomanry last year—namely, to get a certain number of Militia officers to confer with those who were qualified at the War Office, in order to consider such questions as recruiting, re-enrolling, quarter-masters, and a variety of other subjects constantly pressed upon him. Thus the Committee might next year have before them information concerning the Militia that would to some extent perhaps obviate the difficulty which might exist at present of the Militia recruiting interfering with the Army recruiting. Nothing would give him greater pleasure than to have a training in the Militia before a recruit was taken for the Army; but this he thought was almost impossible, and, after all, he believed that they now got from the Militia those men who were inclined to join the Army. However, it was a question he would re-consider hereafter. Coming to the expenditure upon Brigade depôts and other works for the localization of the Forces, he might state that already as much as £2,500,000 out of the loan of £3,500,000 was actually pledged, and that the other £1,000,000 would be spent.

With regard to tactical stations, it had been found almost impossible to establish a very large one, with all the necessary conditions, in the North of England. There would, however, be stores and barracks at York; and one advantage in this location was that it was acceptable to the people of the City, and they had no wish to get rid of it. Knavesmire would, he hoped, afford great facilities; and arrangements had been almost made with the lord of the manor for the purchase of Strensall Common, 1,150 acres in extent, and situated four miles from York, and he understood that they would find the railway companies and other people very accommodating. Having failed in getting a tactical station on a large scale, with 4,000 or 5,000 acres, in the North of England, he turned his attention to Aldershot, and he hoped that negotiations would be concluded which would enable the War Office to acquire 6,600 acres for the use of the troops there. At present the difficulties of moving the troops there were great, and were daily increasing from the purchases of land and the inclosures that were being made in the neighbourhood. It had been necessary, in order to obviate these difficulties, to bring in Bills, not for the purposes of the Autumn Manœuvres, but even of the ordinary summer drills. The additional acreage would give great facilities in manœuvring the troops. He mentioned this to the House, although, under the Act, he could divert the money sanctioned for the purpose of the station in the North to the acquiring of additional land at Aldershot, with nothing more than the assent of the Treasury, and he hoped that this assent would be given. The Votes for Provisions and Forage were high. Forage was not quite as high as it was last year, but it had made a frightful difference in the Estimates both last year and this. The increased cost of forage this year would be £37,000. With respect to clothing, it was absolutely necessary that they should have a certain amount of reserve, and it was for that reason that that item was increased. He did not think they should go on in a hand-to-mouth system with respect to clothing, which they might suddenly want to increase without the power of doing so; but it would be seen from the amount stated that they did not want to have a very extravagant amount of reserve. Stores were, no doubt, very high; but it must be remembered that there was a repayment of £25,000 less this year. The Admiralty had an excess of £77,000 over last year, and it took of this Vote altogether £309,000. He now came to another increase which arose from peculiar circumstances. The War Office were led to believe that India would last year require a much larger number of Martini-Henrys than she actually needed. The consequence was that what she was intended to take we should have to pay for from Imperial funds, and that amounted to £80,000. Another sum of £45,000 was passed over from last year to this, and was not a real increase.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Altogether there was a sum of £243,000 mainly due to exceptional causes.

As to works, he was anxious to keep the charge as low as possible, and accordingly had restricted them to sanitary requirements, such as married soldiers' quarters. An hon. Member had called his attention to cases of overcrowding. He was glad that he had done so, and he intended to stop it. But with respect to the general subject of married soldiers' quarters, they were getting rapidly an Army of short service, and in time they would have a great number of soldiers, who had no claim to marry during the period they were in the Army. In ordinary life young men of that age were seldom very prudent if they married. He did not condemn them, because he was afraid it he did he should be condemning himself; but, though he did not want to lay down a rule that people should not marry unless they could fulfil certain conditions to the satisfaction of the Government, still they must remember that those men were only to serve six years, that they would leave you at 25 or 26 years of age, and that, therefore, you could not be called upon to provide a large amount of married soldiers' quarters. The provision for married soldiers under the long-service system was for 7 per cent; but under the new system they would not have the same number of soldiers who might be considered of a marriageable age, and who, therefore, would be entitled to be married. He was sorry to put the least check on anything that might tend to morality or to the stability of soldiers as reliable men; but he suggested whether the country ought to be called upon, under the short-service system, to build a large additional number of barracks for men who had not such special claims in respect of marriage as they might have under a system of long service. We should take care that our soldiers were well provided with quarters; but he trusted that might be done by diminishing the number we required and extending the area for married soldiers. There was one small item in connection with building which it had appeared to him was worth incurring for the sake of doing a kindly act to one of our colonies. The noble Lord the Governor General of Canada (Lord Dufferin), to whom that result was chiefly owing, wrote him a letter stating that Quebec was to retain its ancient fortifications, which were a great ornament to the city, but that it would be necessary to make several gates in the walls in order that access might be had to the streets. Lord Dufferin thought that he (Mr. Hardy), on the part of the British Army, might present the city with one of those gates, and the noble Lord proposed with great good taste and feeling, and with a desire to draw together the bonds of the English and French settlers, that it should be called the Wolfe-Montcalm Gate, after those two illustrious men who, though they were opposed in arms, were equally celebrated for the gallantry of their conduct, for their high and noble dispositions, and for the generosity they always displayed to their soldiers and to each other. It struck him that the Committee would not be disinclined to sanction this expenditure. It would amount to only £200, and would be most grateful, he believed, to the French Canadians, as well as to the descendants of those who had gone out from among ourselves.

He came now to the great question how to keep up our Regular Army. He could not shut his eyes to the position in which he should have stood next year if nothing had been done now, and thought it would be imprudent to delay till then any proposal for encouraging recruiting, but that any experiment should be tried in the year before the great pressure came. For this reason he proposed certain changes, which he hoped would tend to bring additional men, and, to some extent, superior men. On a question of pay, however—Vestigia nulla retrorsum. If the pay were once given, they could never recall it. They could not break faith with the men once they had given it. Many would say that he had dealt with them in a rather niggardly way; but he had acted to the best of his judgment and upon the best advice he could take. He had had advice from soldiers and from civilians well acquainted with the Army, and their opinion was that the propositions he was about to make would supply the deficiencies which they might expect in future years. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had called attention to the youth and physical qualifications of the recruits who were received at the present time, and he said, with perfect justice, that to a certain extent the War Department were able to obtain better information than the House. The Recruiting Return which the Inspector General had placed on the Table of the House was as much in the possession of the Committee as in his own; but, at the same time, he had, in consequence of communications with the Inspector General, endeavoured to obtain, as far as possible, accurate information to give to the Committee with respect to the recruiting of last year, and in a little more detail than the House could have had it otherwise. In the countries to which reference had been made—France, Germany, Italy, and Russia—the system of police inspection enabled them to know every man's age, and, with conscription, they could fix the age at which they wanted recruits, and at once lay their hands on the men they wanted. It had been shown by discussions in the House, and he believed it would be shown by discussion in Committee also, that this country was not prepared for conscription; and therefore he had to deal with this question as one that concerned a Volunteer Army. Though he might wish in some instances—he would not say in all—to get men of 20 years of age, he was not dissatisfied to take them at from 18 to 19; and of this he was quite sure, from what he had heard from his gallant friend at the head of the Recruiting Department and from Cavalry officers, that those officers did not wish to see their recruits so old as 20, as they believed they could teach riding better when the men were younger. He had heard himself an officer say to a young man—"You are over 20; it will not be easy to teach you how to ride." He believed the Cavalry officers were satisfied with younger men, because they could teach them more easily to ride than if they had stiffened more into form, as they would when they had reached the age of 20. When the recruits of 18 or 19 arrived at 20 they were, as regarded their physical condition, much superior to the men that were picked up at the latter age, for they had had a training specially fitting them for their work. They were physically developed—they were trained soldiers; whereas the man you got at 20 must have his year's or half-year's training before he was fit—he would not say physically—but in all respects to do duty as a soldier. He did not agree with his friend Sir Lintorn Simmons that no one was fit to fight until he was 21. He was strongly of a contrary opinion. He had known distinguished officers who had led young men into action with satisfaction to themselves, and he had heard Sir Garnet Wolseley say—"Give me young men; I like to lead them." And why? Because they would yield to discipline; they would be more amenable to drill, and would be more readily trained to be soldiers than older men. If you caught them young they might have some difficulty at first in carrying their knapsacks; but the time would speedily come when they would be disciplined men and physically fit to take the field. The Committee perhaps thought that we were below all other nations in the conditions in which we got recruits. But what were the facts? And first as to height. The minimum size of recruits in Austria was 5 feet 1 1-5 inches; while we doubted about taking an officer, who might perhaps be mounted on horseback, at 5 feet 2 inches. In France the minimum was 5 feet 2 1-2 inches; in Germany, 5 feet 1 1-2 inches; in Italy, 5 feet 1 1-2 inches; and in Russia, which approached nearest our own standard, it was 5 feet 4 1-2 inches, and rather more for the Sappers. It was quite true that in Austria, France, Italy, and Russia the men must be 20 years of age at the period of the conscription. In Germany they must have completed 19, so that there in age they were nearer to ourselves than in other countries. He would like, if he did not weary the Committee, to give them some idea of what he had gathered on this point from the Returns furnished by the Colonels of different regiments. Let not hon. Members turn away and say—"Oh, they only know what the recruits tell them." That was all very well, but if we said—"Don't take recruits under 20," we should have just the same difficulty; the recruit when asked his age would say he was older than he really was. But hon. Members could make all the allowances they thought necessary on this point. Well, in heavy Cavalry the average age of the recruits of 1875 was 20 years 7 1-2 months; height, 5 feet 9 1-20 inches; width round the chest, 35 19-20 inches. We need not be ashamed of such men. For the medium Cavalry, the average age was 20 years and 9-10ths of a month; average height, 5 feet 8 1-12 inches; measurement round the chest,

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

35 7-80 inches. For the light Cavalry the average age was 19 years 7 2-7 months; height, 5 feet 6 4-5 inches; round the chest, 34½ inches. Such was the class of our recruits belonging to the Cavalry. He told the House last year his experience at Aldershot, and Cavalry officers, in answer to his inquiries, had informed him that they had no reason to be dissatisfied with their recruits, and he hoped the Committee would not be dissatisfied either. He came now to the Artillery, and he wished they had more of them; because it was in that branch of the Service that the greatest difficulty of getting men was experienced, and it was in that branch that the greatest number of desertions occurred. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan), who was a distinguished member of that Force, would feel with him the great importance of restoring that most important arm to a better condition. But when the hon. and gallant Gentleman complained that we did not propose to give additional ready-money pay to the Artillery as well as the Guards, he might remind him that the Artillery had a higher rate of pay than the ordinary regiments of the Army. [Captain NOLAN said, he had not urged that point.] Then he must have mistaken the hon. and gallant Gentleman. It might become necessary to give them higher pay in future, but he hoped not. No doubt the desertions from the Artillery were very great. The work was, however, very heavy, and it required very large and strong men, and they could not expect to get men of that class without paying for them. Well, the average age of the recruits for the Royal Artillery was—gunners, 20 years 9 months; drivers, 20 years 6 months; the average height—gunners, 5 feet 8½ inches; drivers, 5 feet 5 inches. The average chest measurement was 35½ inches and 35½ inches respectively. Now, according to his view, these were recruits of which the country need not be ashamed. For the Royal Engineers the average age of recruits was—Sappers, 21 years 2 months; height, 5 feet 7 inches; chest measurement, 34½ inches. The average age for drivers was 19 years 7½ months, height 5 feet 4½ inches, round the chest 35½ inches. For the Foot Guards the average age of recruits was 20 years 3½ months, average height 5 feet 9 1-5 inches, round the chest 35½ inches. For the Infantry of the Line the average age was 20 years, height 5 feet 6½ inches, round the chest 34½ inches. For the Rifles (60th Regiment and Rifle Brigade), who were generally smaller men, the average age was 19 years 10 months, height 5 feet 5 1-5 inches, round the chest 35 7-25 inches. These were the average ages, heights, and chest measurements of the recruits we got last year. He knew that averages were rather uncertain, and he therefore felt it right to ask for the two extremes, as he did not wish to delude the Committee. Excluding the boys he found that there were 213 aged from 17 to 18, 4,787 from 18 to 19, and from 19 to 20, 3,967. The oldest among last year's recruits was 25 years of age; but, of course, there were very few of such men, and there were 135 up to the age of 24. Therefore he might expect that the recruits of 1875 would be efficient men, and such as they should not be ashamed to see in the ranks.

Having said so much on that subject, he would now state that he proposed to add somewhat to the first 18 regiments for service abroad, and he did so on many grounds. Everybody was aware from the newspapers of the difficulty which we experienced—and it was a real one—when any regiment was going out to the Colonies or to India, to get it up to the required strength in time. We necessarily had a number of recruits not in a condition to go abroad. What was the consequence. They had to draw on other regiments, either by calling for volunteers or upon the linked battalions. There was nothing so disheartening to commanding officers as to see men filched away from one regiment to supply other regiments when they prided themselves on the efficiency of their own. It had happened that a regiment had gone to India in the Mutiny, having been denuded of its best men by volunteers to other corps, and they found themselves fighting beside another regiment in the highest possible condition, filled with their own men who had volunteered, while they themselves were in an almost decrepit state. It was galling to the officers, and still more so to the men, for it discredited their regiment when it would really have been in the highest state of efficiency had it not been deprived of men to fill up the ranks of other regiments. It was, therefore, thought desirable that there should be a long period of recruiting—namely, from the time that regiments got on the roster for Indian or Colonial service—and in this way to meet the difficulty to which he had referred. He did not propose to go into the market as if he wanted 3,000 men at once, but to get them gradually. Nothing could be more objectionable than raising a large additional number of men for the Army in undue haste; and, in fact, the sudden increase in our military force a few years since by 20,000 men had done an injury from which it had not yet recovered. He could assure the House, therefore, that if they granted him the increase in the number of men he asked for the number should be increased gradually and as opportunity offered. It was true we were not at war. He hoped with all his heart war might never happen while he held that office, or in the time of his Successor. He believed there never was a more peaceful War Minister than the one who now held the Seals of office. He had no desire for war; but he had a desire that the machine entrusted to him should be in as efficient a condition as possible; and he knew if we were called upon, not to engage in a large war, but in a small one, it would be discreditable if we were not found thoroughly prepared. He asked whether it was a creditable thing to this country that when we went to war with Ashantee, we should have had to resort to the practice of drawing men from one battalion to fill up the ranks of another. Thus, when we were sending out the 42nd Regiment we had to draw men from the ranks of the 79th to raise the former to fighting strength. It was a strong proof of the love the men entertained for their own regiments that, on their return from Ashantee the men who had been so transferred from the 79th to the 42nd were anxious to resign all the special distinction they would have enjoyed by remaining in the latter in order to get back to their old regiment, and he thought it was only a fair reward to those excellent men to gratify their wish in the matter. That circumstance showed how very distasteful it was to the men to be drawn away from their own regiments to serve in others. It was with the wish to avoid those unpleasant contingencies that he desired to raise a certain number of regiments up to a more full complement. It must also be remembered that we were under numerous Treaty engagements and other obligations that might render it desirable to have a small force in readiness to act without delay, and if we had one or two well equipped Army Corps of full strength in addition to the three regiments of the Guards, we should have an available force of something between 30,000 and 50,000 men. The maintenance of such a force could not be regarded in the light of a threat held out towards any other Power; and, indeed, it was simply carrying out a part of the original plan contemplated by the noble Lord who preceded him in office, when he effected the changes he had done in our Army. His proposal then, as appeared from the Report of the Localization Committee, was that the first 18 regiments on the roster for foreign service should be raised to the strength of 820 men each. At present we had only four regiments of that strength. It had been proposed then also that the next 18 regiments should consist of 700 men; but, in fact, we had no regiment at all of that strength, a few of them numbering 600, and the rest 520. He was not going so far as was originally projected by his noble Friend; but he was taking only those first 18 regiments, because with the Guards we should have a very respectable Army Corps with full equipment and ready for foreign service. Then came the question, how were we to get the men? There were two inducements that could be held out to men to enlist in the Army. The first was that which had been pressed upon his attention ever since he had held office by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, and which, had it not been for circumstances over which he had no control, he would have held out last year—namely, that of putting the non-commissioned officers in a better position, so as to induce them to remain in the force, and so as to offer greater prizes to well-conducted men in the ranks. The second inducement was to increase the pay of the men themselves. Nothing had done the Army greater injury than one fact to which he would direct attention—namely, that those who might have been very well off, or fairly off, and who having squandered what they had were reduced to beggary, were pointed out as men neglected by their country, and held out to young men as having been left in a miserable condition after serving in the Army. There were men who left the Army who had had but a small pay, and although he would not go so far as to say that they could not save, still they could not save a great deal, but might put something by day by day, if they chose to do so. There were military savings banks in which they could place their money; but possibly—that was a subject worth consideration—it would be for the benefit, both of the Army and of the country, if those savings banks were consolidated with the Post Office Savings Banks. If that were done, he believed it would give a greater feeling of security, and the soldiers would feel that they were acting together with the whole country when going out of the Army if they could, as quasi civilians, draw their money from the Post Office Savings Bank like other people. There might, however, be difficulties in such a change which fuller information might disclose. He intended to give the men 2*d.* a-day deferred pay, which would amount to something like £3 a-year, so that at the end of their six years of service they would on leaving the Army be entitled to the sum of £18, which would enable them to obtain a start in life. He proposed that the men should not be paid the whole of that sum upon their discharge, because it was a great evil that the moment men were discharged there were persons who fixed upon them as long as they had anything left, and consequently they returned home to their relations with ruined health and in a penniless condition. He therefore intended that the amount of the deferred pay should be divided into two or three sums, which should be paid through the Post Office Savings Banks, at the places where the men intended to reside—the men of course continuing in the Reserve and still receiving the pay of 2*d.* a-day. It was a well-known fact that recruiting for the Royal Marines had been easier than for any other branch of the Service; and that was because, as the men had no opportunity of spending their money when on board ship, they frequently took home with them on their discharge comparatively large sums which they had saved during their term of service, and this circumstance induced young men to join a branch of the Service in which so much money was to be gained.

By the course he proposed to adopt our soldiers would return to their villages with a whole year's pay in their pockets, and this would, he hoped, be the means of inducing others to enlist. Then he thought we treated them rather hardly in another way. When a soldier had his full pay formerly he had to find everything; but since we began to furnish him with rations, instead of giving him 1*s.* 6*d.* a-day on furlough, which included the cost of the rations, we gave him only 1*s.* 2*d.* But as it was of benefit to them and to the Army that they should have those little holidays, we proposed to add to their pay 4*d.* more. When, therefore, they went on furlough they were to have 1*s.* 6*d.* instead of 1*s.* 2*d.* The item, which this addition represented, was not large; but it was given for the welfare of the soldiers, and put them on the same footing when they were in the Service and when they were at home. Those were the experiments which he proposed to make upon the Army generally.

Then he came to the question of the Guards. He quite admitted that when the pay of the whole Army was raised to 1*s.* a-day the Guards actually lost nothing, but relatively they were worse off than the Line by 1*d.* a-day, which they had always received above the ordinary pay of the rest of the Army. The reasons for the Guards receiving superior pay was obvious—thus, they were men of greater stature than the ordinary soldier, and therefore more difficult to get; their clothing was more expensive, and their continual residence in London entailed additional expenses upon them. Under these circumstances, he proposed to increase their pay by 1*d.* a-day, so as to restore them in this respect to the position, relatively to the rest of the Army, they had formerly occupied. The Guards were 400 or 500 short of their complement; and therefore it was absolutely necessary to take some steps of this kind to induce men to enlist in these regiments, because, as they were always the first on the list for foreign service, it would be unreasonable not to keep them up to their full establishment strength. This increase in the pay of the Guards would cost £8,000 a-year. They would also have the deferred pay; and he hoped that, as the soldiers of our Army saw funds accumulating for them at the rate of £3 per year per man, they would hesitate before they deserted from the Service. For it must be borne in mind that desertion would result in the absolute forfeiture of every penny of deferred pay. It was hoped that by this means considerable loss would be avoided. When a soldier deserted he frequently took his kit and other property with him; and, even if he did not go this length, there was the cost of providing a successor to him, and much inconvenience arising therefrom. This deferred pay, then, would be a safeguard against evil, and would at the same time act as an encouragement to the soldiers. If hon. Members would look at the desertion Returns for the past year they would find that the total number was less by 1,000 than last year. There was, however, too large a number, and it included several cases of what might be called skilled desertions—a class of offence which must be put a stop to by some means. Those who might be most properly termed deserters were those who ran away in the second or third year of their service, and this class of offence would most probably be checked by the knowledge in the minds of the men that in proportion to the length of their service was the amount of their deferred pay accumulating, and therefore the greater their loss as the penalty of desertion. No doubt this system would cost money; but against that must be placed the fact that the expense of filling the places of deserters would not be incurred, and the morality of the Army would be improved. The cost of deferred pay in the present Estimates would be very small—not more than £6,000. In the case of the Guards the amount of the additional 1*d.* would be £8,000. The Imperial charge next year would be about £31,000, the year after £65,000, and when the normal condition of things arrived, the amount would be £329,000; and he therefore quite admitted it was a question which the House had a right to weigh, because it was a growing payment, although he believed it would be a cheap payment if it secured the object he had in view. He further assumed that it would in the end diminish to a certain extent the pension list, because it would diminish the number going out on pensions.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

The next proposal he had to make was one to increase the pay of non-commissioned officers, and this would involve an extra expenditure of about £104,000; and a sum of £39,000 would fall upon the Indian Government. He proposed that sergeant majors should receive 6*d.* additional pay; that sergeants should receive 2*d.* additional, and after two years' service in the ranks, 4*d.* That was to say, their present pay being 1*s.* 11*d.*, with the addition of 2*d.* it would be 2*s.* 1*d.*, and after two years' service it would be 2*s.* 3*d.* Corporals were to receive an additional 1*d.* a day. They were allowed to keep their good conduct pay, which the sergeants were not. From the increased pay of 1*s.* 4*d.* or 1*s.* 5*d.* a-day they would be advanced, after two years' service, to 1*s.* 5*d.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* a-day. Another proposition was with regard to lance corporals and lance sergeants. At present, a private who was thought well of by his officers was made a lance corporal, if he chose to be one; but he got nothing for it, though he had the invidious duty of keeping up discipline among his own late comrades. He trusted, therefore, it would be considered a reasonable request that he should receive payment for those services. He proposed, therefore, to increase the pay of these officers to the present pay of their substantive rank, so that lance sergeants of Infantry would receive 1*s.* 11*d.* and lance corporals 1*s.* 3*d.* per day. This would offer an inducement to smart soldiers to accept positions which at present they were often very unwilling to fill. Holding, as he did, that the stability of the Army depended very much upon its non-commissioned officers, he was most anxious that they should be fairly treated and induced, if possible, to remain in the service of their country. He proposed further to improve the position of the Staff sergeants, who were the picked men of their rank in the Army. Under existing arrangements the allowance made to these men for lodgings was altogether inadequate; and he should therefore ask the Committee to consent to a Vote which would raise the allowance of Staff sergeants in the first class from 8*s.* 6*d.* to 12*s.* 3*d.*, and in the second class from 4*s.* 3*d.* to 7*s.* per week for lodging money. About £1,500 would cover this payment, and he believed it would give the greatest satisfaction to a most estimable body of men.

There had been a good deal of talk now and again of our Volunteer Force being organized "not for defiance, but for defence," and he could assure the House that the mobilization scheme had been entered upon strictly with a view to the defence of the country. It had been prepared with the view, if ever the necessity should arise from a hostile invasion, that there should be no confusion and no difficulty; that every man, whether in the Regular Army or in the Auxiliary Forces, should know the head-quarters to which he must repair; that not a moment should be lost in finding out what he had to do, and that he should at all times have before him clearly laid down where he was to go. He could assure the House that no labour or pains had been spared in making those arrangements. Every time-table had been arranged and every route prepared by which the men could be brought to their proper head-quarters in case of necessity without delay. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) had said that it was a scheme not worthy of a school-boy; but whether that were so or not he (Mr. Hardy) at least could not help seeing the labour, the toil, and the intelligence devoted to it by those who had worked out its details. He did not suppose they were so proud of their work as to think it incapable in every particular of amendment; but no one could deny that great care and enormous diligence had been exercised in its preparation. He proposed to call out two of those Army Corps (at some period which, of course, he could not indicate), and bring every man in them to the head-quarters assigned to him, so that they might see what appearance they would present under such circumstances, and not with a desire or with a view to putting their forces on a war footing. The hon. Member for Hackney, in two speeches which he lately made, accused him of that intention, and he said in one that they must increase their Militia to 250,000 men, and in his last speech—at Manchester—he gave somewhat different figures, and said 221,640 men. Neither of those figures was correct. The hon. Member in his hurry had evidently made the mistake of reckoning up each Army Corps as if it were composed only of Infantry. He forgot, too, that Militia regiments could not be increased, except within certain boundaries and within the limitations of the law. Those 104 Militia battalions and 64 Regular battalions made up 168, just the number for making eight Army Corps; but they had no idea of filling those Corps up to what might be considered technically their full number. That was never intended. What they wanted was a system on which all this work might be based; and without any very extraordinary expenditure they would create cadres which might afterwards, if requisite, be filled up. It was not intended to use more than the number taken in the Votes of last year—namely, about 134,000 Militia—and they believed that with that force they could do all that they expected to do with all those Army Corps. One word as to the long distances which it was said some of the men would have to come. That was an arrangement that might be altered again and again. The hon. Member spoke of the hardship that would result from bringing men from Scotland and other remote localities. The regiments themselves took a different view from that taken by the hon. Member, and would think themselves ill-used if they were left out. In fact, one colonel wrote to complain that his regiment was not brought down into the South of England, where the fighting would be sure to take place. The best military authorities were all of opinion that if an invasion took place it would be between the Wash and Plymouth. He did not say that there might not be a diversion in the Highlands; but if there were he should take care that action should be based upon that fact; and, further, that the regiments of which the Scotch were so justly proud should be sent without delay to the Highlands, where it could not be doubted they would fight like true Britons in defence of the mountainous and wooded country which they loved so well. But, to return. They had had to deal with Regulars, Militia, Volunteers, Yeomanry, Pensioners, and Reserves, and had found places for them all. The Volunteers were selected for coast and garrison duty, and had been so treated out of no disrespect to them or distrust in their zeal. With a view, however, not to press too hardly on them, one-fourth only would be taken into service at a time, and three-fourths would remain at home. He wished to add that there were some Volunteer Artillery and Engineer corps which they might not be at all ashamed to place in charge of guns. His gallant friend, Mr. Darby, deserved the greatest credit for the organization of his Corps, and it was known that the feats performed by the Sussex Volunteer Artillery had rivalled the performance of the Regular Artillery. They had tried to increase the number of such corps, and had found regiments ready to change their condition and become Artillery and Engineers, and thus render themselves more adapted for the service which might be required of them than they could be as Infantry only. Many of the men were employed in the kind of work which specially fitted them to be Engineers, such as mining, quarrying, and other heavy work in which they had to observe engineering rules, and these men, as sappers, miners, and gunners, would be most useful for coast and garrison service.

Such was his proposal. It might be a mistake. It was to be tested. All those things were tentative. He spoke in the name of those military men who had put the scheme on foot. For himself, he was only responsible for having adopted it, thinking it would be an admirable one, and for bringing all the forces at their disposal into the best position for the work required of them. He by no means thought the scheme a perfect one. Defects had been pointed out which might easily be remedied; but he thought it most desirable that officers and men should be ready—that they might be able to say to every General, every Colonel, every man—“This is the place to which you are to go;” that without confusion, hurry, or fuss, those who were to proceed to the front should go there, while other Army Corps might fit themselves as rapidly as possible. Some of the Army Corps would be ready at once to take the front, and the others would be drilled so as to be fit in a few weeks for active service; and no invasion could be successful in that time, or in as many months if the Fleet was in its place and did its duty as they all knew it would.

He thought he had now gone through all the subjects on which he wished to touch. He was afraid he had wearied the House by so much detail; but he wished the Committee to test everything he had done. He had done nothing for concealment—all was as open as the day. If the House of Commons voted anything he asked they should do it with their eyes open. What he asked them was to pursue a system the expense of which he did not say they had seen the end. It would be large; but its object was to render every branch of the Service efficient. To improve the contentment of the Army, to prevent desertion, to improve their reliefs for India, and to prepare here in case of danger a certain number of regiments always ready, were the first objects he had in view. All this he had done with no offensive intention to any foreign Power; on the contrary, with a great desire to preserve peace, but with a great desire, too, that England should be known not to be giving up the position to which she was entitled in Europe and in respect of her colonial possessions. They claimed the right, without insult or threatening to foreign nations, to bring into as good a condition as possible their Volunteer Army, and so to prepare for the defence of their country, of their colonies, and of India, and for the fulfilment of any Treaty or other obligations that they might be called upon to recognize. They wished to be able to say to all the world that without excessive expenditure England would never be wanting in that due expenditure which would make her armies as efficient as they had been in times past; that they would not be sent forth merely to earn a transitory and temporary glory, but to do their duty to a country the stability of which interested not only herself, but all the world. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Vote for 132,884 men.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 132,884, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and for Depôts for the training of Recruits for Service at Home and Abroad, including Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive.”

MR. PEASE expressed his regret that so few Members were in the House when the right hon. Gentleman rose to make his Statement. There were at the outset but seven Members at the right hon. Gentleman's side of the Table, and not more than double the number on the other side. It was due to the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had never listened to a more able or interesting statement, and he deserved the thanks of the Committee for the manner in which the Estimates had been prepared, and the digests which had been furnished. The right hon. Gentleman had proposed a large increase in the number of men for the Army, and a correspondingly large increase in the money for their maintenance. He told them at the close of his speech that this increase was needed to guard against panic, to guard against invasion, to relieve our Army abroad, and to keep up the honour and dignity of the country. For these purposes he asked for a force of 526,000 men, the largest force that this country had ever been asked for at any time, and was certainly, in his opinion, larger than the country required. In 1873, the last year of Lord Cardwell's administration, the cost of the Army was £13,231,100; in 1874 it was £13,293,800; in 1875, £13,489,200; and now, in 1876, it had risen to £13,989,000, being an increase in three years of £750,000, while the Army Appropriation Accounts had not yet been laid upon the Table. The Army Estimates having increased by £750,000, the Navy Estimates had also gone up £1,500,000 during the same time, besides a deficit of £281,000 in the Navy Appropriation Accounts, being altogether an increase in these two Services of £2,400,000. At present it appeared that there were 95,000 regular troops at home, besides 30,000 of the reserved forces, and the Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry were all declared to be in an efficient and satisfactory state. For what was all this money to be spent? To guard against panic, to prevent invasion, and to sustain the honour and dignity of the country. Taking the panic argument first, he would ask what was a panic? It was, he believed, a sudden fright. Well, we had several panics of late years. We had one in 1858-9 when the French officers were denouncing this country for having given an asylum to political refugees. That panic brought into existence an army of Volunteers amounting to 180,000 men. But the panic was groundless. We had lived to see the Emperor Napoleon, then upon the Throne of France, a refugee in this country, and his son was lately a cadet at Woolwich. In 1858-9 there was another panic, in consequence of the taking of several persons from under the protection of the British flag on board one of our vessels. The Government sent 10,000 men to Canada to overawe the United States, which had 800,000 men ready shortly afterwards. Well, the presence of the Volunteers did not allay the panic. Another panic occurred at the outbreak of the Franco-German War, when Lord Cardwell asked the House to vote £2,000,000, and to increase the Army by 20,000 men, who still remained on the Army List. The argument now was that the Army was to preserve us from invasion. He confessed he looked around in vain to discover from what quarter we were to be invaded. Her Majesty, in her Speech from the Throne, spoke of her relations with foreign Powers as being "most cordial;" and yet the way in which we repaid our neighbours for their friendliness was to propose an increase of our Army to guard against invasion, which was, under the circumstances, an insult to the Powers with whom we were on such cordial relations. There were only three or four Powers in the world from whom an invasion could be, with any possibility, expected—Germany, France, Russia, and America. The last two might be left out of the calculation entirely. France and Germany were armed to the teeth against each other—one to retain the provinces she wrested from France during the war, the other to regain those provinces whenever they thought they were strong enough to make the attempt. There was not the slightest possibility of our being invaded by either country while such was their attitude to each other. He would add that France and Germany should be a warning to us against large armies and huge armaments. As regarded this country, the panic argument and the invasion argument fell together. There never was a time when, apparently, we were more free from attack and when our diplomatic intercourse was carried on in a more conciliatory spirit. With respect to the relief of our Army abroad, Lord Cardwell was quite satisfied with a smaller Army at home for that purpose, and the requirements then were the same as they were now. The honour and dignity of the country were not consulted by maintaining unnecessary armaments in time of peace. By so doing we were acting in violation of the teaching of political economy, and we were inflicting upon our population the evils of war in time of peace. An Army expenditure of £15,000,000 was an insurance premium out of all proportion to the risk we were running. We were asked to spend £1,000,000 more than last year and £2,400,000 more than four years ago, and that at a time when the state of trade made it absolutely necessary we should economize. A Liverpool merchant said the other day—"Two years ago we were living on faith, last year we were living on hope, and this year we are living on charity." At the same time, while trade was falling off and the country approaching a state of stagnation, the requirements of modern society were largely augmenting local burdens concurrently with this increase of Imperial taxation. The demand for public education, for the Poor Law administration, for lunacy boards, and for sanitary boards was yearly increasing, and he said the country could not afford at the same time to spend in a time of peace such large amounts upon an Army far larger than we required. He proposed to reduce the Army by 10,000 men. The right hon. Gentleman had confessed that he had a great many men whom he would like to get rid of, and that he would be glad to obtain the services of a better class. Then why did he not get rid of the objectionable men? But what was the right hon. Gentleman doing? Why he was raising the pay of the men. It seemed to him that when doing so he was bound to reduce the number. He had come to the conclusion that whether they looked at the state of things abroad or at home they were not justified in voting these large Estimates. Perhaps the great majority of the Committee would be against him—still he felt bound, on behalf of his constituents and the country, to raise his voice against this extravagant expenditure, and which was not needed, looking at the state of the country or at the state of Europe.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 122,884, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and for Dépôts for the training of Recruits for Service at Home and Abroad, including Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."—(Mr. Pease.)

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, it was all very well for the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), who felt all the comforts of peace, to make such a Motion; but the old adage still held good—the best way of maintaining peace was to be prepared for war. The hon. Member proposed to reduce the Vote by 10,000 men. Would he say from what branch of the Army they were to be taken? Was it from the Infantry, from the Cavalry, or from the Artillery? That question had been formerly pressed upon the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who was obliged to admit that he had not considered it, and the hon. Member for South Durham seemed to be in the same position. The speech of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was one that would do him credit not only with the Army, but also with the country. He had clearly stated the views for an expression of which they had been looking forward for some time past. He said the other night he was determined to do away with that feeling of anxiety with regard to the Army which caused men to say they did not know what would happen next; and he (Sir Walter Barttelot) hoped he had gone far towards removing that feeling. He had determined that the deficiency in the number of medical officers should no longer exist, and he had laid down principles which would obviate the scandal that in the absence of candidates the authorities had been compelled to accept the services of men they had formerly rejected. That was most lamentable, and it was not fair to the Army. The new scheme of his right hon. Friend he hoped would have the effect of preventing the recurrence of such a state of things. The scheme was a fair and a liberal one, and he hoped the medical profession in the Army would be satisfied, though whether it was the best or not he would not now argue. One of the questions in which the House was most deeply interested was that of the Reserves. The whole case of the noble Lord who brought in the short service rested on the Reserves. Had matters gone on as they were now, he felt certain the Army of Reserve when called out would not have been found. But by increasing their pay from 4*d.* to 6*d.*, and by allowing deferred pay to accumulate for men now serving and to serve in the ranks, they had now a chance of getting that Reserve which the country wanted in case of emergency. There was one point here, however, on which more explanation was required. His right hon. Friend said those Reserves were to be called out for a certain period every year. The time now was only 12 days, and that time might well be increased; but, if the men were found up to the mark, they need not be kept out. They might be dismissed to their homes as soon as they were pronounced efficient. There was one point which his right hon. Friend had missed altogether, and that was with regard to forage allowance to Field Officers. He said forage was never so high as at the present moment, and he was now giving a Field Officer 1*s.* 10*d.* a-day for forage, but it could not be bought for the money now given. The increase of pay to non-commissioned officers was one of the best things proposed by his right hon. Friend. It would give universal satisfaction to that class of men who were, in fact, the backbone of the regiment. He did not think his right hon. Friend had increased their pay too much; but the increase was fair and liberal, and he believed the non-commissioned officers of the Army would feel that tardy justice had at length been done to them. He did not observe from the Estimates that his right hon. Friend had dealt with a grievance which was felt from the want of room in the Royal Academy at Woolwich. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said he had.] He was very glad to hear it. It was not right that four cadets—young fellows who might be from Eton, where they each had a separate room—should be placed in one room. That was an evil that ought to be remedied. He was also glad to learn—although upon this point it would be premature to express any definite opinion—that his right hon. Friend intended to call out two Army Corps; the whole country would then know what the mobilization scheme was, and could judge what its effect would be. On one important point his right hon. Friend did not touch, except in an indirect manner—namely, the arming of our soldiers. The Martini-Henry rifle was, no doubt, a weapon wonderful in its performance when in good order; but when he asked the Surveyor General, year after year, how that weapon was going on, the reply always was it required a little repair, and that 2*s.* 11*d.* would cover the whole expense. That little alteration, however, would require an expenditure of £75,000. In the Malay expedition it had not answered the expectations of the officers. It had a trick sometimes of not going off when required, and also of going off when not required. This subject required careful consideration from the authorities. The spiral spring in the lock, which was apt to become loose or rusty, was, he thought, fatal to this weapon. But having once been adopted, it was rather difficult to get rid of. For himself, he would say he would rather to-morrow go into action with the old Snider rifle than with the Martini-Henry rifle. Our soldiers should be armed with the best weapon we could find. He hoped his right hon. Friend would look closely and fairly into this matter. They must all have admired the clear, able, and straightforward manner in which he had brought forward these Estimates, and he was quite sure he would do nothing which he did not believe would conduce to the best interests of the Army and the country.

Mr. Pease

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he would add his testimony to what had been said in praise of the very full, clear, and candid statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He only regretted that it was delivered at a time when so few Members were present to hear it. The principal measures which the right hon. Gentleman had brought before them were the additional pay to the non-commissioned officers, the grant of increased pay in the shape of deferred pay to the entire Army, and a slight increase of pay to the Guards. With regard to the first, he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman had seen his way to propose it. Three years ago, when a small addition was made to the pay of the Army at the time that the ration stoppage was abolished, the late Secretary of State had it in contemplation to improve the position of the non-commissioned officers; and it was his intention to apply to this purpose the balance of the sum which would ultimately be saved by the lapse of the re-engagement penny—the part of that sum which had already accrued having been taken to the credit of the stoppage arrangement. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) mentioned that, not in the least by way of detracting from the credit due to the right hon. Gentleman, but only to show how sincerely he could express his agreement in the policy the right hon. Gentleman was pursuing. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) trusted it might have the effect he contemplated—of increasing the attractiveness of the Army—and he would congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having his name associated with so useful an improvement. As to deferred pay, no doubt there was a great deal to be said in favour of the theory; but there were two considerations, which he would urge as having some weight on the other side. In the first place, were they sure that the men to whom they would offer it would understand and appreciate it? The men knew what it was to get money in their hand, and sometimes, unhappily, made a bad use of it; but would they appreciate the fact, and would it have the effect we expected if they knew, that at the end of their service a certain sum would accrue to them? Another point was—it was one of the advantages of deferred payment that it gave us a certain hold over the men. That particularly applied to the Reserve. If a man knew that at the end of his term of service he would, if he conducted himself well, be discharged with a certain sum of money in his pocket, we should have a hold on him which we had not at present; but we could not have a hold upon him without, to some extent, his having a corresponding hold on us; and he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) thought that difficulties might arise in some cases in consequence of a man's conduct, near the period when a large sum of money would be due to him, being such as to render it undesirable that he should be retained. Difficulties of that kind occurred in the case of an established workman who was going on pension, with whom we could not deal so freely as with a man hired in the open market. This objection, however, to deferred pay was not an insurmountable one. As to the additional penny which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give to the Guards, was he quite sure that it would cure the evils from which they suffered? The Guards had a stock fund, which had been abolished in other regiments, into which payments were made by the public, and with which they conducted their own hospital arrangements and recruiting. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) wished to know whether the inquiry which had been instituted into that anomalous system had been continued; and also whether explicit instructions had been given to the Colonels of districts to give every facility in their power to the recruiting of the Guards? It was quite true the Guards had to keep themselves in a smarter condition than the rest of the Army; but surely their recruiting ought to be assisted by their prestige and by the fact that they had the very best quarters in the Army; and he was disposed to believe that if recruits were not obtained in sufficient numbers for the Guards, it was not so much owing to inadequacy of pay as to the fact that they were shut out from the benefit of the general recruiting machinery of the Army, and especially from the district recruiting. He thought no objection could be made to the proposition to give an addition of £2 a-year to the Army Reserve, because the better we made their condition the stronger would be the call we should have upon them. He did not think they should be called out for more than 12 days, because otherwise we should seriously interfere with their civil employment. We called them out, not so much for the purpose of drilling, as to see them assemble and ascertain their condition. He had little to say as to the mobilization scheme. The right hon. Gentleman had bestowed great labour upon it. It might be necessary for the military authorities to know where each regiment of the Militia and the Line should go on the outbreak of war; but why should the information be published on the house-tops? He did not see any particular advantage in every man in every regiment in the country knowing where he should go. It appeared to him that all that was required was that the authorities in the War Office should know where a regiment should be ordered to go, and have their plans ready for execution at a moment's notice. What was said as to the general condition of the Army, he thought, must be satisfactory to everybody. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to him to take precisely the right line with regard to the condition of the Army. He was neither too sanguine in his estimate of it nor did he yield to those exaggerated criticisms which were common out of doors. As to the proposition made by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Pease) to reduce the number of men by 10,000, it did not appear why his hon. Friend had selected that number; indeed, his argument was almost in favour of disbanding the Army altogether. Her Majesty's Government must know better than the House or any private individual what was the state of political affairs; and therefore he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) felt very much disposed to bow to their opinion as to the number of men that ought to be voted. There was only one other subject to which he wished to allude—namely, the medical department of the Army. Nothing had delighted him more for many a day than the decided tone in which the right hon. Gentleman had spoken on the general hospital system of the medical department; and notwithstanding the pressure that had been brought to bear upon the right hon. Gentleman, he felt sure that the more he looked into the question and consulted the competent authorities, the more he would see the absolute necessity of the Staff system. His proposals for improving the position of the medical officers appeared to be excellent. One suggestion which he would venture to make, with a view, not, perhaps, to its immediate, but its ultimate adoption, was that the medical officers who went out of the Service after 10 years might be employed for the Militia and the Brigade Dépôts, whereby, while discharging those duties, they would have the opportunity of settling in practice in a country town. In referring to the medical department the right hon. Gentleman expressed the opinion—which it was to be hoped he would bear in mind in connection with the greater questions of Army promotion and retirement—that it was dangerous to enter a great number of young men at the bottom, because they would have to provide for them when they attained higher rank. That was a consideration which lay at the basis of all sound schemes of promotion and retirement.

COLONEL NAGHTEN offered some suggestions in regard to recruiting. He recommended, among other things, that after serving three years in the Militia any man who wished to join the Regular Army should have his bounty paid to him partly on joining the Regular service, and partly on completing the period which he would have completed if he had remained in the Militia. He also thought that, instead of enlisting immature youths in the Army, it would be better to enlist them in the Militia even under the present standard; and then three years afterwards, when they had developed considerably, they would be fit as well as pleased to join the Regular Army as grown men, and would have a liking for the Service. In his opinion, the Militia ought to be made more a nursery for the Regular Army than it was now. He thought it would be well to remodel the Ballot Act so that it might be used, if required, and in the meantime to do everything possible to encourage men to go into the ranks.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he hoped that although it was a Colonels' night a few words from a civilian would not be unacceptable to the House. He recognized the difficulty of the position in which an English Minister of War was placed. By means of conscription vast armies were being organized on the Continent of Europe, and industry and trade were crushed under overwhelming armaments. The question was, whether England was to obey her peaceful instincts, or take part in the mad competition for inflated armies? As a compromise, we were making a halting step towards adopting the new system; but there was this difficulty to face, and he had not yet heard any one attempt to grapple with it. If England was to take part in that wild struggle for military supremacy, what was to be her position as an industrial country? He could understand that the Secretary for War, in view of the great military strength of continental Powers, had a patriotic desire not to see his country altogether unprepared for the possibilities of an evil day; but it was idle to pretend that if England had to encounter the armies of the Continent it was merely upon her military strength that she could rely. With regard to the mobilization scheme, he might observe that the Irish Militia were singularly neglected, and whether that circumstance was due to political considerations, or the mere accidents of military strategy, he had yet to be informed. However that might be, the foreigner who criticized our new military system would be at no loss to notice that in Ireland, once our best recruiting ground, not one of the native Militia regiments was to form part of the local Army Corps. It was all very well for a Minister to pet certain classes of people in the country; but in the end the people themselves would turn upon the system under which the process was carried on. Underlying the whole subject before the House there was the great question—How were we to get men? One thing he could tell the Secretary for War was that branding in the Army would not help him to get recruits—it would, at all events, not help him to get recruits in Ireland. It was a painful fact that while they were adding to the Army at one end it was falling away at the other; desertion, in fact, was nearly keeping pace with recruitment. But it was not from an exclusively military view that this subject was to be regarded, and he invited the Committee to inquire how it was, after all that had been done to increase the comfort of the Army, that we found it harder to get soldiers to-day than 50 years ago, even although the requirements of height and physical development had been gradually lowered. What had become of the splendid material that fought the British battles 40 or 50 years ago? How came it to pass that it was so difficult to recruit now as compared with former times? It was because the rural population of the country had disappeared into the large cities and towns, and because the conditions of life, the sanitary conditions of the humbler classes, were not conducive to the production of a military race. He made no reflection on the men of the cities and towns; many of the greatest battles in the world were fought and won by them, and the Royalist forces were defeated by the Parliamentarians. Nevertheless, it was only in the green fields and the cottage homes of the country that stalwart class of men could be produced. How came it that they were gone? It was because in England, as well as in Ireland, within the last 50 years a terrific revolution had swept the people from the fields into cities and towns. This great change had not been so much felt in England, which had big towns like London, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and Birmingham; but in Ireland the change had been keenly felt, because they had no Manchesters and no Birminghams to absorb the thrust out population. In Ireland what were the chances of recruitment? While the whole population were in a state of discontent and dissatisfaction they need not expect their chances as to recruitment to improve in Ireland. He knew something of his people, and he knew something of the excitement among them whenever a great military question arose. They knew they were not trusted by the Minister for War, because there was no Volunteer force in Ireland. The best military strength that they could supply would be to satisfy the Irish people and make the military service popular in Ireland. They could not get what they wanted by offering 2*d.* more a-day, and he said to the Government—"Do not think that Irishmen, at all events, are to be won merely by 1½*d.* or 2*d.*, with the advantage of branding into the bargain." If they had to call on the arm of Ireland for aid or defence, it could not be given while the people entertained their present feelings; and, without any reference to a question of money, the sense of national honour and duty would induce them not to enter in any considerable numbers into the military strength of the Empire.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. He had had several Irishmen under his command, and he was very much pleased with them, and he believed that they were well pleased with him. He would not wish to have better soldiers than Irishmen. It was said that grumbling had made England the country that she was; and if grumbling could do anything for the Army it would be one of the greatest armies going. It was, so far as he could see, in anything but a bad way, and he thought the changes now proposed by the Government would be great improvements. He was particularly gratified at the increase of the pay of non-commissioned officers, and he should like that those of them who had been a certain time in the Army should have a pension. It was said that England was at peace with all the world; but she was never absolutely at peace, and within the last six months had been on the point of war with China and Burmah. An immense country like ours must always expect to have some little or great war on hand, and we ought to be prepared for any emergency which might arise.

MR. J. HOLMS said, that as it was desirable to have further time to consider the very important statement of the Secretary for War, and also the important Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), he should move that the Chairman be ordered to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Holms.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he hoped the Committee would grant a Vote for the men that night. The information which had been in the hands of hon. Members was very full, and was quite a guide to them; and therefore he could not see that there was any ground for stopping the discussion at that hour—half-past 11 o'clock. If the Committee came to a conclusion that night it would enable the House to go on with the Mutiny Act, which was this year important in connection with some questions affecting the Militia.

MR. WHALLEY supported the Motion to report Progress, on the ground that the hon. Member for Hackney, who had been so frequently referred to in the course of the debate, was entitled to get time to consider his reply. He complained that the Secretary for War had omitted all reference to the Volunteers, upon whom the country must rely for its defence, and declared that nature was against the maintenance of a standing Army in England. The speech of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) was well worthy of consideration. It showed that there was an enemy in the very citadel. He was reminded of what the Duke of Wellington once said, that he would not have Roman Catholics in the Royal Artillery or Engineers, simply because of their uncertain allegiance. The older Members of that House had been striving to conciliate by civil means, and also by religious concessions, that particular section of the community, and yet they were now told there was discontent.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that it is not considered a convenient course to discuss the main Question in detail on a Motion to report Progress.

MR. WHALLEY said, what he had stated was only by way of parenthesis.

He was quoting the authority of the Duke of Wellington. How could an Army be relied upon that numbered so many in its ranks who did not recognize the supremacy of the Sovereign?

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought that it would save time by reporting Progress at once, because it was quite evident there were so many Members who desired to address the Committee that the Vote could not be taken to-night. He might say, at the same time, that nearly all the proposals of the Secretary for War, being in his opinion reforms, would have his support, though other important subjects had been raised which required most careful consideration, and he certainly could not agree in the proposal to increase the number of men.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought it was hardly possible to take the Vote to-night. It was always understood that the discussion on the first Vote extended over a wide range of subjects; and he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman would wish to limit a preliminary discussion which would, perhaps, facilitate the progress of the remaining Votes.

MR. DISRAELI consented to postpone the Vote till Monday, when the Committee would be taken as the first business.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

COUNCIL OF INDIA (PROFESSIONAL APPOINTMENTS) BILL.—[BILL 69.]

(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move "That it is inexpedient to pass this Bill, as it would throw an additional and unnecessary charge on the Revenues of India," said, they had heard of a horse being re-sold with his colour changed, and that transaction represented with considerable accuracy what had been done with that Bill. On the 25th February last year a Bill entitled "The East India Home Government (Pensions) Bill" was introduced. That Bill passed its third reading, and at the very last moment the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) discovered that it was so badly drawn and its real nature so little understood that he got it postponed till the following Thursday. It was then re-committed, but finally withdrawn. It appeared again in July last in a new form and with a new title—"The East India Home Government (Appointments) Bill," and it now came before them as the Council of India (Professional Appointments) Bill. He would put a difficult question to the Government, What was the reason of all those ungracious devices? Why this indecent haste to give pensions to men who were not entitled to them? Those were plain questions, and he hoped the House would support him in opposing the Bill. It was difficult to say what the Bill would do and what it would not do. In 1869 a Bill was introduced in this House, and passed through both Houses, providing for appointments to the Council of India, and the provision being large during the tenure of office, that no person should be entitled to a pension, even if his office were abolished. And that Act further provided that no man should hold the office beyond a certain number of years. Notwithstanding, that Bill was brought in to give pensions to members of the Council who were appointed under the Act of 1869, and it would contravene that Act if the House allowed it to pass. The appointments under the Act of 1869 had been eagerly sought for; and he must say that the course now proposed was most undignified. If a Cabinet Minister went out of office he was not entitled to a pension, and yet this Bill proposed to give pensions to men who took office on the express condition that they were not to be entitled to retiring pensions. If we were so careless about granting pensions in India, and so indifferent to the extravagant expenditure of the government there, what would the people of that country think of our guardianship of their interests? They would not be mollified by the association of their country with the Imperial titles of the Sovereign. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Fawcett

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to pass this Bill, as it would throw an additional and unnecessary charge on the Revenues of India,"—(Mr. Fawcett.)

—instead thereof.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the hon. Member for Hackney was mistaken in supposing that the Bill introduced in July last was the same as that brought in last February. It was quite different, and only withdrawn because it was thought that the Treasury would be embarrassed by the interpretation which it placed upon the Superannuation Act. The Bill had now been introduced in order to secure the services of the best possible men on the Indian Council. There was no difficulty in getting old Indians to join the Indian Council, because they came home with pensions, and, added to that, £1,200 a-year for 10 years as members of the Council. But there was a difficulty in getting gentlemen of legal attainments not old Indians to come on the Council, because only £1,200 could be offered to them for 10 years, with no pension. The Bill, therefore, simply proposed that the Secretary of State for India should have power to appoint certain gentlemen of professional attainments for 15 years, with pensions of £500 after 10 years' service, and it was believed that this was the cheapest way of obtaining legal advice. With respect to the increase of the home expenditure for India, no doubt that had been very large since 1857-8 up to the present time, but the whole of that increase was for the purposes of the Government in India, and if the Indian Office here was abolished to-morrow, these charges on the revenue of India would remain for purely Indian purposes. The guaranteed interest on railways was a very large item. The interest on the Debt had increased from £670,000 in 1856-7 to £2,300,000, owing to the expenditure necessary to put down the Indian Mutiny. The charge for stores was also high; and so long as stores could be obtained cheaper in England than in India he trusted they would always be procured at home. There was, however, one item of cost which the Indian Government could control, and that was the charge for administration, which exhibited a decrease, although the work had increased enormously. In our department only the number of despatches had increased eightfold during the last 20 years. In 1856-7 the cost of the Home administration was £179,849; but although there had been a vast increase in the duties performed, the cost was, in 1870, £177,000, or a decrease of £2,000. There was, perhaps, no Department of the State in which the work had increased so much with so little corresponding increase of expenditure. In 1856-7 the law charges of the East India Company amounted to upwards of £19,000, because they had no lawyers upon their establishment, while last year the law charges of the India Office were only £2,500. If the hon. Member for Hackney was successful in throwing out this Bill, he would not only prevent the Secretary of State from obtaining that assistance which he believed to be necessary, but would unquestionably, in the long run, throw heavy additional charges on the revenues of India.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, no doubt it was desirable there should be some legal element in the Council, although he would deprecate the introduction of too many lawyers, and especially of lawyers as distinguished from juriconsults. It was of enormous importance that the Secretary of State for India, who was more uncontrolled than any other Minister, should have the most eminent men upon his Council, and a trumpery pension of £500 a-year was a mere drop in the ocean by comparison. There were men of great weight and value now on the Council, who would not have taken office on the reduced terms. He had himself been appointed to a place in the Council, and possibly, if the terms had been the same as they were prior to the Act of 1869, he might never have left it. He found, however, that if he chanced to live 10 years he should be thrown out of the Council without a profession and without pension, and he resigned this precarious situation. His experience thus showed that there were cases in which the inducements of a seat in the Council were not such as to lead men of very humble pretensions to care to retain it. On the other hand, he regretted that matters of this importance should be dealt with by patchwork legislation. He thought that the whole constitution of the Home Government of India should be overhauled and re-considered.

VOL. CCXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. HARDCASTLE wished to know whether, under the provisions of this Bill, those merchants who were members of the Indian Council would receive pensions?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, such was not the intention of the Bill.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he thought the Government had done good service in bringing in the measure, which he considered would be a great advantage to India and a great gain in the way of economy.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that he should feel it his duty to oppose any Bill which would cause further increase of expenses.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that he should support the Bill, which was carefully limited for the advantage of those persons who were specified.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 41: Majority 110.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

MERCHANT SHIPPING [SALARIES, &c.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

The House divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 34: Majority 37.

MATTER considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Salaries of all Surveyors appointed under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and of the Expenses connected with the Survey and Measurement of Ships, and of the Salaries and Expenses of Persons employed under the Passengers Act, 1855, and of the Salaries and Remuneration of all Officers that may be appointed under any Act of the present Session for amending the Merchant Shipping Acts, and of all Costs and Compensation payable by the Board of Trade in pursuance of such Act.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND) BILL

On Motion of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bill to amend the Acts relating to Cattle Disease in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir

MICHAEL HICKS-BRACH and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 94.]

PROTECTION TO GROWING CROPS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Bill to enable the Tenants of Arable Farms in Scotland to protect their growing crops from injury by Hares and Rabbits, ordered to be brought in by Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, Viscount MACDUFF, and Sir WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 95.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 3rd March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Marriages (St. James, Buxton) * (22).
Committee—Appellate Jurisdiction? (5-23).

MALAY PENINSULA.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY rose, in accordance with a private Notice which he had given to the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies, because, notwithstanding his reply to the noble Earl's speech on Monday last, the Press had given credence to the statements made by the noble Earl which he then contradicted. He desired to set right a matter which the noble Earl was led to misrepresent to their Lordships and to the country as to what he said on the occasion of the discussion which took place on Monday night, and which the noble Earl represented as an attack on Her Majesty's Army. The only allusion he made to persons bearing arms in the suppression of the disturbances in the Peninsula was to the comments of two Straits newspapers on the acts of some Arabs under the orders of a civil official of the Straits Government—a medley of all nations described in the last number of The London and China Telegraph as "the sweepings of the Singapore gaol." They were headed by a French Canadian, who was a caretaker in one of the Singapore light-houses. Their Lordships would admit that reflections on the conduct of this peculiar corps in no way touched or affected the credit of the British Army.

Moreover, his appeal to the memory and celebrated protest of Lord Chatham, and the noble Earl's knowledge of history, should have convinced him that he was not speaking of Her Majesty's regiments—otherwise to name Lord Chatham's protest against the employment of Red Indians would have had no sense. If any imputation was made—if any aspersion was cast upon the British Army—it was by the noble Earl himself, who in his speech had brigaded these ruffians, and associated these brigands with the Queen's troops. He would also observe that there was no probability that while attacking the noble Earl's conduct of affairs he should go out of his way to attack Her Majesty's Army, considering the scrupulous care he had always given to the interests of the Army in all military questions that had come before the House. If their Lordships' debates took place with closed doors, it would be a matter of indifference to him that any noble Lord, in order to avoid giving him an answer, should make a "Rule Britannia" speech and raise a false issue of an attack upon the Army to distract attention from the main question, because he could have relied upon their Lordships' judgment, which would have discerned the weakness of a case which required bolstering up by such rhetorical artifices. But it was different when an attack upon Her Majesty's Army was wrongfully attributed to him, and such an imputation was dispersed over the country; and he could not sit down patiently under it. He did not accuse the noble Earl of resorting to the rhetorical artifice of answering what had not been said in order to gain an advantage in debate; but now that the advantage—perhaps only a temporary advantage, had been gained—he did rely on the noble Earl's sense of justice to retract the imputation in such manner as fully to exonerate him in the estimation of the Army.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he hardly knew what object the noble Lord had in view in reviving, under the form of a "personal explanation," the discussion which he initiated on Monday night. The "personal explanation" of the noble Lord was simply an attack on him for a reply he made to a very vehement speech delivered by the noble Lord. He was sure that if the noble

Lord wished to express some regret for the language he had allowed himself to use in reference to the operations of Her Majesty's troops in the Malay Peninsula, the House would be prepared to listen to it; but if the noble Lord asked him to retract anything he had said in reply to that language, then, however anxious he might be to gratify the noble Lord, he felt unable to make such retraction. What the noble Lord said on Monday would be in the recollection of their Lordships. He spoke of the various military operations which had been carried out in the Malay Peninsula, and spoke of them as having been characterized by burnings, devastations, and considerable excesses. He spoke of the operations in three different parts of the Peninsula; and as the Natives were employed in one only, certainly the inference he drew was that the accusations made by the noble Lord applied to Her Majesty's troops as well as to the Natives. He thought that was not an unnatural inference. The noble Lord's language was so understood even by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), who felt obliged to rise and express his opinion on the subject. The inference he drew, therefore, was not unreasonable, even though the noble Lord, on consideration, might like to rise and qualify what he had said. He did not object to the noble Lord doing that; but he did not hold that he (the Earl of Carnarvon) was to blame in the matter, inasmuch as he had only placed a reasonable construction on the noble Lord's language. With regard to the detachment of Natives which the noble Lord had likened to the Red Indians employed in America in Chatham's time, no doubt that was a detachment of Native Irregulars; but if a body of that kind was kept in hand, there was no objection to its employment. This particular force was employed at a critical moment, when the services of every available man were desirable; but Sir William Jervois gave a caution to the officer in command to hold them well in hand. After the operations the detachment was praised by the Civil Commissioner in charge of the district; and for himself he could now say that, having looked through all the official Papers, he could find no case of excess or barbarity alleged against it. It was impossible to prove a negative, but all that the official Papers recorded of that detachment was to its praise. But granted that the noble Lord's language of Monday last was applied to the Natives and not to Her Majesty's troops, was there not something unfair and unjust in singling out for this accusation a detachment that was composed of men of a different race? He regretted that, under the shelter of a personal explanation, the noble Lord should repeat charges so utterly without foundation and so utterly unjustifiable.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 5.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

LORD REDESDALE said, that the abolition of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House proposed in the legislation of 1873 had caused general dissatisfaction in Scotland and Ireland. That fact made people in this country reflect, and the result was that by 1875 it had become evident that the opinion of the English Bar and the opinion of the Imperial Parliament had changed. The consequence was the Bill now before their Lordships; and by its introduction he was fully justified in the course he had pursued throughout. There had been a great deal of misrepresentation with regard to the provisions of the Bill, and it was said that the introduction of the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary would so modify the constitution of the tribunal that it would no longer be possible to speak of "the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords." For himself, he was generally satisfied with the proposals of the Bill. He believed that there was nothing in the Bill which would render the House of Lords a less efficient Tribunal of Ultimate Appeal than it had hitherto been. The Peerage which it would introduce was not, as some persons erroneously supposed, a life Peerage; it was an official Peerage, analogous to that which, in the case of the Bishops, had been known to the Constitution from a very early period, and gave to the law a similar representation in the House to that which the Church had so long enjoyed. He did not mean to say that it would not be very inconvenient to have a great number of official Peerages; but the number to be created under the Bill was limited to four, with large salaries, which would render further increase impossible. It was urged by way of objection that on ceasing to hold office the Lords of Appeal would lose their privilege of sitting and voting in that House, though they would still retain the title of Baron. But this was not new, because if a Scotch Peer who sat in their Lordships' House during one Parliament was not re-elected as a Representative Peer in the next Parliament, he lost his privilege of sitting and voting, though he remained a Peer in every other respect. He need scarcely remind their Lordships that the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or the Lord Keeper was President of that House ex officio and took his seat on the Woolsack as President although not a Peer. As to the tribunal being no longer the House of Lords, he contended that it would continue to be so under the Bill. For a long time the Lay Lords had not interfered in judicial proceedings; in other words, the House had, with most commendable good sense, accepted the decision of the Law Lords, who alone were competent to advise in such matters. That was just what he trusted the House would continue to do under this Bill. He hoped the measure would be received with general assent.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Form of Appeal to House of Lords).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved the omission of the words "under this Act," which were used with reference to appeals, and said he proposed that the same words should be struck out in subsequent clauses were used in relation to appeals.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clause 5 (Attendance of certain number of Lords of Appeal required at hearing determination of appeals) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Appointment of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary by Her Majesty).

Lord Redesdale

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK wished to offer some observations upon the Bill, particularly in reference to the interests of Scotland. In that country it would give great and general satisfaction that a new and definite tribunal should be established and recognized as the last Court of Appeal identical with and included within the foundation of the House of Lords. The provisions of that Bill would be very acceptable to Scotland. The term of "the House of Lords" commanded a degree of respect which would not be accorded to any other designation. The House, indeed, stood in the place of the ancient Parliament of Scotland, and in their Lordships' House, by usage, if not by actual judicial functions, the whole of the ancient laws of Scotland were perpetuated and reproduced. It might be said, indeed, that this was a matter of sentiment; but sentiment in matters of this nature was not altogether to be disapproved, and there was no country in the world in which traditional jurisdictions were more respected and preserved than among the people of Scotland. Then, the special provisions introduced to strengthen the judicial faculty of the House were equally acceptable in Scotland. The Lords of Appeal were appropriated exclusively to service in this House and in the Privy Council. They did not in any way resemble a Court in Westminster Hall, and therefore did not offend the letter or the spirit of the Treaty of Union. Under the provisions of the Act, a Judge of the Court of Session could be created a life Peer and a Lord of Appeal, and he could sit in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, from which he was before excluded. So much was gained, and the Scotch owed a debt of gratitude to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. That provision of the Bill, however, which made a practical advocate of 15 years standing qualified to be a Lord of Appeal seemed objectionable. It was to be supposed that the selection would be invariably fall to some Scottish Judge of the highest judicial eminence; but the fact of 15 years standing being deemed sufficient to qualify was of itself calculated to lower the dignity of the office. Moreover, as a Scotch advocate had few means of obtaining legal experience except in Scotch Courts, he thought there would be found few, or none, at the Scotch Bar really qualified for so high a position.

If any member of the Scotch Bar should happen to be appointed, the appointment would be immediately attributed to political partizanship. At the same time, he thought the Bill would be highly acceptable to the people of Scotland, and he tendered his thanks to the Lord Chancellor and the Government on their behalf for its introduction. He now came to the second part of his observations, which were perhaps the more important of the two. The present constitution of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council contained all the elements of an excellent Court of Appeal, and for that they had the authority of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Hatherley). It contained four paid members, whose exclusive services in the Court were secured, since they were to vacate any other judicial appointment on nomination. They were sufficiently remunerated and pensioned to command high ability. They were, or they might be, specially qualified, for the mere fact of having been Chief Justice in one of the three Indian Presidencies entitled a person to hold the appointment. Now, how would the Court be eventually constituted under this Act? It failed in two of the elements referred to. There would be still four paid members in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, including the four Lords of Appeal in the House of Lords; but their services were not secured to the Privy Council, they would have their duties in the House of Lords; and the performance of their duties in the Judicial Committee were specially subordinated to the performance of their appeal duties here. They were first Lords of Appeal and secondly Judges in the Privy Council, which had only a claim on the residuum of their ability. Under the new Bill the Committee would not possess the special qualifications desirable. The four paid members of the Court of Appeal would probably be the acting and working members of the Judicial Committee; but the Indian Judges could not become Lords of Appeal; the definition of "high Judicial Officers" did not include them. They were not likely to get there by their qualification of 15 years standing. They were, therefore, practically excluded. This was very objectionable. The tribunal of Indian appeal should certainly be one which would possess the confidence of our Indian fellow-subjects.

But it might be said that the Indian Judges could sit and serve in the Judicial Committee without being Lords of Appeal. They might be appointed Members of the Privy Council and then of the Judicial Committee, and their services in that Committee remunerated by a moderate allowance in addition to their pensions. Well, although this might be an encouragement, it was no security. These retired Judges were only volunteers, and their remuneration insignificant. Besides, you only secured retired Judges in this way; you did not secure Judges in the prime of life and strength. But by having paid Members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council solely appropriated to do that duty, you secured everybody. He could not but think that this was an unfortunate feature of the Bill, and that for the interests of India it would have been better to have preserved the two Courts distinct—one for the United Kingdom, the other for the Colonies, or at least for India. But if this was impossible with a view to uniformity of decision, then it would at least be desirable to make the Indian Chief Justiceships qualifying offices for the position of Lord of Appeal, and appropriate the person so named practically and habitually to the service of the Privy Council. The one great defect of the Judicial Committee was its want of permanence; and he thought they should remedy this in the present legislation by providing for Members in succession to the present Judges.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 14, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 15.

THE EARL OF POWIS asked the Lord Chancellor whether any provision would be made for placing on the Privy Council Members of Indian experience to deal with appeals from India. As the noble Lord opposite (Lord Napier) had pointed out, Chief Justices in India were not eligible for appointment to the office of Lord of Appeal. True, a barrister who had been a Judge in India might become qualified for nomination to that appointment by promotion to the English Bench. Such promotion was very unlikely. They had known the case of a colonial Bishop appointed to the Episcopal Bench in England; but he did not think there was any case of an Indian Judge being elevated to a seat on the English Judicial for the inspection of Members; and, if so, how long before the Vote for the money is asked for?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had given directions that the plans should be got as forward as possible, and he would undertake—if the Vote for the works was passed—that no action should be taken on that Vote without the consent of the House after it had seen the plans.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the "Morning and Evening Mail" of Friday the 25th February, that Mr. Barton, one of the divisional magistrates in Dublin, upon dismissing a charge brought by an individual for cruelty to an animal, said "he was of opinion that the police were in themselves quite sufficient to grapple with cases of cruelty in the streets without any humanity-mongering by a voluntary society;" and, if such statement is true, whether any steps will be taken to prevent the use in future of such language, calculated to counteract the efforts of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, by a magistrate?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the subject only by the Notice of the hon. and learned Member's Question, and he had not, therefore, had time to inquire into the accuracy of the statement referred to. Mr. Barton was an able and efficient magistrate, and if he had made any remark such as that attributed to him, it would probably have been with reference to some want of judgment on the part of the agents of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, rather than with reference to the Society itself. It did not appear to him necessary to take any action in the matter.

ARMY—THE INCREASED PAY OF THE SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE asked, Whether, before the renewal of the discussion upon the Army Estimates, any Papers would be laid before them to show the maximum amount of charge which might arise from this increase of pay?

Mr. R. Yorke

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he believed that there were actuarial calculations in existence, but he could not undertake to put off the Army Estimates until they could be got ready.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BURIAL SERVICES IN PARISH CHURCH-YARDS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

"That the parish churchyards of England and Wales having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right, while making proper provision for the maintenance of order and decency, to permit interments in such churchyards either without any burial services or with burial services other than those of the Church of England, and performed by persons other than the Ministers of that Church,"

said: Mr. Speaker, before moving a Resolution on the Burial Laws, I feel that I owe to the House some explanation of the reasons which have induced me to deviate from the course which I have hitherto pursued in this matter. That explanation is, fortunately, both short and simple. I came down to the House on the first day of the Session prepared to do what I have done for the last four or five years—to bring in a Bill to amend the Burial Laws. But fortune, which had hitherto smiled upon me, was not so propitious this year; and, owing perhaps to the irrepressible thirst for legislation which has seized on private Members, particularly from the other side of the Channel, I found myself ignominiously crowded out. Indeed, if I had persevered in my determination to bring my Bill to a second reading, I should have had to choose between the Derby Day and the second place on the second Wednesday in July. Under these circumstances I made a virtue of necessity, withdrew my Bill, and determined to proceed by Resolution. And I am not sure that I have any reason to complain of the accident which drove me to take that course. There are ample precedents for proceeding by Resolution in such cases. I believe it was a Resolution which first paved the way for the sales to tenants of Church lands, whether by reference to the Ordnance valuation or to the rental?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the value of the holdings sold to tenants of Church lands had not been fixed by the Commissioners by a mere reference either to the Ordnance valuation or to the rental, but to the result of valuations carefully made on the spot by competent valuers.

MR. FAY gave Notice that on the 28th inst. he would move for Returns relating to the subject.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT— PUBLIC ANALYSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is not the fact that in a large number of places the local authorities have neglected to appoint analysts under the sale of Food and Drugs Act, and that in other places where analysts have been appointed no practical result has followed owing to the absence of any provision for the payment of a salary to the analyst; and, whether the Government are willing, if necessary, to exercise their powers under the Act to make the appointment of analysts compulsory, and also to recommend the adoption of some uniform mode of remuneration?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that, so far as he was aware, the number of analysts appointed up to this time in counties was 34. They had also been appointed in 42 boroughs. He did not know in how many instances arrangements might have been made to employ them in adjoining districts, as provided by the Act, neither was he aware that no practical results had followed, owing to the absence of any provision for the payment of a salary to the analyst. No doubt, practical results had not followed in all cases, but that was owing to the impossibility of employing the police before the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of last Session; and that was now remedied. If a case of necessity were made out, he would be willing to employ the powers of compulsory appointment vested in the Local Government Board, but he had no information before him which led him to think the time had arrived for the exercise of those powers. As at present advised, he was not in a position to recommend any uniform system of remuneration.

NATIONAL TEACHERS (IRELAND) ACT, 1875—CONTRIBUTORY UNIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would state to the House how many unions in Ireland have voted themselves contributory under "The National Teachers Act, 1875," and how many remain non-contributory; how many (if any) unions have not as yet decided whether they will become contributory or not; and, whether the Returns ordered upon the Motion of the honourable Member for the county of Carlow as to contributory and non-contributory unions, will be delivered previous to the 17th day of March, the day fixed for the Motion on the subject of the condition of Irish National Teachers?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that 70 of the Irish Unions had agreed to become contributory under the National Teachers Act of 1875, 92 remained non-contributory, and in one, he believed, the question had not yet been settled. The Returns mentioned in the Question would be ready for presentation in another week, and would, he hoped, be circulated before the day fixed for the Motion of the hon. Member for Kildare.

IRISH LAND ACT—NOTICES TO QUIT.

QUESTION.

MR. BUTT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the distinctive die for stamps on notices to quit has yet been prepared, and when it will come into use?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was happy to give the hon. and learned Member a satisfactory answer. No time was lost after the promise was made in preparing the die, and it came into use on the 17th of October last.

ARMY—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will produce the plans for the proposed reconstruction of Knightsbridge Barracks for the inspection of Members; and, if so, how long before the Vote for the money is asked for?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had given directions that the plans should be got as forward as possible, and he would undertake—if the Vote for the works was passed—that no action should be taken on that Vote without the consent of the House after it had seen the plans.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the "Morning and Evening Mail" of Friday the 25th February, that Mr. Barton, one of the divisional magistrates in Dublin, upon dismissing a charge brought by an individual for cruelty to an animal, said "he was of opinion that the police were in themselves quite sufficient to grapple with cases of cruelty in the streets without any humanity-mongering by a voluntary society;" and, if such statement is true, whether any steps will be taken to prevent the use in future of such language, calculated to counteract the efforts of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, by a magistrate?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the subject only by the Notice of the hon. and learned Member's Question, and he had not, therefore, had time to inquire into the accuracy of the statement referred to. Mr. Barton was an able and efficient magistrate, and if he had made any remark such as that attributed to him, it would probably have been with reference to some want of judgment on the part of the agents of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, rather than with reference to the Society itself. It did not appear to him necessary to take any action in the matter.

ARMY—THE INCREASED PAY OF THE SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE asked, Whether, before the renewal of the discussion upon the Army Estimates, any Papers would be laid before them to show the maximum amount of charge which might arise from this increase of pay?

Mr. R. Yorke

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he believed that there were actuarial calculations in existence, but he could not undertake to put off the Army Estimates until they could be got ready.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BURIAL SERVICES IN PARISH CHURCHYARDS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

"That the parish churchyards of England and Wales having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right, while making proper provision for the maintenance of order and decency, to permit interments in such churchyards either without any burial services or with burial services other than those of the Church of England, and performed by persons other than the Ministers of that Church,"

said: Mr. Speaker, before moving a Resolution on the Burial Laws, I feel that I owe to the House some explanation of the reasons which have induced me to deviate from the course which I have hitherto pursued in this matter. That explanation is, fortunately, both short and simple. I came down to the House on the first day of the Session prepared to do what I have done for the last four or five years—to bring in a Bill to amend the Burial Laws. But fortune, which had hitherto smiled upon me, was not so propitious this year; and, owing perhaps to the irrepressible thirst for legislation which has seized on private Members, particularly from the other side of the Channel, I found myself ignominiously crowded out. Indeed, if I had persevered in my determination to bring my Bill to a second reading, I should have had to choose between the Derby Day and the second place on the second Wednesday in July. Under these circumstances I made a virtue of necessity, withdrew my Bill, and determined to proceed by Resolution. And I am not sure that I have any reason to complain of the accident which drove me to take that course. There are ample precedents for proceeding by Resolution in such cases. I believe it was a Resolution which first paved the way for the passing of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, and we know that in later times Resolutions have been fraught with equally momentous consequences. But, without speculating as to the ultimate effect of passing such a Resolution as this, I may at least be permitted to indulge a hope that the calmer and wider discussion which an abstract Resolution invites may clear away some of the prejudices which still overlie this question, and place it on a truer and sounder footing. That at least will be my object in the observations which I shall have to address to the House, and I think I may say that if I fail I shall fail from want of ability and not from lack of honest endeavour.

Before addressing myself to the Resolution, however, I should like, with the kind indulgence of the House, to make one preliminary observation. We approach this question to-day with an amount of light which has never been thrown upon it before. It will, no doubt, be in the recollection of the House that hitherto when I have introduced this question, I have been taunted with having brought forward an infinitesimally small grievance. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary last year called it the "minimum of a grievance." And not only was it said to be a very small grievance, but it was one which was getting "small by degrees and beautifully less," for we were told that every week old churchyards were being closed—every week new cemeteries were being opened, and so in a few years "this infinitesimally small grievance" would vanish from the face of the land altogether. Now I thought that was an allegation which required to be tested. Certainly, it was altogether contrary to my personal experience, which would lead me to say that the churchyards of England are by no means full, and that even where they are full people do not at once rush off and form themselves into a Burial Board and invoke the cumbrous and expensive machinery of the Burials Acts. Some liberal landlord, not always a member of the Church of England, gives a neighbouring piece of land, or perhaps the land is purchased by subscription, and in this way the churchyard is enlarged to meet the wants of the parish. But as the allegation was often made, I determined to test it. In June last I moved for a Return giving the name and population of every parish in England and Wales, together with the number of churches and chapels, of churchyards and burial grounds, consecrated or unconsecrated, open or closed, as well as of the number of existing statutory cemeteries. Unfortunately the Return I asked for was so complete that I am afraid it never will be completed. For when, just before the opening of the Session, I consulted my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), whose courtesy and kindness I cannot sufficiently acknowledge, I found that although he had done everything that he could do to expedite those Returns, as well as to obtain them from the most trustworthy sources, a large number had not come in, and those which had come in were so voluminous that it would take six months to print them. All idea, therefore, of obtaining them during the present Session had to be abandoned, and I have therefore been compelled to content myself with a numerical in lieu of a nominal Return, which, although not so satisfactory, gives much valuable information. That Return was delivered to hon. Members two days ago, and certainly it seems to me that it strengthens my case to an extent which I for one had never expected.

I should premise that Returns have been received from 7,369 parishes of England and Wales, but 2,332 parishes, in other words one quarter of the parishes in England and Wales, have supplied no information whatever. Of course, some of us will have their own suspicions as to the reasons why no information was sent in these cases. For my part I see no reason to impute mala fides to the authorities. But this I may say, that had the Returns been all before us they certainly would not have been more unfavourable to my case than they are at present. For wherever Burial Boards have been established and cemeteries constructed there is generally some responsible authority whose business it is to answer inquiries, so that in such cases the information you want is generally forthcoming; whereas those portions of the country which have sent no Returns are mainly the rural parishes where no such machinery exists, and it is but fair to assume that these Returns, if supplied, would go to strengthen my case. A fuller Return, published to-day by the Home Office, which I suppose comes from the Burials Office, differs very little from the Returns published two days before. According to the one Return the number of consecrated burial grounds wholly closed is 794, whereas according to the other and fuller and later one the number is 843. I may add that, when I come to Wales, I find the number of parishes from which Returns have been received is 541, and the number from which Returns have not been received is 204, showing that two-fifths of the authorities there decline or omit to give any information.

But taking the information I have got, for the accuracy and completeness of which I am in no way responsible, it shows that the churchyards now open in England and Wales amount to 9,989—in round numbers 10,000, while the number closed amounts only to 794, so that the churchyards open are in proportion to the churchyards closed in the ratio of nearly 13 to 1. Again, I may add a significant fact which appears by the Return issued this morning, that only 60 churchyards have been wholly closed in the last 10 years, being an average of only six a-year.

When, however, I come to cemeteries returned as containing unconsecrated ground the results are still more marked. There are at present, as far as appears by my Return, in England and Wales only 539 cemeteries containing unconsecrated ground. Now there was a Return moved for by the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt), which gave the number of cemeteries constructed three years ago at 531, so that if you compare the two Returns it would appear that in the course of three years only eight new cemeteries have been constructed. I may add that these figures tally with the fuller Return we received this morning, which shows that only eight burial-grounds were wholly closed within the last two years; but if you take the Returns which I hold in my hand by themselves, it would appear that the cemeteries available for Dissenters are only 539 as against churchyards still open nearly 10,000. Of course, you may say that cemeteries have been established in the towns where Dissent is assumed to be strongest. Now, I am not at all sure that this assumption is true. The contrary would appear from one or two figures which are set down in these Returns. I observe, for instance, that in the county of Lincoln, a purely agricultural county, there are no less than 634 Dissenting chapels. But whether that be true of England or not, it is not true of Wales, because there, so far as the Church is strong at all, it is strong in the urban and not in the rural districts.

Now, just see what is the state of things which confronts you in Wales. Taking Wales and Monmouthshire (which is Welsh in everything except name) together, we have in this Return churchyards open, 788; churchyards closed, 25; cemeteries, 21—21 cemeteries for a scattered population of a million and a-half. The churchyards open are to the churchyards closed in the proportion of 31 to 1, and the churchyards open are to the cemeteries in the proportion of 39 to 1. Now, do not these Returns show that this grievance, so far from being infinitesimal, so far from extending only to a few hundreds or thousands of persons, extends to persons who may be counted by millions? Why, in North Wales alone there are between 300,000 and 400,000 persons who feel its pressure. Well, after this disclosure do not let us hear anything more about this being the minimum of a grievance.

The Return also shows that the number of unconsecrated burial-grounds attached to chapels in England and Wales is 2,833 to 14,000 chapels, or only 20 per cent, whereas the churchyards are to the churches in the proportion of 88 per cent. But I demur entirely to classing these burial grounds, which are private property, and can be dealt with as such, in the same category with parish churchyards in which every parishioner has a vested right of interment, and which cannot be touched except under an Act of Parliament; unless, indeed, you are prepared to go farther, and to admit that the Church of England holds her property by the same title as the Dissenting denominations; but of course you cannot do this without reducing her to the level of a sect.

Now I have called attention to these figures because so much stress was laid on their absence by my opponents. For my own part, however, I am disposed to think that if a thing is just and right the number of persons who demand it is comparatively unimportant. But I was challenged by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to produce the information. I have produced it; and all I can say is I hope he is satisfied with the result.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

I now come to the Resolution itself. It has been a long time before the House and the country, and of course it has been, I do not say unfairly, but severely criticized. It was said by a leading journal, to which I am greatly indebted for the support which it has given me, that its preamble is "unnecessarily menacing." Sir, I hope I have lived long enough to know that menace of every kind, particularly unnecessary menace, is as injudicious in point of policy as it is reprehensible in point of taste. And, as in the remarks I am about to make, I would not willingly say one word which would wound the susceptibilities of the most susceptible man in this House, I am quite ready, if the preamble offends such susceptibilities, not to press it. But this I wish to be understood that, whether menacing or not, that preamble is most certainly true. And that it is true—strictly true as a proposition of law—I will, if the House will indulge me for a few minutes, undertake to prove.

But before entering on this question, I must ask the House carefully to distinguish between two rights—the confusion of which has done much to obscure this subject. I mean the right of interment in the parish churchyard, which is one thing, and the right to the use of the service of the Church of England, which is another. The one is a civil or Common Law right, triable in a civil Court, the other is an ecclesiastical right, triable in the ecclesiastical Courts. The latter is the right of those who are actual or constructive members of the Church of England. I say constructive because, as the House knows, by a decision given about 60 years ago, it was held that any person who had been baptized, no matter by whom, was constructively a member of the Church of England, and as such entitled to the funeral services of the Church. But the larger right, that of interment in the parish churchyard, is the right of everyone who has once obtained the rights of a parishioner in the parish, irrespectively of his religious status. Let that be clearly understood, because unless we separate these two rights we shall get into confusion. I may add that the distinction upon which I insist has recently been admitted by an eminent ecclesiastical lawyer, who, although certainly not disposed to sympathize with me, in an able article on the subject in The Guardian, says—

"It has been argued that the right of burials is the right of 'Christian burial,' and that therefore those persons who are disqualified from Christian burial have no right to burial in the churchyard. But the more correct opinion seems to be that these rights are separable, and that the right of interment may exist where there is no right to require the performance of the Church service. This proposition is laid down, though perhaps not judiciously decided, in cases in the Court of Queen's Bench, and in the Court of Arches, and was on their authority admitted by Bishop Phillpotts in his charge of 1842, in a passage which well deserves perusal."

Now the larger proposition, that every parishioner is entitled to burial in the parish churchyard, is not only laid down without qualification in almost every text-book on the subject, beginning with Bishop Gibson and ending with Sir Robert Phillimore, but it has been judicially affirmed in a case of R. v. Taylor, the report of which, from Serjeant Hill's MSS. is to be found in Lincoln's Inn Library. It is as follows:—

"Motion by Serjeant Glide &c. for information against one Taylor, Vicar of parish of Daventry, in Northamptonshire, for refusing to bury and hindering the burial of one Mary ——. It appears on affidavit that the deceased being a parishioner, died in May, 1720, and that the relatives of the deceased applied soon after to the sexton to dig a place for burial of the corpse; but the parson Taylor ordered him not, and he has ever since obstructed the burial of the corpse in the churchyard, he giving for reason that she being a Protestant Dissenter (of the persuasion of the Baptists) was never baptized, being baptized only by a layman or minister of her own persuasion, so no Christian, and therefore ought not to be buried in churchyard, which was consecrated ground. By which the corpse laid above ground to that time.

"Per Fortescue, J. 'Every parishioner has a right to burial place in churchyard, otherwise they cannot be buried anywhere, if they have not land of their own,' for other persons are not obliged to permit their burial in their property.

"Per cur.: 'shew cause' quare informat non.

"The last day of the term the Defendant came to shew cause, but because it would take a long time per cur., adjourned till next term, and the Court in the meantime advised the parson to bury the corpse in the churchyard; if he did not the Court should be informed of it next term, then would grant information, 'for every parishioner has a right of sepulture.'

"The Defendant's Counsel moved to discharge the former rule when the Court was certified by affidavit that the Defendant, knowing the mind of the Court, had complied with it, and told the relatives of the deceased they might bury the corpse in what part of the churchyard they pleased; upon which the Court discharged the former rule, but said if he had still continued obstinate they would have granted information. As to refusing to read the burial service on account of her not being baptized according to the rites of the Church of England, the Court said, 'that was a spiritual matter not belonging to them.'"—[Serjeant Hill's MSS., 7 D. 278.]

Now, that case is valuable for two reasons. First, it shows the distinction for which I have contended, and, secondly, it establishes the Common Law right, and places it on the true ground—namely, that of necessity. And not only has that case been frequently approved of, but it has been acted upon for a century and a-half; for since that time no clergyman, as far as I know, has ever ventured to refuse burial in the churchyard to unbaptized persons, though he has; of course, often refused—and by law is perfectly justified in refusing—to read the service over such persons.

Well then, having, I trust, established the truth of my preamble, let me go a step further. It is said that this right is subject to conditions. Of course the observation does not apply to unbaptized persons, in whose case the reading of the Church service, so far from being enforced, is not even permitted. But let us see in what sense it applies in other cases.

Now, as was laid down in the case of R. v. Taylor, the Common Law Courts had nothing to do with religious rites and ceremonies. This was a matter which they left to the ecclesiastical Courts, or the Bishop's Courts, as they were called, which, before the Reformation, derived their inspiration more or less from the Pope. And the ecclesiastical Courts, having to deal with this question, dealt with it in what, considering the age, may be called a very liberal spirit. With the Common Law right of interment they did not, and could not, interfere. But they laid down the rule that every man who had been admitted into the Church by Baptism and had not been cut off by excommunication, was to be presumed to be a member of the Holy Catholic Church, and, as such, was entitled to be buried with the service of that Church, that being the only form of Christian burial then known in this country. But then that rule was founded upon the assumption—which was then true in fact as well as in theory—that every parishioner was a member of the Holy Catholic Church, and that, so far from any objection being entertained to the services of the Church, the most terrible weapon which the Church kept in her armoury—a weapon which made even kings tremble on their thrones, was this threat of being interred without those services, involving, as it was then supposed to do, the certainty of everlasting perdition. But now just see what a change has come over the religious condition of the country. That which was then a fact is now become a fiction. The Church no longer embraces, as it did formerly, the whole, or nearly the whole, of the parish. The services of the Church, instead of being always sought after, are often objected to; and the strange result is, that the very thing which was once cherished as a privilege is now sought to be imposed as an obligation; and we find ourselves called upon to discuss a right which was never dreamed of when the law under discussion was made: the right, not to refuse the services of the Church to those who want them, but to impose those services on those who do not want them—the right to force on unwilling ears a service which ceases to be even solemn the moment it ceases to be welcome—the right to lay violent hands on the funeral procession, and to force back the corpse into the bosom of that Church which the living man had abjured, and was by the law of the land perfectly free to abjure.

Now, I put it to hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House as well as on this—does it not seem an insult to call this a Party question? [Derisive cheers]. If that observation has wounded the susceptibilities of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene), I will withdraw it at once. I will therefore change the form of the question. Is a right so barren—I had almost said so odious—worth preserving at the cost of all the bad blood and bad feeling which the struggle to preserve it is engendering in every parish in England? Nay, is it not the very right we gave up 40 years ago, when we allowed Dissenters to marry with their own services? I know the answer that will be given to that question. It will be said—"Yes, but we never admitted Dissenting ministers to our churches, whereas now you ask us to admit them to the churchyards. Churchyards and churches are the same thing, and if we admit you to one we must admit you to the other." Of all the objections which have been urged against my Resolution, that is the most common, it is the most specious, and it is the most unfounded. And if hon. Gentlemen will bear with me for a few moments I will endeavour to show that it is so.

Why, in the first place, there is this obvious distinction between the two cases—the primary object of the church is the performance of religious worship, the object of the churchyard is the interment of the dead; and whereas convenience and decency, if not absolute necessity, require that the dead should be interred in the same locality, nobody, not even the wildest Liberationist, has ever suggested that all religious ceremonies should be performed under the same roof. In fact, take away the name and the juxta-position, and in the Protestant countries at least the church and churchyard have not an idea in common, except possibly that both were included in the same ceremony of consecration. But perhaps the less said about that now the better, for it is now pretty generally agreed that the ceremony of consecration, as opposed to the civil act of dedication, is unauthorized, if not illegal, because the ordinance on which it is founded is a Bill which passed both Houses of Convocation in 1712; but when that Bill came before Queen Anne, who, like others of our female Sovereigns, was jealous of her ecclesiastical prerogatives, she, for some reason or other, refused the royal sanction to it. Consequently that Bill is in the position of a Bill passed by both Houses of Parliament which has not received the Royal Assent—in other words, it is mere waste paper. And that I take it is why the consecration service is not found in the Prayer Book, and that is doubtless too why Bishop Thirlwall, who was as good an ecclesiastical lawyer as he was a theologian, used to say he could consecrate a churchyard quite as well in his own study as on the spot. Again, as to the juxta-position, that is a matter of comparatively recent origin, for, according to a great authority on ecclesiastical law, when Christianity was first introduced into England, and for many centuries afterwards, the graveyards, so far from encompassing the church, were like the modern cemeteries at a distance from it, and the present practice of surrounding the church by the churchyard only grew up when—

“Monks and priests, beginning to offer prayers for the souls of the departed, procured leave, for their greater ease and profit, that liberty of sepulture might be in churches or places adjoining them, in order that the friends and relatives of persons deceased, as often as they came to these sacred places, seeing their graves, might remember them and pray God for them.”

And eight centuries after Christianity was first introduced into this country, an Act of Parliament was passed which treats churchyards as a modern innovation, for it recites that—

“Now of late by subtle imagination, and by art and engine, some religious persons, parsons, vicars, and other spiritual persons have interred in divers lands and tenements which be adjoining their churches, and of the same have made churchyards, and by bulls of the Bishops of Rome have dedicated and hallowed the same, and in them do make parochial burying without license of the king and of the chief lords, therefore it is declared that this is manifestly within the compass of the Statute of Mortmain.”

But these facts may be interesting from an antiquarian point of view; let us get to something more practical. I will point out a practical distinction, for the present purpose, between the church and the churchyard, which nobody has ever yet attempted to get over. In this country at least no man is compelled by any law, natural or human, to enter his parish church. But unfortunately there are several thousand parishes in England containing several millions of inhabitants in which every man is, sooner or later, compelled by a law higher than any human law to enter his parish churchyard. Of course, when I say “every man” I am not speaking of territorial magnates who can build their own mausoleums. I am speaking of the poor and the children of the poor, who are compelled to be buried in the place where they die, and, if the churchyard is the only place available for that purpose, are compelled to be buried there. Therefore, to say that the use of the churchyard involves the use of the church is to ignore the very first law of poor human nature, that we must all die and be buried. In fact, as an Irishman said to me the other day—“Burial is the one act in a man’s whole life which is not optional.” And it is just this physical necessity which the Common Law recognized when it set apart the churchyard for the burial place of all parishioners, without distinction. Now, if this be so, let me ask this question: Do we or do we not by our present law indirectly—but not on that account less effectually compel Dissenters to be buried with rites and ceremonies of which they disapprove; just as formerly we indirectly, but not on that account less effectually, compelled them to be married with rites and ceremonies of which they disapproved? And if there can be but one answer to that question, let me ask another. Is that compulsion, indirect though it be, consistent—I do not say with religious equality, but with the barest measure of religious toleration?

Look around and see how other countries have dealt with this question. I stated some time ago that in almost every other civilized country the law which I am endeavouring to introduce into this country already prevails. I had no sooner made the observation than I was contradicted, and I do not care to repeat it on my own responsibility. I will shelter myself under the authority of a name which we all respect—I mean that of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Archbishop of Canterbury stated on an occasion when my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) were present, and subsequently in Convocation, that he had taken the greatest pains to ascertain what was the law of foreign countries on this subject, and he had discovered that in Austria and Russia—two countries not very remarkable for religious toleration—Protestant ministers were allowed to bury their own flock, with their own services, in the parochial cemeteries. We know that in Irish churchyards, first under Lord Plunket's Act, which gave a sort of permissive right, and latterly under Lord Emly's Act, which made that right absolute, both Presbyterian ministers and Catholic priests are allowed to perform their own burial service over their dead. We know that in Scotland—not by virtue of any Act of Parliament—but, thanks to the more liberal and Christian spirit in which Scotchmen have looked at this question, not only Episcopalian clergymen—who are Dissenting ministers in Scotland—but Roman Catholic priests are allowed to bury in the parish graveyards. Why should England be so far behind—I will not say Ireland and Scotland, but—Austria and Russia? Heaven knows we are fond enough of boasting of our enlightened views on these subjects! We go about thanking God that Englishmen are not as other nations are! We are proud—and, perhaps, justly proud—of the religious toleration and freedom of speech which we profess and enjoy. Why should we concede that toleration and that freedom at every other juncture of life except that one juncture when it is most earnestly asked for, and most sorely needed? Why should we extend it to every other subject of the Realm, but deny it to the mourner, the widow, and the orphan?

Sir, I cannot help thinking that the consciences of hon. Gentlemen opposite are not quite easy on this subject, because I see they have introduced no less than six Bills to remedy this “infinitesimally small grievance.” There were the two Bills of Lord Beauchamp, the two Bills brought in by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot), a Bill of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), and a Bill of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole; and now we have this Amendment. This Amendment is actually the seventh red herring you have drawn across my path. Well, I think I may dispose of it without much difficulty. I entirely approve of it as an abstract proposition. But what has it got to do with my Resolution? If, by his Amendment, the hon. Member (Mr. J. G. Talbot) means that every facility should be given for so useful a purpose as the acquisition of land for burial grounds, and that this should be done by as cheap and simple a process as possible, no sane man will disagree with him. To prove that I am in earnest, I may say that three years ago, before the hon. Gentleman thought of the subject, I carried through Parliament an Act, now the 36 & 37 Vict., cap. 50, actually giving the facilities the hon. Gentleman now proposes to give, to persons willing to bestow or sell land for—amongst other purposes—burial grounds. I would therefore suggest to my hon. Friend that, instead of amending my Resolution, he should amend my Act, and he would have my most zealous co-operation. Of course I do not like to boast of my legislative performances, particularly when they are so meagre as mine have been; but I think I may say that that Act has been found very useful. Indeed, the only drawback to my satisfaction at having passed it has been that I have been so often called upon to explain its provisions. But although a number of sites for churches and chapels have been obtained under it, I do not believe that it has been put into operation to acquire a single burial ground. The reason is obvious. People do not care to multiply such places unnecessarily. Unless they are absolutely required, the landowner does not want to give the land; the parishioners do not want to pay for it. But if the hon. Member means this—and I cannot help suspecting he does—if he means by his Amendment that in every parish, whether the churchyard is empty or full, whether cemeteries are wanted or not, there land shall be acquired for the purpose of making a burial ground, all I can say is that such a proposal, coming from a Member of a Party which has always prided itself on its resistance to any increase of the rates, is something monstrous. Have you calculated the cost of this? I find that up to the year 1862, no less than £1,400,000 had been expended in the construction of cemeteries, and of course the sum has been greatly increased since. Why, if you were to cover the country with these cemeteries you would have to spend many hundreds of thousands of pounds, because it would not do, in my country at least, to have, as has been suggested, but one cemetery attached to four or five parishes; for in that case people might sometimes have to drag a funeral 10 or 15 miles, and over a mountain 1,500 feet high. Now I want to know from what source is the money for this purpose to come? Is it to come out of the rates? I think I see the President of the Local Government Board in his place, and, if so, I should be exceedingly glad to know what his views on this subject are. I do not see my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Reed), who, to his honour be it said, resigned the post to which he had been called with the general assent of the House and the country, because Government would not keep pace with his views on the reduction of local taxation. ["No, no!"] I am sure if I have made a mistake I have done so innocently. It really does not affect the argument. I want to know what the hon. Member for South Norfolk, who is admitted to have been most zealous in his endeavour to cut down local expenditure, would say to such a proposal. My hon. Friend opposite the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), has also honourably distinguished himself by his attempts to cut down local expenditure. I should like to know what are his views on this subject. Then there is my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton), another farmer's friend. I should like to know what he has to say on this subject. Still more would I like to know what his constituents would have to say to it. But to show you how completely at sea people get when they come to carry these proposals into anything like practice, let me state to the House the results of an appeal which the Bishop of Salisbury made to his rural deaneries for advice on this question—

"About 600 clergy and representative communicant laity have given answers to the questions proposed. To the first question—whether the present law of burial should be uncompromisingly maintained—the answer is uniformly in the affirmative, two deaneries adding 'as regards services.' To the second question—whether, if any change were to be made, the proposals of Mr. Osborne Morgan's Bill should be accepted—the answer is absolutely in the negative; not more than three voted in the affirmative."

[Laughter.] Well, my hon. Friend opposite need not laugh, for he did not fare much better—

"To the third question—whether silent burials should be adopted according to Mr. Talbot's plan—three deaneries only answered in the affirmative, the division in them being 12 to 8, 9 to 7, and 12 to 3. To the fourth question—whether cemeteries should be formed for one or more parishes according to the recommendation of the Lower House of Convocation—two deaneries answered decisively in the negative; the rest answered in the affirmative, but with great variety of opinion as to the funds from which the cemeteries should be provided, several objecting to the charge falling on the rates, three proposing it should be borne by the Dissenters, one that half should be defrayed by subscriptions and half by a Government grant, and the rest not specifying the fund from which it should come."

That shows how utterly at sea you get the moment you come to the practical working of these proposals. What a Babel of discord does not Convocation become when it attempts to deal with this question. The Lower House sends a message to the Upper House, and the Upper House sends it back to know what it means, and then they do what is perhaps the wisest thing, and postpone the consideration of the whole question until a more convenient season. And it is a significant fact, that although six Bills have been brought forward by hon. Gentlemen opposite to remedy this "infinitesimally small grievance," not one of those Bills has ever been brought on for second reading. Not one of those Bills has ever been submitted to the full and ample consideration which every Bill receives on coming up for second reading in this House. And almost every proposal which has been made from the other side has had to be modified or dropped. Take the proposal for silent interments. I entirely acquit the hon. Member for West Kent of any intention to do so, but surely he has not the slightest idea how deeply he wounded and pained the Nonconformists of England by his proposal for silent burial. It is true that my Resolution proposes to legalize silent burial. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial side.] Yes. But it is one thing to offer a thing by way of option, and another to make it the only alternative. I may say that I altered my original Resolution by introducing silent burial as an alternative, in accordance with the wishes of my Scotch Friends who say that it is the custom in Scotland to bury without any service. In England silent burial is not a usual mode of burial. Silent burial is the burial of the suicide, and consequently it imposes a stigma which makes people recoil from it. And then you propose to bestow on Dissenters, as a boon, that mode of interment which English law imposes on suicides as a stigma, and you expect Nonconformists to welcome the offer with gratitude. However that is abandoned now, and I am glad of it. But if you admit that something ought to be done, and yet are not prepared to tell us what ought to be done, have I not a right to ask you to tell me a little more specifically what are your objections to my Resolution? For surely in itself it is natural that a man should desire to be buried in a manner most consistent with his feelings. Surely it is natural that he should desire a funeral service to be performed over him by the man who has been his spiritual adviser through life, and who is to be the spiritual guide and consoler of his bereaved family. Surely that is a sentiment so natural and so human that to look for its origin in what is somewhat vaguely called an outbreak of political Dissent is as ridiculous as it is unfeeling. Then what are your objections? In that remarkable speech of the Prime Minister, delivered three years ago, he said that if Dissenters wanted to have the churchyards they ought to pay for them. Well, I entirely agree with that, and in my original Bill I inserted a clause throwing the costs of keeping up the churchyards on the parishioners generally. But you objected to that provision, and you threw it out, and now you turn round and blame me for not giving you what you would not have when I offered it. And do not forget this, that although churchyards are now kept in order by Churchmen, yet many of them were originally constructed by rates borne by Dissenters as well as Churchmen. Then it is said that the Resolution is one-sided, because it frees the Dissenting minister and binds the parson. Now I must say that objection falls rather hard upon me, because it assumes that I am responsible for the Burial Service and the Rubric. Why, you might as well say that I am answerable for the Thirty-nine Articles and the Athanasian Creed. And do you not see how inconsistent you are? When the question is as to compelling the Dissenter to have the service read over him, you cannot, for the life of you, see that there is any objection to it. But when the question is as to compelling the clergyman to read it, then you discover that there are many cases in which it is wholly inapplicable. Well, I quite agree with you, and no one would rejoice more than I should to see the clergyman relieved from the necessity of reading the Burial Service in every case. But recollect that there is such a thing as "blowing hot and cold" at the same time. Then there is the danger of abuse. That is a horse which has been ridden very hard in the Recess. One hon. Member said that if the Bill passed, he should be afraid you would have Jumpers and Shakers in the churchyard, another was afraid of dancing girls. Another hon. Member the gallant Member for Bedford (Captain Polhill-Turner), sees in imagination a vista of 30 or 40 Mormon widows following their husbands to the grave. And the last idea seems to be that the Malay, relieved I suppose from the pressure of his domestic difficulties at Perak, will come over here and take advantage of the change of the law to pollute our churchyards with his horrid and unclean rites. Does anyone really believe this nonsense? Does anyone believe it? I ask the question pointedly, because there was a time, when I was as yet innocent and unversed in the ways of the world, when I did partially believe it, and in former years I went out of my way to overload my Bills with "safeguards," until I found out that nobody cared to have them. Not only did I include in my Bill all the limitations which the Select Committee to which the Bill was referred in 1870 had suggested, but I went much farther. Let me give one instance. In 1872 the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had put down on my Bill an Amendment requiring the service to be according to a prescribed ritual, or to consist of hymns, prayers, and portions of Scripture. I accepted that Amendment and put it in the Bill of 1873; but no sooner had I done so than the hon. Member began to quarrel with his own Amendment. And that Bill of 1873, containing all those "safeguards," was the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, came down to the House with all the weight of his great authority and eloquence to denounce. Well, I am wiser now. Of course my Resolution leaves the matter entirely open. For I take it that it is not the office of a Resolution to prescribe what service is to be performed or by whom. That is a matter necessarily left open for the present. But if you seriously require any reasonable safeguards, depend upon it you will find us as disposed as before to meet you half-way. If, however, you ask me what safeguards I should myself—speaking, mind, in my own name only—prefer, I will answer you frankly. None whatever. I think that is a matter in which you might safely trust to the good sense and good feeling of your fellow-countrymen. Have you found any safeguards necessary in the case of cemeteries? For the whole object of my Resolution is to turn the parish churchyards into what they originally were, parish cemeteries. I have a great deal of evidence on that subject. I will give you a short extract from a letter put into my hands this morning from a member of the Burial Board of Liverpool. In that cemetery 60,000 people have been buried since it was first established, and the writer states—

"I have been a member of the Burial Board of this parish from its origin, and from the day of the opening of our cemetery at Anfield to the present the burial services in the Nonconformist division of the ground have been conducted with at least as much decorum, if not more, than in the Church of England ground. The Church of England ground is bounded on one side by the Roman Catholic ground, and on the other side by the general or Nonconformist ground, being separated only by open walks or roads; and although the services at the grave sides are often being conducted at the same time in each of the three divisions, all are conducted with order and decorum, and no occasion for complaint arises from one or the other of any irregularity."

That is what all my correspondents tell me: the service in the unconsecrated ground is just as devotional, just as solemn, just as religious in every sense of the word as the service in the consecrated ground. Some go further, and say it is more so. If so, what are you afraid of? Why should you be more afraid of riots in churchyards than of riots in cemeteries? My hon. Friends the Irish Members will forgive me for saying that the popular idea of an Irish funeral is that it is not always conducted on the strictest principles of decorum. But have any scandals occurred at funerals in Irish churchyards? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] Well, but are there no churchyard scandals in England? Look at Scotland. Has there ever been any riot in Scotland, where religious feeling runs at least as high as in England? I believe that within the last year two Bishops, the Episcopalian Bishop of Brechin and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, were laid to their last rest in the venerable churchyard of St. Cuthbert's, in Edinburgh. Was there any riot or disorder then? Then, I ask, what right have we to libel our fellow-countrymen by insinuating that they alone among civilized men will be guilty of these outrages upon the feelings of the living and the memory of the dead?

But this is only the fringe of the question. The real objection, we are told, lies deeper down—Disestablishment under disguise! [Loud Ministerial cheers.] Well, I admire your unanimity, but I cannot say so much for your logic. As I understand the argument, it is put somewhat in this way—"You support this Motion; you are in favour of Disestablishment; therefore this is a Motion in favour of Disestablishment." That is the syllogism! How am I to meet it?

Indeed, the difficulty I have always felt in arguing this question is that the grounds upon which I am called upon to argue it are continually shifting. No sooner do I raise one issue than you meet it by raising another. First it was "the parson's freehold;" then it was "the smallness of the grievance;" then it was the "danger of abuse;" and now it is "disestablishment under disguise." I begin to feel like Lysander in the Midsummer Night's Dream—

"He goes before me, and yet dares me on;
When I come where he calls, then he is gone.
Demetrius is much lighter healed than I;
I follow fast, but he doth faster fly."

Sir, it is my belief that if, when that very moderate Bill of 1873 was brought forward, the Prime Minister, instead of coming down to oppose it d'outrance, had exercised the almost unlimited control which he wields over his Party to "educate" them into something like reason on this subject, that Bill, possibly with some further modifications, might have been passed, this "great and burning question" might have been settled for ever, and by this time we might almost have forgotten its existence. But in an evil hour for the Church of England, in an evil hour for everybody, certainly in a very evil hour for me, some zealous but misguided "children of the Church" determined, in defiance of reason and logic, to confound the Church with the churchyard, to link the living with the dead, and to fight the battle of the Establishment upon this ground. Do not suppose that the Liberation Society will quarrel with you for that. They know what an admirable weapon you have placed in their hands. They know that if they had been allowed to take their choice from the whole area of ecclesiastical questions they could not have selected a battle-ground more admirably adapted to their purpose than this. It has been said within the last day or two by an eminent Churchman, that this is to be the Thermopylæ round which you will fight to the last gasp for the entrance to the Church. Take care that your Thermopylæ does not turn out to be the Caudine Forks. The wisest men amongst you—the Archbishop of Canterbury, my revered Friend the Dean of Westminster, the Deans of Christchurch and Canterbury, the Deans of Durham, of Chester, and Manchester, the headmasters of our great public schools, the leaders of thought at our old Universities, absolutely decline to follow you in your headlong and suicidal career. And surely, if opinions are to be weighed instead of reckoned, the memorial presented to the Prime Minister yesterday, signed by some three or four hundred most distinguished metropolitan and rural clergymen, ought to have some weight with the Government and the House. Unfortunately, however, all the leaders of ecclesiastical thought among us are not equally farseeing. Let me read to the House the views of one of the most learned and active Bishops of the English Church—a man of whose great scholastic and theological erudition I wish to speak with the greatest respect—I mean Dr. Christopher Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln. And I hope that every word which I am going to read will go forth to the House and to the country, not only because it is a very fair type of the arguments which are daily rained in upon me, but because I am continually told that the proper settlement of this question would be to do as was formerly done in Ireland—to leave each case as it arises to the discretion of the incumbent, with the right of appeal to the Bishop. "A Bishop," I am told, "is always reasonable and always just. Surely you can always trust a Bishop." Now let us see what chance an unfortunate Nonconformist would have of having his appeal listened to in the large and important diocese of Lincoln. The Bishop of Lincoln, writing to one of the principal London newspapers a short time ago, says—

"The Bishops and clergy and parish priests of England are not the owners of the churchyards. They are only trustees of them under God, who is their proprietor, and they cannot, without breach of trust and without being guilty of a heinous offence in His sight, take away from God a single foot of a churchyard for the purpose of giving a share in it for public funeral services to persons who rend asunder His Church by schism, which is condemned by Him in His holy Word as a deadly sin. Such an act on the part of Bishops and clergy would be a robbery of God. It would be an act of sacrilege, treachery, and cowardice. It would not avert disestablishment: it would only hasten it!"

Hasten Disestablishment! Do not you think that such a letter as this—coming as it does from one of the most prominent Prelates of our National Church —will do more to “hasten Disestablishment” than all the Burial Bills that ever were invented? Why, Sir, these Church Defence Institutions have done more to pull down the Church of England in two years than the Liberation Society did in 20. And why? Because they have alienated and are alienating from the Church of England that large body of Englishmen who do not know much and do not care much about theological dogmas, but who, nevertheless, entertain a deeply rooted conviction that the first duty of a Christian Church is to be just and tolerant to her fellow-Christians. And that is why I cannot help thinking that if she had been wise in her generation, the Church of England, instead of hankering after impossible unions with semi-barbarous Churches, would have looked nearer home, and herself have set to work to devise some scheme for relieving her own ministers from a position which is always false and often painful. For, believe me when I say that, galling and irritating and exasperating as the prolongation of this wretched struggle is to the Nonconformists, the real sufferer by the prolongation of that struggle is the Church of England herself. We—my hon. Friends and myself—can afford to look forward to the result of to-night’s division without the slightest misgiving. We know that, by the aid of what I will venture to call a “mechanical” majority, you can defeat this Resolution. But we also know that the day will surely come when common sense and common justice, aye, and I may add, common humanity will prevail, as they always do in the end prevail in England, and when some measure, based upon the lines of this Resolution, will become the law of the land. Of that we are as sure as we are of our own existence. But is it quite so sure that the Church of England—strong though she be, deeply rooted in the affections of the people though she be—can much longer afford to be defended by such utterances as these?—

“Non tali auxilio nec defensoribus istis
Tempus eget.”

But be that as it may; that is not the question upon which you will have to pronounce a verdict to-night. The question upon which you will have to pronounce a verdict to-night is not, I repeat, the Disestablishment of the Church of England. It is a question infinitely smaller, both in its proportions and its consequences—a question, indeed, which in this age of universal toleration, I am almost ashamed to submit to the House of Commons: whether you will any longer tolerate this musty remnant of old ecclesiastical law, which, although it was perfectly just, perfectly suited to the age which gave it birth, has become so ill-suited to the changed religious condition of the country that it cannot be upheld without a fiction, or enforced without an injustice. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN, in seconding the Resolution, said, he did so as a Churchman strongly opposed to Disestablishment, and who, although he had voted for the Disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, did so very reluctantly, because he looked upon it as a political necessity. He should not have come forward to second the Resolution if he thought it would lead to Disestablishment. On the contrary, he believed that leaving this question open and unsettled had done more mischief to the Church than 10 campaigns of the Liberation Society. Sir Morton Peto, in speaking on this question, quoted from a speech of the Marquess of Salisbury, when that nobleman had a seat in the House of Commons as Lord Robert Cecil, to the effect that some Bills of this kind would sooner or later be passed, unless the clergy could be persuaded in the question of burials to wink with both eyes. He (Mr. Martin) believed that in 99 cases out of 100 the clergy adopted that course, exercised toleration, and endeavoured to give as little offence as they possibly could in this painful matter of burial, and he once knew a prudent Archdeacon who managed to be out of the way, so that the wife of a Roman Catholic parishioner might be buried without any service; but unfortunately there was a noisy minority of intolerant and very unwise men who acted in a contrary spirit, and gave rise by their conduct to the strong feeling which existed among Nonconformists on this subject. He would give an instance of this intolerance, which he found in The Church Times, a Church newspaper, though one he did not at all admire, and which, as it had not been contradicted, he assumed to be accurate. A clergyman was reported to have said—"With the exception of a few people here and there, Dissenters are chiefly remarkable for ignorance, insolence, and stupidity," and then he went on to ask—Were the clergy of the Church of England to be called on to "bury the carrion of Dissent?" ["Oh, oh!" and "Name!"] The language he had quoted was attributed to the rector of one of the largest parishes in London—the Rev. Thomas Hugo. What Nonconformist, being human, would not feel justly indignant at such language? A clergyman of his acquaintance had said—"If the report of that speech be bonâ fide, the clergyman who uttered it ought to be suspended," and he fully agreed with him. Better far to allow any number of Dissenters to read prayers in our churchyards than to expose the Church to the injuries that would result from such language. Lord Selborne, when Sir Roundell Palmer, had said that something must be done in the matter, and the six Bills from the other side were a confession on their part that some remedy was necessary. It had been said by Gentlemen opposite that this was made a Party question by the Liberals. He did not wish to make it so; but undoubtedly it was the Liberal Party which alone would be benefited by having this sore kept festering for years, instead of having the question settled on equitable terms. The best course, therefore, that hon. Gentlemen opposite could take would be to settle the question. Years ago a man of great ability and vast experience in that House said to him—"You fellows are very stupid. You want abolition of church rates, admission of the Jews to Parliament, and other Liberal measures. Get those and the Ballot, and you will immediately have the Conservatives in power." His Friend was perfectly right. They had only to look opposite for the proof of the accuracy of his prediction. He believed if the Conservative Party remedied this grievance, they would go down to battle at the next Election with a much greater prospect of thrashing the Liberals again, than if they left such a weapon in the hands of their opponents. For his part he did not want to possess such a weapon, but desired rather that justice should be done in the matter to the Nonconformists of England. He therefore trusted that the Government would hold out some hope of settling this painful question, and that, at any rate, they would abstain from doing one thing in the interest of the clergy of the Church—namely, that they would not give compulsory cemeteries in the several parishes, because in many parishes they were not needed; and that an undue amount of labour would be thrown upon the parishioners in raising a voluntary rate for the support of such cemeteries. The present Government had managed the country with very great efficiency, in many respects, during the last two years, and he hoped that it would find some way of redressing the grievance to which attention had been called, and so settle what was a miserable source of dispute. In conclusion, he begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the parish churchyards of England and Wales having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right, while making proper provision for the maintenance of order and decency, to permit interments in such churchyards either without any burial services or with burial services other than those of the Church of England, and performed by persons other than the Ministers of that Church,"—(Mr. Osborne Morgan,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the hon. and learned Member who has introduced this Motion to the notice of the House has stated that he would not, in any way, if he could possibly avoid doing so, offend the susceptibility of any hon. Member on whichever side of the House he might sit, and I am bound to give him credit for having through the whole of his speech, as far as it was possible for him to do so, kept faith with the declaration he at first made. But after I had heard that fall from the lips of the hon. and learned Member, I could not help remarking that his speech as it went on had wounded, and wounded severely, the susceptibilities of many persons who sat on this side of the House, and of some others, not by anything that he said, but by a great deal that he left unsaid, because he did not seem from the very beginning of his speech to the end ever to show that he duly appreciated either what were the objections of Churchmen to this measure, or how deeply they felt on this question. The hon. and learned Member apologized to the House for having put this matter in the form of a Resolution instead of a Bill. He quoted precedents to show that many things had been done in consequence of Resolutions that had been passed by this House. True; but if those precedents were examined, it would be found generally, if not always, that a Resolution was the commencement of debates upon the subject with which it was connected. It is almost unheard-of, after a subject has been debated year after year in the House of Commons, not by way of a Resolution, but by way of an actual Bill, that the Bill should be thrown over and a Resolution resorted to. Supposing for a moment, which I cannot believe, that this Resolution will pass, what object would be gained, and how much nearer legislation would you be? Although the hon. and learned Member could not find an early day on which to have the second reading of his Bill, he would have gained just as much by the discussion of the question on the second reading of his Bill, even at the end of July, as by the discussion of this Motion now. For even if this Resolution were to pass, no Bill formed upon such a Resolution would have a chance of passing during the present Session of Parliament. I think, therefore, that we might have been spared a discussion for the present, and that the hon. and learned Member might have taken a discussion in the ordinary course, when his Bill would have been brought forward for a second reading, however late in the Session that might have been. There are some great disadvantages in discussing the subject of a Resolution, especially when we have seen it in the shape of a Bill. On the other hand, there may be certain advantages in discussing a Resolution as against a Bill. It is very difficult, I know, to put details into a Resolution, although that is a course which is sometimes very convenient; but I wish to call the attention of the House for a short time to the Resolution which the hon. and learned Member has chosen as his own battle-field, and to the terms in which he has placed that Resolution before the House. He has prepared it with the greatest care and deliberation. It was put on the Table of the House some weeks ago. It did not satisfy the hon. and learned Member in its original form. It was deliberated upon and altered, and as it now stands it is in an entirely new form. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he altered it in deference to the wishes of some of his hon. Friends.] The hon. and learned Member confirms my statement that the Resolution in its original form was deemed to be unsatisfactory, and that for that reason he strove to alter it, and now that he has brought forward his amended Resolution he again offers to alter it; says that the preamble may be considered too menacing, and that he is willing to throw overboard his preamble altogether. That shows the difficulty of proceeding by a Resolution. The preamble of this Resolution is—

"That the parish churchyards of England and Wales, having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right." . .

So the hon. and learned Member starts with this proposition, not as a proposition of expediency, not as a proposition of what ought to be, but as a proposition of absolute right. Well, I will not enter at the present moment into a long discussion upon the law of his case. What I want to put to the House is, that we must see how far this proposition goes; and I venture to say that, in spite of all that has fallen from the hon. and learned Member, the absolute right to burials in a churchyard is precisely the same as the absolute right of any parishioner to have worship within the body of the church, and that if this Resolution passed, and another Resolution were presented to us, word for word the same as this, with the exception of the word "Church" being substituted for the word "churchyard," it would be absolutely impossible, if we are consistent with our votes, to resist the one and to pass the other. I know it may be said that every person must be buried, but nobody need go to church. That is another matter. We are not discussing the expediency of burying a man in a churchyard or not. We are discussing a question of right. Every parishioner has a right to service in church; but by the same law that gives him that right he is bound to have it according to the services which are there performed. The hon. and learned Member would make out just as strong a case for a Nonconformist to have service performed by a Nonconformist minister in a parish church, if he could show that in some towns no land was to be had on which to build a chapel; no money forthcoming to build the chapel; that there were many hours on Sundays during which the church was not used, and many days in the week during which it was closed; that for some reason or other it was the only church to which persons could go to for the purpose of worship, and that therefore the Nonconformists had a right to hold their services there at such times. But another point arises from the first words of this Resolution, and it is quite necessary to see to what extent it may be pushed in that direction also. The hon. and learned Member says—

“That the parish churchyards of England and Wales, having been by the common law of England appropriated to the use of the entire body of the parishioners, it is just and right.” . . .

I want to know to what churchyards the hon. and learned Member means the Resolution to apply. Does he mean to confine it to the ancient parish churchyards simply, which are scattered up and down throughout England, or does he mean to apply it to the churchyards in the district parishes which may be open at the present time? If he means the former, I think I shall be able to show that the Resolution would have very little effect, owing to the sanitary state in which many of such ancient churchyards now are. But if he means the latter, we all know that the number of parish churchyards—that is, of ecclesiastical district churches—in England has been multiplied enormously, independently of the ancient parish churchyards; I am thankful to say, especially of late years, not by rates, except in some cases, not by the State; but by gifts—by voluntary subscription for the good of the community at large. And yet the hon. and learned Member would say to the subscribers—“Although you have made large sacrifices in providing these churchyards for your own church, and for the benefit of those with whom you worship, according to your own services, I with a rough hand will take away all these churchyards.” There is to be no limit of time, according to the hon. and learned Member, in this matter; they are all absolutely to go. The Resolution goes much further than that; it means to say that for all time to come no member of the Church of England, however zealous he may be in the cause of his religion, shall be able to say he will give for the good of those with whom he worships a churchyard for the exclusive use of the services of the Church of England; and it would practically come to this, that members of the Church of England would be the only religious body who could not appropriate churchyards for the exclusive use of the services of their Church. You may talk about toleration, you may talk about liberty, but this would be the greatest tyranny that could be inflicted. Let us look once more at the first sentence of the Resolution—“The parish churchyards of England and Wales are by the common law appropriated to the use of the entire body of parishioners.” Yes, that may be, so long as they exist. So long as they exist parishioners may have the right of burial in the churchyards as they have to services in the churches; but when they cease to exist, what then? What becomes of your Common Law right when there is no Common Law obligation of the parish to provide a place of burial when they are full? A case happened in the course of last year which bears out the proposition I am laying before the House. In the borough of Northampton, by a very proper order of one of my Predecessors, all the churchyards were closed. They were closed about the middle of last July, and there is no power either by Common Law or by statute to compel any one of the parishes within that town to provide burial-places for any persons who may die within its limits. The only place where they can be buried at the present moment is in a private cemetery and in unconsecrated ground. If you want a grievance I grant you that this is one. There is not a single churchyard in Northampton in which persons can be buried in consecrated ground. There is no power to compel any of the parishes to provide burial-grounds, either consecrated or unconsecrated; and if the cemetery to which I have referred was filled to-morrow, there would practically cease to be a burial-ground for the town of Northampton. When in discussing this question stress is laid upon the Common Law right of people to be buried, those using the argument ought also to lay a considerable amount of stress upon the absence of either any Common Law or any statutable liability to provide grounds for the purpose. But, let me ask how long this great grievance has been felt; how long this terrible state of tyranny and oppression under which the Nonconformists are supposed to lie has been felt by them to exist? What did we hear of this grievance some 15 or 20 years ago? Why, simply nothing. It was a question never named, and I would ask whether Nonconformists of that day were less earnest, less zealous, or less enthusiastic in their cause than are the Nonconformists of the present day? Were they likely at that time, alive as they were to everything which concerned their interests, to overlook such an important matter as this if they then felt the grievance to exist? I venture to say confidently that not only did they not at that time say they had a grievance, but they did not even feel that they had one. If that was the case then, how much less cause for feeling a grievance have they now? Within the last 20 years the whole cemetery system has been called into existence. The hon. and learned Member has quoted from some Returns which have been laid before the House; and, if it be true, as has been said, that figures may be made anything of in argument, I am bound to say that a more extraordinary argument than that which has been adduced by the hon. and learned Member from these Returns I have never heard, even in this House. In 1866 a Return was laid on the Table of the House showing exactly the sums of money which had been borrowed for the making of these cemeteries, and the number of the cemeteries that had been established under the Burials Act. The number of cemeteries so established up to the year 1866 was 413, and the hon. and learned Member has stated that not more than five or six cemeteries have since been added yearly to the number. These Returns have not been carried down to the present time, but I hope they will be completed at an early date. If, however, the hon. and learned Member had consulted a book issued by the Local Government Board, he would have found that between 1866 and 1875, 235 cemeteries were opened, and that in the course of the year 1875-6 another 36 were added to the number, making 684 in all. Looking a little further into the question, it is necessary we should inquire as to the population to which these figures relating to the number of cemeteries refer. I have looked into the Returns relating to the population in the neighbourhood of these cemeteries, and for which the cemeteries are available. From these Returns I find that the cemeteries are available for no less than 14,000,000 out of a population of 22,000,000, and I may say that in arriving at this result I have taken figures which I believe to be under rather than over the mark. I am perfectly aware that the cemeteries are principally in the neighbourhood of large towns, but I am dealing with the general question of the existence or non-existence of a grievance; and I want to know how it came to pass that before the cemeteries were established we heard nothing of this grievance from the Nonconformists out of the 14,000,000 persons for whom the cemeteries are now available. But in addition to this, there are the available burial-grounds of the Nonconformists themselves. When the Bill was before the House in 1873 the Prime Minister quoted from Returns made by rural deans, and which showed that of 6,200 parishes to which the Returns related, 1,627 had Nonconformist burial-grounds. I do not profess that these Returns were absolutely accurate; but I may mention that the figures are, at all events, borne out by the Return just presented to the House, from which it appears that, out of 6,800 parishes from which Returns have been received, there are burial-places belonging to Nonconformists 2,230 in number; from which we learn that at the present time there is a Dissenting burial-ground in one of every three parishes. This shows, at any rate, that the grievance of which they now complain is a mere drop in the ocean compared with what it must have been, if indeed it had an existence, 20 years ago. There is another matter which must not be lost sight of in discussing this question. It is somewhat strange that in parishes which have both cemeteries and churchyards, and where the Nonconformists claim to be not less than half the population, the burials in consecrated ground are infinitely larger in number than those in ground which is unconsecrated, or in the burial-grounds exclusively belonging to the Nonconformists. The fact is that many Nonconformists—and I know this to be true of those living in the country districts—not only do not object, but actually prefer, that the Church service should be read at the burial of their dead. As a matter of fact, I may say, without fear of contradiction, that a great deal is said for the Nonconformists in reference to their alleged grievance in this House, but very little is said by themselves outside the walls of Parliament. A good deal has been said in the course of the debates on this question about the action of this House and of the Nonconformists, as a body, on the question of church rates. It has been said elsewhere as well as here, that at the present time the Nonconformists have much less reason to complain than they had heretofore, because it was they who entirely refused to maintain and keep up the churchyards. I do not wish to rely upon any such argument. I do not want to use an argumentum ad hominem; but I think I may use as an argument, without fear of contradiction, the fact that when we were engaged in discussing the question of church rates this burials grievance was never once named in all these hot discussions, and was, in fact, then never dreamt of. A great deal has been said about what has happened in other countries, and it has been urged that other countries have acted in a more generous spirit with reference to this question than England has. That may be so; but every country has its own history, and must be judged of by itself. As years have gone on these graveyards have clustered round our churches. New churches have been built; fresh districts formed; new graveyards added. Churchmen have been encouraged by the action of Parliament itself to proceed with the work of building churches and adding to them churchyards and parsonage-houses. When the money was contributed it was supposed by the donors that the funds were contributed absolutely for one and the same purpose. It is not possible, therefore, to deal with England as if it was a new or a foreign country, because old associations are gathered round these churches and churchyards, and are deeply seated in the minds of the people. I should like to say a few words on the position of Scotland in reference to this matter, as the case of Scotland has been quoted as a precedent in support of the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I think, on the other hand, that the case of Scotland is a precedent in the opposite direction. In the first place, there is in Scotland a Common Law obligation, which does not exist in England, to provide burial-grounds; and, in the second place, it frequently happens that the burial-ground is situated altogether apart from the church. In the third place, it is vested, not in the incumbent, but in heritors, and it has always been free from ecclesiastical dominion. The consequence of this is, that burial in Scotland is regarded as being a civil ceremony to a much greater extent than is the case in this country. And the burial service is almost always performed at the house, and not at the graveyard itself. The main difference, then, is, that in Scotland there is a statutory obligation to provide burial-grounds, which does not exist in this country. I grant that it is a precedent for making a statutory obligation on the parish to provide graveyards out of public funds, but not a precedent for saying that these churchyards in England which have been provided by private funds should be those graveyards. Then, again, the case of Ireland has been quoted, but I will show that that case does not apply. It is asked—Why do you not do in England as is done in Ireland? For Ireland you passed an Act in 1824 which enabled the clergyman to give permission to persons of all religious bodies to be buried with their own services. Well, that is true. The Act, however, was repealed, and permission was no longer required; and I certainly should not go to Ireland for a precedent in Church matters. Even if it were not for what I am about to show, the whole case of Ireland depended upon a wholly different state of things from that which exists here. The precedent is directly the contrary way. What happened in Ireland? There were in Ireland a great number of monasteries which were suppressed, but for which the people of Ireland entertained a deep religious feeling, and they were in the habit—contrary to law, I grant—of burying there, having no right to do so. They were in the habit also, thanks to the generous feelings of the Protestant clergy, of burying their dead in the Protestant churchyards from time immemorial. Well, when it was found that these were actually illegal acts, Mr. Plunket brought in a Bill, which afterwards became law, the object of which was—not to create an innovation in the law of Ireland, not to do something which had never been done before, not to grant new privileges; but, on the contrary—to legalize that which had always been done in practice: to remove penalties from those who continued their former practices. The Irish Act was brought forward to legalize that which had always been done; the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member, on the contrary, is brought forward to subvert that which has always been done. So far, therefore, from Ireland being a precedent in favour of the hon. and learned Member, it is a direct precedent against him. Well, I have said that conscientious scruples are always to be respected. But as, in other cases, conscientious feelings of Nonconformists have been respected, so, in this case, are the conscientious—equally conscientious—feelings of Churchmen to be considered. The Nonconformists say that the refusal to allow them to use their own services in a parish churchyard is a matter of bigotry and narrow-mindedness. But I want to know whether any Nonconformist Body has come forward, and has set any example of Christian charity of which they say so much, and said to the people of the Church of England—"We do not care whether you come to our places of burial or not. If you wish to bury there, we are willing that you should do so, although they are private grounds; but as a matter of convenience, and charity, and justice, and fairness—as a matter to show that we are really heart and soul in act what we are in word—we are quite willing that you should bury there, using your own service." I am not putting this, mind, as a matter of right—I am only speaking now of private grounds, in which I know that no public right can exist; but I am trying to test what would be, and what are the feelings of Nonconformists as to the performance of other services than their own in their own graveyards. But that is a question which, so far as I know, has only been considered in England by one body of the Nonconformists. I may be wrong, but theirs is the only case I am acquainted with. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, when this matter was last before the House, made certainly a very interesting and eloquent speech. He is a member of a body of Christians for whom I have the greatest respect, for the conscientious way in which they always maintain their principles. That Body may be looked upon, if any can be, as a body of simple persons who wish to be charitable in every direction. Well, they have discussed this question, not once, but twice, as a religious body—the Quakers I am speaking of. They are the Body of which Sir Morton Peto spoke so much when he brought forward his Bill in this House. Well, they discussed the question, and came to a resolution upon it in 1832, and they again discussed it, and, I presume, again passed the resolution in 1861. The resolution says—"Burials of persons not members of our society may take place in our burial grounds." Yes; but it does not stop there. That is not the whole resolution to which they came. It goes on—"Provided they be in all respects conducted as the burials of Friends are conducted." Why, Sir, that is the very point we are discussing. I claim, on behalf of the Church of England, precisely the same rights of feeling and liberty of conscience as the Quakers claim for themselves. I am not now speaking of ancient churchyards alone, but of those churchyards which have of late been given by gifts as Englishmen, and I hope that such will be given again and again for many years to come. But you go too far with your Resolution. You say it is just and right to provide those burials with services "other than those of the Church of England," and to be performed "by other persons than the ministers of that Church." To whom does that apply? How far would it go? You are not touching here Nonconformists only; you are breaking down the whole discipline of the Church. By a side-wind, as by a stroke of the pen, you are breaking down utterly the parochial system, for you are saying directly, in the teeth of the canon law and of the Act of Uniformity itself, not simply that the services in the churchyard may be said by Nonconformists, but by a member of the Church of England other than the minister who has a right to read it, and, if he likes, even by a layman. That is an extravagant proposition to put forward. But you also go too far in another direction. England has become of late years the great emporium of the whole world. In its great cities we have a vast number of the people of all nations and of all religions. Here you are opening a very wide door indeed. I quite agree that you must provide cemeteries and burial-grounds for them; but it does not follow that they are to be buried in the parish churchyards, each with his own foreign, and it may be unchristian, service. But you go further still. I grieve to say—I wish I could contradict it—that there are a great number of people throughout the length and breadth of the land who are of no religion, who scoff at religion, and who glory in their belief that this world is all, and that there is no world to come. They do not form a small or insignificant body, and they take care to make their sentiments known. I am not speaking of extravagant orations made at the grave. I am speaking of solemn services, if I may use the word solemn of any service held by them. I hold in my hand a book from which I will not read, but three-fourths of it consists of hymns, and at the end are special forms expressly written and published for services to be held at the naming of infants, at marriages, and at burials, and containing such doctrines as I am quite certain the hon. and learned Member himself would be the last to wish to be read, however solemnly, in any churchyard, and which I am quite sure the Nonconformists would not allow to be read in any churchyard of theirs. But let us look once more to the form of the Resolution to which we are asked to assent, what further says the Resolution before the House? The hon. and learned Gentleman has altered it, and it now runs, “permit interments in such churchyards;” then he has added, “either without any burial services, or with other services than those of the Church of England.” Sir, I hope no Member of the House will be deceived by that Resolution. A Resolution in those terms would pledge the House to nothing. If you pass it, you will be precisely where you are. The same question would remain to be determined—namely, whether the burials you are going to permit are to be without any burial service, or with a service other than that of the Church of England. Why, when the hon. and learned Member himself opposed such an alternative, he described it as being buried like a dog. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN: Not today.] That makes no difference. The hon. and learned Member did say so on a former occasion. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN assented.] I think it was paying a very poor compliment to the Scotch Members of the House who have been in the habit of burying their dead without services at the graveside—as the Scotch have done from time immemorial—to describe the mode of burial which has been used by some of the most religious people among the whole community—I mean the Scotch Presbyterians—as being buried like a dog. On the 21st of April, 1875, in moving the second reading of his Bill, the hon. and learned Gentleman said—

“I may, perhaps, in passing, be allowed to express my amazement that any three Members of this House should exhibit—I will not say so little knowledge of the feelings of Dissenters—but so little knowledge of human nature as to suppose this canine mode of interment can be accepted as a solution of the difficulty.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxiii. 1365.]

Therefore, when we come to vote on this Resolution let hon. Members think what they are asked to vote for. They are asked to permit funerals, either without any burial service at all or accompanied by burial services which are either those of the Church of England or other than the services of that Church; and I ask how hon. Members can vote for a Resolution of that kind which practically leaves the whole question in dispute in absolute uncertainty? I am sorry to have detained the House so long, but I must say one word more. Supposing this Resolution passed, you will not have accomplished the remedy for the disease. The real evil of the law of England is that there is no Common Law liability to provide a burial-ground. You may pass this Resolution and inflict upon a number of people a grievance that they will always feel, and then 20 years hence you will find that you have done less than nothing. Let hon. Members consider the vast increase in the population of this country during the last 20 years, and the increase which is likely to occur during the next 20 years, and, when the time comes that you will have to provide cemeteries for your teeming population, you will regret that you did not do this before you stirred up the feeling which would be undoubtedly excited if this Resolution were carried into effect. The hon. and learned Member has referred to some Papers which have been laid on the Table this morning, and which refer to the churchyards which have been closed during the last 20 years. These Returns were only issued this morning, and therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman may be excused if he has not had time to study all of them. The headings of the Returns refer first to churchyards that have been closed, and, secondly, to those which have been partially closed. The meaning of the term partially closed is, as a rule, that in certain deserted churchyards there are vaults belonging to particular families in which people may be buried for many years to come, and according to the terms of the Act the families of the persons are not put to the trouble of obtaining the consent of the Secretary of State. Yet, in the vast majority of cases, these burial-grounds are practically closed; and, therefore, instead of the number actually closed being 660 in the country and 123 in the district around London, we may fairly say that there are, in round numbers, 1,705 practically closed in the country and 208 practically closed around London. There is thus a total of almost 2,000 churchyards which have been closed since the Act of 1852-3. Since that time you will find a rapid increase of cemeteries, and also a rapid decrease of old churchyards, throughout the country. I will ask hon. Members on this side of the House and the other, who come from the country, whether they have looked at their own churchyards? Have they ever talked to the sexton of their churchyards? Have they ever noticed the sexton preparing to bury the dead, and burying them actually among the bones of the dead? Have not hon. Members noticed churchyards which have not the slightest right to be where they are—in the midst of populous villages, and fouling the water of wells in every direction? Within the last 20 years we have made great advances in all sanitary matters, and the more this matter is looked into the more necessary it will become to deal with it. Since I have held the office I have the honour to fill I have always regretted that the Inspector of Burial Grounds was attached to the Home Office, and not to the Local Government Board. I have only one Inspector; whereas the Board has Inspectors all over the country. These Inspectors know all that is going on, and I should like to see that office transferred without delay to the Local Government Board. There is much to be done without delay in this matter. There is much that must be done, and we are doing this. What ought to be considered is, how far we can clear away all these miserable ecclesiastical disputes, and how we can—not for the past or the present, but for the future—take care that the subject is dealt with in a broad, charitable, statesman-like spirit, which will not only provide for the interment of the dead, but for the comfort, health, and happiness of the living.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN; Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Cross) commenced his speech by finding fault with my hon. and learned friend the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) for having introduced this subject by means of a Resolution and by a criticism upon the form and terms of that Resolution. I hope, however, that we shall not be mystified or misled by that criticism. My hon. and learned Friend had, as the Home Secretary says, the choice of proceeding as he has elected to proceed, or of waiting probably until the end of July before the second reading of a Burials Bill could have been discussed. I venture to think that he has made a wise election in the course which he has taken, and that in spite of the able criticism of the Home Secretary, every hon. Member of the House will know that he is called upon to vote upon a plain and simple issue which we all of us understand. The right hon. Gentleman and my hon. and learned Friend have both referred to the statistics lately published upon this subject. Well, Sir, these statistics have encountered the usual fate of all statistics. They have been quoted by each side, and each side has proved its own case to its own entire satisfaction. Inasmuch, however, as this battle is not to be determined by statistics, I shall make no further reference to any argument to be deduced therefrom. There was, however, one remark of the right hon.

Gentleman to which I listened with the greatest surprise. He asked whether the Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend was intended to apply only to the old parish churchyards, or to graveyards attached to churches which had been built and endowed by English Churchmen and by them dedicated to the church. If the former, the case was of limited application; if the latter, how hard would it be upon those who had given land and built churches especially for Church purposes, that the Nonconformist should be allowed to share in the burial grounds. But surely, Sir, the answer is plain and obvious. Those who give land and churches to the National Church must be content that they should be held under the same conditions as those under which all other property is held by the same Church. You cannot in one breath claim all the advantages of being a National Church, and in the next demand the privileges of an exclusive sect. And so when the Home Secretary triumphantly asks whether Nonconformists would be willing to admit the clergy to bury within their burying grounds, what does his question imply? I do not know that the Nonconformists would refuse, for the question has never been, and is not likely to be, asked them. But when the Home Secretary asks it, and demands reciprocity on the part of the Nonconformists, what is he doing but that indeed to which his whole speech pointed—depreciating the Church of England as a National Church and putting her upon the level of a mere sect or denomination. I speak, Sir, as a friend to the National Church of England, and I cannot concur in this depreciation. The legal part of this subject has been already fully dealt with, and there is the less reason why I should discuss it since the Home Secretary has told us that he declined to go into the law of the question. It is not surprising that he should so decline, for only last year he admitted that for which my hon. and learned Friend contends—namely, the right of every parishioner to be buried within the churchyard of his parish. Now, Sir, as I have abstained from voting upon this subject for several years past, I am anxious to justify both that abstention and also the vote which I intend to give to-night. In former years I voted for several Bills having for their object an alteration of the Burial Laws, believing the issue involved to be but small, and the concession which was demanded one which might be made on behalf of the Church of England without any apprehension of evil result. But I abstained from voting when the question had assumed larger proportions, partly from an intense dislike to see religious battles fought upon the floor of this House, and partly from that which was perhaps a more valid reason. I thought I saw, on the part of those who opposed an alteration in the law, the indication of a desire to see the question settled upon some firm and reasonable grounds of compromise, if such could be found. I heard the grievance of the Nonconformists fairly and openly admitted—even last year by the Home Secretary himself in this House—I knew that the feelings of the clergy throughout the country were deeply stirred upon the subject, and I anxiously hoped that some settlement might be arrived at which, without doing violence to those feelings, might afford a remedy for the grievance, and at the same time remove from the arena of Parliamentary conflict a question which is to my mind one of the most painful which we ever have before us for discussion. But, Sir, these too sanguine expectations were destined to be disappointed. I am bound to say that during the last two years—that is, since the General Election—the attitude of the opponents of alteration has greatly altered, and altered, I am sorry to say, much for the worse. It is now constantly denied that the Nonconformists have any real or appreciable grievance; the resolutions which are passed at meetings of the clergy, or at conferences of clergy and laity, breathe only a spirit of “No surrender” and “No compromise.” I hold in my hand a pamphlet which bears the ominous title Shall we surrender? to which question the person who has sent it has affixed in large letters the answer “No,” and has also written upon the publication his or her opinion that it is “unanswerable.” Sir, this pamphlet is written by no extreme High Churchman, but by a clergyman of a different school—very well known and very estimable, and his views may be taken, I suppose, as those of a large number of Moderate Churchmen. It is written by Canon Ryle. He informs us that he is “what is called an Evangelical Churchmen.” He does not “regard English Dissenters as Schismatics and Samaritans!" He is "not ashamed to co-operate with Dissenters" in works of charity, and he has "No doubt that converted Nonconformists will be saved as surely as converted Churchmen." And then, in the very same pages in which he gives us these comforting assurances, he tells us that this is a "burning" and a "blazing" question, and exhorts us by no means to yield to the Nonconformist demand. "Better a thousand times resolve to stand firm, refuse to give up one inch of our line of defence, and prepare to fight out the Church's battle at once." Sir, I confess that the strong and stirring words of this belligerent divine fall somewhat unpleasantly upon my ears as an English Churchman. I cannot bring myself to consider those large bodies of English Christians, who do not conform to my Church, in the light of a hostile body against whom I am to do battle. I regard them rather as part and parcel of that great religious army which is waging war against the sin and ignorance which beset mankind. I look upon the Church of England in this country as the Regular Army, and the great Nonconformist bodies as the Irregular and Auxiliary Forces, and I hail with satisfaction any measure which by softening asperities, removing causes of jealousy, and engendering a feeling of equality between the different divisions of the Army may tend to promote, as such a measure must promote, the efficiency of the whole. But now, Sir, let us see what it is that the Nonconformists really demand, and in what kind of a manner that demand should be met. I put it in this way. They demand that the exercise of an admitted legal right should no longer be accompanied by conditions which in their eyes greatly diminish its value. And, Sir, allow me to say that it is now too late in the day to deny the existence of this legal right. You may rummage among old law books and obtain lawyer's opinions, as you can upon every question, one way and the other, but the Home Secretary himself admitted last year the legal right of a parishioner to be buried in the parish churchyard, and after the people of England have been educated in this belief for so long a time, it is too late to attempt to argue them out of it at this time of day. But, says the Home Secretary, a great deal about the grievance is said for the Dissenters in this House, and not by them in the country. Well, Sir, I am not fond of reading quotations to the House, but I will read a practical answer to the right hon. Gentleman from a letter placed in my hands only yesterday. The writer is a highly respectable Baptist minister. His father and mother had been between 50 and 60 years members of the Baptist Church at Bristol, and they then moved to Honiton, when the only available place of burial was the parish churchyard. Hear this gentleman's description of his father's funeral—

"Around my father's grave were their eldest son, superintendent of a Baptist Sunday-school—and two other sons, Baptist ministers, his only daughter, the wife of a Baptist minister, his son-in-law a Baptist minister, and a deputation from the Baptist Church in Bristol, of which my father had been for 54 years a member, and a Deacon for several years; and yet no minister of our own body could utter a word, nor were we allowed even to commit the remains in silence to the grave, but we were compelled to have a minister of another body to read the service. Can you be surprised if under the sense that we were compelled by law to have that and nothing else, the beauty of the service failed to comfort, and, indeed, could scarcely be recognized?"

He bears witness to the kindly behaviour of the officiating clergyman, and concludes in words which I think must touch hon. Gentlemen opposite as they touched me in the reading. He says—

"Would gentlemen connected with the English Church be satisfied with similar treatment, if the law prevented them from availing themselves of the services of one of their own clergymen and compelled them to call in a Baptist minister to bury their dead?"

Well, Sir, for this grievance, be it great or small, two remedies have been proposed to which I must now briefly allude. One is that of my hon. Friend the Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) who proposes public graveyards. What he says in effect is this—that sooner than allow the foot of that terrible animal, the Nonconformist minister, to enter the parish churchyard, or his voice to be heard therein, we will all of us be buried somewhere else. But there are two obvious objections to the proposition of my hon. Friend as a remedy for the grievance of which complaint is made. The first is somewhat of a sentimental character. The question is one surrounded with sentiment. And, Sir, the sentiment which induces a man to desire that after death his bones may be laid in the churchyard of his parish is not a sentiment exclusively of a religious character. There are associations of family, of locality, of tradition, which create the feeling, and these are associations of which the English people are especially susceptible. I am surprised that my hon. Friend who, as a Conservative, one would imagine anxious to cherish and preserve such associations, should be prepared at once to sweep away and ignore them all, if only by so doing he can keep the Nonconformist minister out of the churchyard. But the second objection is of a practical character. No doubt there are many churchyards overcrowded, although in many of these cases it is probable that contiguous pieces of land could be obtained at a comparatively trifling expense which would render them available for many years to come. But in a great many more instances the churchyards are amply sufficient for the burials required, and yet my hon. Friend—a Member of the Party who have been making the air ring with clamours for the reduction of local taxation—is prepared to inflict a new and costly machinery upon the ratepayers, and in order to keep the Nonconformist minister out, to lay upon local taxation this new burden, uncalled-for and absolutely unnecessary! Well then, Sir, there is another remedy proposed—namely, that which is called the remedy of silent services, with respect to which I at least have never used the disrespectful language of which complaint has been made by the Home Secretary. He seemed to forget, however, that there are two sets of circumstances under which silent services may be used. In the case of those religious Bodies whose practice it is to bury without religious service, and in certain individual cases in which for reasons upon which I need not enter, no service is desirable, I do not think any objection could or would be raised to the funeral being conducted without religious service. But the question we have to deal with is the case of those Nonconformist Bodies who do desire a religious service, but a religious service other than that of the Church of England. I go with your remedy so far as this—that I think to force the services of the Church of England upon persons who are unwilling to receive them is not only hard upon such persons, but degrading to the services themselves. But when you say to these persons—"Exercise your legal right without any service, and we on our part will forbear to compel you to hear our service as hitherto," I grant you are making a concession, though I think you have reduced concession to a minimum. But have you done nothing more? You have practically said to these people—"Your dead shall be buried in our churchyards because you have a legal right that it should be so." But at the moment of this interment—the saddest and most solemn moment to the friends of the dead—the moment of all others when men's hearts are softened and more than ever susceptible of the influences and impressions of religion—at that moment religion shall to you be dumb and you shall not be religious, unless you are prepared to be religious after our way and according to our fashion. Sir, I put it respectfully, but most earnestly to the House that this is not the way to strengthen the hold of the Church of England upon the affections of the people, or to conciliate men's minds to the Establishment! It is rather the way to estrange affection, to alienate sympathy, and to suggest, moreover, at a most solemn moment, a comparison between the claims of the Church on one hand and of religion on the other, which is little calculated to advance Church interests or to win love for the Establishment! Sir, there have been various minor objections taken to the demand which we are making to-night, which I need hardly notice. One, indeed, was urged by the Home Secretary, who laboured to prove that admission to the churchyards involved admission to the churches, and that the one demand would certainly govern the other. To this, Sir, I have only to say that when the question of admission to the churches arises, I shall be perfectly ready to discuss it upon its merits. But to concede to the demand now made is either right or wrong—just or unjust—and if it is right, I will not refuse to do that which is right to-day, for fear that if I do so, I may be asked to do something which I may think wrong to-morrow. But there are two main objections to the present demand with which I wish now to deal. They are those which we see constantly put forward at lay and clerical meetings upon this subject, and they deserve to be considered. The first is that concession to this demand would injuriously affect the status, the position, the influence of the clergy—the second, that it would subvert the principle of an Established Church. To show that I am correct in the statement which I am making, I must make one more quotation from our friend Canon Ryle. He says—

“The question is simply whether other persons than clergymen may assist at Nonconformist funerals.”

And, further on—

“We contend that to allow the ministers and members of other denominations to carry on religious services either in national churches or churchyards, is to dethrone the national clergyman from his position and to deprive him of his official privileges. If Mr. Morgan's Bill contained a single clause which fully recognized the rights and privileges which the clergy of the Established Church have enjoyed for three centuries, I might think differently of it.”

Now, Sir, I have the most sincere respect for the clergy of the Established Church. No doubt it occasionally happens that some clergyman whose zeal has outrun his discretion, adopts a line of conduct which brings scandal upon the Church, and is deplored by more discreet Churchmen. But take the clergy of the Church of England as a body, and you will find them men of exemplary habits, of remarkable purity of life, of great earnestness and great self-denial, diligently and faithfully doing their Master's work in their Master's vineyard. These, Sir, are men whose feelings I would not willingly hurt, and from whose status, position, or influence I would not detract one jot or one tittle. But does any one in this House seriously suppose that this would be the effect of concession to the demand we make to-night? The influence of the clergy is deservedly great—their position is universally respected. But why is this so? Not because of any assumption by them of sacerdotal authority in a country in which priestcraft is mightily unpopular; nor because they have by law a limited freehold in the churchyard which enables them to keep out the Nonconformist minister. No, Sir, their influence arises from the good, zealous, laborious work which they do among their people, and so long as the clergy of the Church continue to be what they are, it is not one concession nor fifty concessions of this kind that will ever shake their influence. But I venture to say that there is a danger to the clergy at this moment, and that danger comes from their own especial friends. If you have a concession demanded by the Nonconformists which a large number of the laity of the Church of England—aye, and as we know by a memorial presented to the Prime Minister only yesterday—no small number of the most enlightened among the clergy themselves are prepared to grant—I say that to tell me it is the great body of the clergy who stand in the way of granting this concession—to say that considerations of their dignity, their status, their influence—are to prevent us from giving what is asked, is to place the clergy in an invidious light before the country and to force them into a position from which their best friends should desire them at once to be extricated. But if you tell me that the principle of an Established Church will be subverted by this concession, I reply that you are treading upon dangerous ground. Here is proposed an alteration in the law which has already been sanctioned by repeated majorities in more than one House of Commons. Here is an alteration which will remove a grievance felt by many religious Bodies in this country, which will tend to a greater equality among English Christians, and which is asked in order to put an end to a state of things which produces irritation, bitterness, and ill-feeling, where only love and charity should prevail. Tell me that such an alteration is subversive of the principles of an Established Church, and I reply that you are putting a powerful weapon into the hands of the advocates of Disestablishment. Sir, for my part I have never been in favour of Disestablishment; I have spoken against it both in and out of this House, although I frankly admit that I do not fear it as it is feared by some. I have opposed it rather for the sake of the State than of the Church, and I am prepared to admit that much good as well as evil might result from it. But, Sir, Disestablishment will come when, and not before, the people of England desire it. It will neither be hastened nor retarded for one single moment by the course which you may adopt with this Resolution to-night. There are moments, Sir, it is true, when I begin to doubt whether the Establishment can be long maintained. But these are not the moments in which we are drawing nearer to the great Nonconformist Bodies of the country. When I see the clergy and laity of the Church of England wildly excited among themselves and angrily disputing whether at some especial moment a clergyman should turn to the East or to the West—or, when, again, I see some respectable layman held up to public odium because he is not quite satisfied with the clergyman's own particular Devil, then it is that I begin to doubt for the Establishment. But it is not such things as Burial Bills that will affect its existence. Sir, I am daily growing more and more convinced that, if the Establishment is to be maintained, it must be by widening its foundations and resting them upon a broad and liberal basis. We call ourselves the National Church. Let us be national in reality as well as in name. Let us speak words of love and charity to our Nonconformist fellow-countrymen in this matter of the national churchyards. Sir, if the answer to their demand upon this question were left to me I would give one both simple and easy. I would address the Nonconformists in some such words as these—"We differ indeed upon many points, but after all, we only differ as to the manner in which we should serve the same great Master. Let then, those differences end at the grave. Bring your dead under the shadow of our old church walls. Let the ministers of your religion speak words of peace and comfort to the mourners of their flocks, even as our clergy speak to us—and when the body of the dead man is laid in the grave, let us forget to ask whether he was a Nonconformist or a Churchman, and remember only that he was an English Christian!" Sir, to my mind these words would be words of wisdom—this course would not lessen but increase the authority of the Church, and, in my opinion, it is in this spirit that the question ought to be settled. Sir, this question can only be settled in one way, and no one knows that better than the Prime Minister himself. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is going to speak to-night. If he does, no doubt the eloquent words which he knows so well how to use, may rally round him a majority in the Lobby against this Resolution. But your majority will avail you nothing. On our side is the calm, still, strong force of a growing public opinion, which is slowly but surely tending to the settlement of this question. And it would not surprise me, in the slightest degree, if before this Parliament shall have run its course, the right hon. Gentleman will have settled this question as he has already settled other great questions, by introducing some measure which, while it is able to retain in his support that loyalty for which his Party is always so conspicuous, will practically yield to every demand which has been made from this side to-night. Well, then, Sir, let us strengthen the right hon. Gentleman's hands to-night by such a division as shall show him by no uncertain sign the real current of public opinion in favour of this Resolution. For myself I can have no doubt how to vote. If I thought this concession would in any sort or degree injuriously affect the clergy, I would hesitate long before I voted in its favour—if I thought it could in any way damage the Church, I could scarcely bring myself to support it—if I thought it could in any way prove injurious to religion, nothing should induce me so to vote. But, Sir, believing as I do that its tendency is to make the Church more truly national—believing that truth, justice and Christian charity alike demand the settlement of this question in the spirit of the Resolution of my hon. and learned Friend, I can have no hesitation in giving it a frank, a hearty, and a cordial support.

MR. W. C. BROOKS said, they had been reminded that the churchyards were the property of the nation, and in a former debate the expression had been used that it was desirable that those who held the purse-strings should have their way. But the holding of the purse-strings had been relinquished by the Dissenters long ago. When they urged the abolition of church rates their cry was that they had no part nor lot in the Church, and, therefore, they were not bound to repair the fabric or support anything belonging to it. But every parishioner had a claim far higher than a mere money payment. He had a right to the parish churchyard—not to build a house in it, not to browse his cattle there, but to demand burial according to the service of the Church of England. Of course, Parliament, which was all-powerful, might direct that an alteration should be effected in that service to please those who dissented from the National Church. No doubt, such a change would give pain to the Church, and it would be for those who sought that change to show why that pain should be inflicted. But many who did not share the feelings of the Church of England seemed not to understand how there could be any pain at all. An instance of that was unconsciously given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), when, in speaking last year in favour of the Burials Bill, he had occasion to use the word "consecrated," but so foreign to his notions was the conception of the idea conveyed by that expression, that he seemed not to remember what the word was, and they saw him turn to his neighbours to be prompted with it. Hence it was that those who ignored consecration could not be expected to understand the feelings of those who attached value to that act. They appeared not to be able to understand how deeply the feelings of a Churchman might be wounded when he saw his consecrated ground used by those who mocked at his belief. For they could not draw the line of prevention: in that matter there could be no compromise. No Dissenter would be satisfied unless the funeral service was performed by his own minister in his own way. No doubt the good taste of very many Dissenting ministers would prevent the introduction at the grave of the elements of controversy; but what guarantee had they for that? Take the case of a professed Atheist. According to the logic of the Resolution, that man would have the right to claim burial in the parish churchyard, having previously cunningly arranged that an opportunity should be taken to disseminate his detestable doctrines. Many other such scenes might be readily imagined which would give pain to the Churchman, occurring, as they must do, on the very soil of which he had been for centuries the sole guardian. Before such a state of things could be permitted to exist, there must be shown to be in the country a majority of dissentients from the National Church so great as to make the number of her adherents comparatively insignificant. They had not arrived at that state—and he hoped they never would—in which the Church had lost her hold over the hearts of her members or forfeited her claim to have her rights respected and her feelings consulted. What, then, was to be done in the meantime? The Dissenter must abide by the consequences of his Dissent. Whenever a man took a course of action opposite to that of a majority of his fellows, all experience showed that he must pay for it somehow; and therefore let him enjoy his acquired liberty of action without looking back to the privileges he had voluntarily relinquished.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MR. W. S. ALLEN: I was anxious to say a few words on this question, as I happen to belong to one of the great Nonconforming Bodies of this country, and a Body which is, perhaps, interested more than any other in the settlement of this question. I allude to the Wesleyan Methodists. Now it is well known that the Wesleyan Methodists have always been, as a rule, men of moderate political opinions. We have had very few violent politicians amongst us. The Wesleyan Methodists have also had no hostile feelings to the Church of England. Many of them are even at the present day men of Conservative views, and men who are in favour of the union of Church and State. But I am bound to say that on this question an almost unanimous feeling exists among them in favour of the principle embodied in the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. Now, when a great Nonconforming Body like the Wesleyan Methodists, and a Body which has always been remarkable for the moderation of its political views, and its kindly feeling to the Established Church; and a Body which numbers in England alone no less than 354,000 members, and has upwards of 1,000,000 regular hearers every Sunday in its chapels, asks, with almost united voice, this House to redress a grievance it complains of, I think its request is well worthy the attention of the House of Commons. And, after all, it is a very small boon we ask. It is simply that we may bury our dead in the old churchyards of this land, with our own simple funeral rites, performed by our own ministers. The grievance we complain of was very forcibly brought before me some two months ago, when it was my painful duty to follow to the grave a near relative of my own, who had been for many years a Wesleyan Methodist. She was followed to the grave by two Wesleyan ministers, and by about 40 other Wesleyan gentlemen; but those ministers could take no part in the service. Would it not have been more consonant to the feelings of the mourners who followed her to the grave, if the magnificent service of the Church of England, to which I, for one, have no objection, had been read over her grave by one of her own ministers, and would it not have been a graceful and kindly act in you to have permitted such a thing to be done? I admit that in her case the grievance was not so keenly felt as it might have been; because, fortunately, the clergyman of the parish in which she lived is a man of kindly and liberal views, and he and the other clergyman who performed the funeral rites were both her personal friends. But supposing she had lived in a parish where the clergyman had been a man of extreme Ritualistic views, who had regarded her as a Dissenter with feelings of dislike and loathing, would it not have been most painful to us to have seen her consigned to the tomb by a man who looked on her with contempt and scorn? ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members may cry "Oh, oh!" but when I see speeches like that of the Rev. Mr. Hugo, who spoke of our dead as the "carrion of Dissent," I think I have some foundation for what I say. And unfortunately there are a number of the clergy of the Church of England—and, I am sorry to say, a rapidly-increasing number—who do look on Dissenters with feelings of ill-concealed contempt and loathing. This boon we ask cannot injure the Church of England. The Church of England is strong, perhaps stronger at the present moment than she has ever been before. It is the part of the strong to be just and generous. And I appeal to the Churchmen who sit on the opposite benches to grant us this little boon, and generously to redress this grievance of which we complain. And I ask them to concede to us this small demand, based, as I maintain it is, on justice and equity, that our bodies, whenever our Creator shall call us to die, may be laid in our graves in those beautiful churchyards in which generations of our forefathers are sleeping, with our own simple funeral rites, performed by one of our own ministers.

MR. GRANTHAM, in opposing the Resolution, said, it appeared entirely superfluous on his part, or on that of any hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House, to say a single word in reprobation of the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman after the exhaustive speech of the Home Secretary; but he did wish to point out the error of those who supported it, when they maintained that there was a difference between the church and the churchyard. In his argument on that point the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire laboured under a great fallacy, and if that fallacy could be cleared away there would be much less difficulty in coming to a conclusion on the whole subject. He admitted that if a Common Law right could be shown on the part of every parishioner to be buried as he liked in the parish churchyards, then one would have no right to force him, as it were, after he was dead, into Church by reading over his body the Church service. But he joined issue with the hon. and learned Member upon the point, and held that it was unjust to accuse Churchmen of intolerance and bigotry in requiring that the service of the Church should be read over those who were buried in the parish churchyards, or, at any rate, that the matter should be placed under the control of the minister of the church. He denied that there was any such Common Law right as that to which reference had been made, and he challenged the hon. and learned Member to prove it. It was true that in later times it had not been the custom, where cemeteries or private burial places had been established, to bury people who differed from the Church in the churchyards; but that was not because they had any Common Law right to perform any service they chose, but because it was thought desirable to permit the interment in those burial places on the ground of necessity and decency, and as they were not in any way connected directly with the Church there was no reason why, if the friends of the deceased preferred it, the service should not be treated as a civil, instead of a religious service. For this reason the dual burying-grounds of consecrated and unconsecrated ground were provided. Touching on the history of legislation upon the subject of burial, he would point out that grounds acquired under recent Acts of Parliament for the purpose of increasing the churchyard in any parish went through the ceremony of being consecrated as belonging to, and as being part of, the Church. In all the cemeteries which had been formed throughout the country a portion of the ground was invariably left unconsecrated, and for what purpose? It was because Nonconformists and Dissenters, at any rate a great many of them, did not think it right that they should be buried in consecrated ground. What they were doing, therefore, with respect to the Resolution, was to ask Parliament to unconsecrate the parish churchyards of England. The whole principle of legislation with regard to our parish churchyards had been from the first that they were part and parcel of the Church of England, and it had been thought necessary for the discipline of the Church that they should be under the control of the parish minister, subject also to the control of the Ordinary or the Bishop. It would, therefore, be very inconsistent for a Dissenting minister to be permitted to perform a burial service who was in no way subject to the control of the Bishop or Ordinary. He strongly objected to any alteration in the present law in reference to the parish churchyards; but he should be happy to assist in altering our present form of burial service to make it more in consonance with the views of Nonconformists, if it could be shown that there was any real objection to the language or any of the expressions in that service inconsistent with the religious feelings of a Nonconformist.

Mr. WALTER said that the question was one in which he had taken a deep interest for years. When the proposal to open the churchyards was first introduced to the House, he, in common with most Churchmen, felt considerable difficulty in entertaining it; but year by year as the discussion advanced he had seen reason to shape his views in harmony with those of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). He had unfortunately been absent from the House when the hon. and learned Member introduced the subject, and he was unaware what line of argument he had pursued; but he certainly thought the hon. and learned Member was to be congratulated on the happy accident—if the expression might be used—which had obliged him to substitute his present Resolution for the old

Burials Bill with which they had been acquainted for so many years. The Resolution seemed to him to raise the question in a more convenient form, asserting as it did a broad principle, which if it did not solve the whole difficulty of the case, at all events laid a foundation for its future and final settlement. He had heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and, although it was an able and eloquent exposition of the views he might naturally have been expected to entertain, it did not appear to be at all a convincing reply to the main proposition involved in the Resolution before the House. He would not enter into any antiquarian digressions, however interesting that branch of the subject might be, as to the origin of churchyards and their connection with the Church on the one hand, or as to the grievance of Dissenters on the other. To enter into the history of grievances was at all times an unprofitable task. It appeared to him to be a much more practical matter to consider whether they had any real existence in fact and reason, and whether they were such as under existing circumstances ought to be entertained. Now, the broad question on which he rested his vote was this; and if the House would do him the favour of listening to him for a minute or two, he thought he should show how this question, which was capable of being spun out into speeches of very great length, lay within a small compass, indeed, and was reducible almost to within a nutshell. Already they had advanced to this point; his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire had at least the right to take credit for this fact—that he had forced upon the country and the Government the necessity of contemplating the whole question of burials. That was of itself no small point gained; and when they found the clergy in diocesan conference and in Convocation were taking up the question and discussing the necessity of providing public cemeteries, they might conclude they had advanced a stage towards the solution of the question. His belief was that the question, fairly examined, resolved itself into this—namely, inasmuch as cemeteries were by universal consent an impending necessity, an arrangement which must sooner or later be made—whether during an interval of 20, 50, or it might be 100 years—the churchyards

(and in that term he included not only the old parish churchyards, but the churchyards of modern churches) should be declared to be cemeteries for all public purposes. That was, he believed, the real point, and the whole question they had to decide by their vote. His answer to that question would be distinctly in the affirmative. He looked upon interment as a civil right which necessarily belonged to every human being. Every one sooner or later came to die, and he had the civil right of interment. It was not in accordance with public policy that people should be left to find burials for themselves in holes and corners, in gardens, fields, or ditches. The policy of State required that there should be a public place of interment common to the parishioners, and that right being once granted, it seemed to him to follow as a matter of natural justice that the burials should be attended with such services as might be in accordance with the wishes and feelings which had been entertained by the deceased, or with no service if that were the wish. He might shock some minds if he carried this doctrine to its extreme length; but the more he had considered this question, the more he believed that any restrictions upon the mode of interment or upon the service connected with it, except such as were considered necessary by the State for the preservation of public order and decency and the observance of sanitary conditions, were unreasonable in themselves and impossible to defend by argument. Of course, he was bound to go to the full extent of that argument. He had thought at times that there might have been a compromise, and he believed a large section of the House was willing to see a compromise effected; and, for all he knew, Dissenters themselves were willing to see the question compromised, by having the service conducted by a minister, the reading of passages of Scripture, and hymns. He thought, whether a man were a Protestant of any denomination, or an unbeliever, or a pagan, or a Turk, or even a Malay, such as had been referred to, so long as nothing was done which would shock public decency and the feelings of the public at large he had a right to that mode of service. That was the principle he was prepared to defend, and which all the Burial Bills naturally led to. They heard a great deal spoken of the hardships that would be inflicted upon the feelings of the clergy and the feelings of the laity by allowing and tolerating other services than those of the Church of England in consecrated churchyards; but the more he considered this the more it vanished into thin air—into words. How his feelings should be hurt, even in the case of a churchyard which he had given to the Church for the burial of Church people, by the burial of some other person in that churchyard he really found it impossible to say. He could not reduce it to substance. This he would admit, that no possible hardship that could be felt by the clergy or imagined by them as growing from the permission of other services than those of the Church of England in the churchyards could for a moment be compared with the hardships of their present position in performing the service over those for whom it was not suited. He believed this was a hardship which clergymen of tender consciences felt very deeply. With regard to the consecration of the churchyard, he had never been able to make out what virtue consecration imparted to the soil beyond that of separation for certain purposes. The consecration of a churchyard set it apart for the purpose of burial, but what virtue it communicated to the soil so as to render it fit only for the burial of Church people with the service of their Church, and not fit for Dissenters with their service, he was unable to understand. What must be the case of the unfortunate people who died at sea? Take the case of a line-of-battle ship in which 100 sailors were killed. There might be men of all denominations—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, &c., among the dead, but they were not thrown into the sea without service. The chaplain would read the service over the bodies of the Episcopalians; but if a Dissenter asked to be allowed to say a prayer over a comrade, a request so natural and reasonable would not be refused. What loss such persons could sustain because the sea had not undergone the ceremony of consecration he was totally at a loss to understand. The whole case appeared to him to lie within the smallest possible compass. He had made up his own mind that the only way to treat this question was to recognize the churchyard as the burial place of the parish in default of a cemetery. He, for one, would not vote for the compulsory extension of the churchyard; but supposing a churchyard, as many of them were, crammed full of corpses, utterly unfit to be used, in a shocking, neglected, and, he might almost say, disgusting state, savouring little of the odour of sanctity or consecration, he would not permit it to be extended, but in such cases he would have compulsory powers given to the parish to take grounds for a cemetery; and in the meantime, in the absence of such a place, he would have the churchyard declared to be the burial place of the parish and used for that purpose. If the clergy could only be got to look at the question from that point of view—and he knew many of them had looked at it in that light, for he had discussed it with them at diocesan meetings—they would take a much more simple and natural view of the case. He had considered the question merely from a general and abstract point of view, but he might say it was not merely a Dissenter's grievance. He thought that Churchmen had a grievance, too. By the law as it stood, a child of a Churchman, equally with a Dissenter, if it died unbaptized could not be permitted to have any funeral rites performed over it. If he had the misfortune to lose a child which was unbaptized, he should consider it a great hardship—something unnatural and hurtful to his feelings—that he should not be allowed himself, with the friends who accompanied him, to say a few words of prayer coming into his mind suitable to the occasion. He should consider that a great hardship, and he should wish such a state of things to be remedied. He should only add that it was his intention to follow his hon. and learned Friend to a division, hoping, whether the Resolution were carried or not, that the subject would receive general attention throughout the country, and by this means lay the basis of some solid legislation.

MR. STOPFORD SACKVILLE said, that after an unbroken silence of several years, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he said a few words on a subject which, to him, as an Englishman and as a county Member, was peculiarly interesting. He said "as an Englishman" because Scotland and Ireland were not included in the purview of the Resolution, and "as a county Member" because, in consequence of the multiplication of cemeteries throughout the country, this question was of more importance to scattered populations and retired villages than to towns having a large urban population. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House (Mr. Walter), who had such weight and character, and who, he might say, had been a counsellor in the Church of England for so many years, should have given his voice contrary to the side which he was there to advocate. It appeared that the hon. Gentleman objected to all services in the parish churchyards, and wished an Act of Parliament to be passed for the purpose of turning all churchyards into cemeteries. In former years, when advocating his Bill, the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire used to introduce instances of hardship where clergymen of the Church of England had acted in a bigoted and sectarian spirit in refusing burial to the bodies of Dissenters. Now, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed rather to have dropped those illustrations, probably because they were not sufficiently numerous to afford a standing ground for his argument. The Resolution asked permission for interments without service, and he (Mr. Sackville) believed the Government would have no objection to that; but objections to silent funerals came principally from the hon. and learned Gentleman's supporters, such as the right hon. Member for Sandwich. The alternative was a service other than that of the Church of England. The Resolution, if only the word "yards" were expunged from it, would open the parish church to all sects and denominations; and if that were done, how could we stop at religious Dissenters? Considering the enormous population which owed allegiance to Her Majesty, there was no reason why savage islanders should not come to England, settle in a parish, and demand the rights conceded to religious Dissenters. Again, sectarian differences were not so completely extinct in this country that we need have no fear of tumults if a crowd of people of different denominations assembled in a churchyard, and now, in the event of a disturbance, we could not say that the damage should be repaired out of the church rates. The House had been told that there was no logic in the opposition to this Resolution. He maintained, on the contrary, that the position of the Nonconformists in this matter was politically untenable since the abolition of Church-rates, and that the Disestablishment of the Church must logically result from throwing the churchyards open to all denominations. They knew from the Returns that the Nonconformists were themselves in possession of considerable endowments and revenues, but they wished also to have the fortunes of the Church divided among them. He thought that first of all they should bring their share of the property into hotch-pot. As a matter of fact, the Bill for which this Resolution had been substituted, claimed for Nonconformists privileges which were not allowed to Churchmen, because the former would have an opportunity of choosing their own minister and selecting any service they pleased. But the same law which allowed Nonconformists to have chapels permitted them to have burial grounds; and if they had not chosen to avail themselves of this privilege to a sufficient extent, the circumstance only showed that in the good old times they had no objection to be buried in the parochial churchyards with the Service of the Church of England. Members, however, on that (the Ministerial) side of the House who supported the Bill of the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) were not only willing that Nonconformists should have their own chapels and burial grounds, but that whenever a reasonable proportion of the population desired it, cemeteries should be provided at the expense of the rates. If the proposal of the hon. Member for West Kent were adopted it would be a hardship on Churchmen to this extent, that they would have to support these public cemeteries in addition to their own churchyards, but he believed they would be ready to do this in order to relieve the Dissenters of any substantial grievance. Last year the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) made what all felt to be a most touching appeal upon this question, but he also gave up his argument when he said that in Scotland the churchyards "are not—what do you call it?—consecrated." Such a remark displayed ignorance of the feelings of English Churchmen, who were not attached to the churchyard, merely because it was consecrated by a certain form of prayer, but because their ancestors were buried there, and it had become sacred by the tears of generations of mourners. If, however, from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman, there was no difference in the minds of Dissenters between consecrated and unconsecrated ground, why seek to filch from Churchmen a cherished possession—their parochial churchyards? No doubt the time would come when the wolf would lie down with the lamb, but when the wolf began shearing the lamb, and then proceeded to eat its hay, the lamb would not much appreciate the companionship of the wolf. The Nonconformists said there were national churchyards, of which they must have their share. He should rather say the churchyards were parochial property, set apart for special purposes by landowners and Church-founders; but, granting that they were national property, the enjoyment of such property was subject to conditions. Here the condition was the right of the clergyman to read the service of the Church. Dr. Farr, in a letter appended to the Report of the Registrar General, said the question of interment was a question not of sectarian grievance, but of public health; and, speaking of some of the rural churchyards, he said the graves there were becoming thick, and the charm was fast vanishing. It was not, therefore, so desirable in the interests of public health to promote additional funerals in the churchyards, and the proper remedy was not in throwing open our parochial churchyards more widely than before, but rather in providing additional facilities for the multiplication of cemeteries. He could not help thinking that the speech of the Home Secretary pointed to some measure of this kind; but however that might be, he denied that he and those who thought with him were defending an indefensible position. In his opinion, the defenders of the Church required steadfastness rather than compromise. They were not the first to begin this strife; but, if it was to be renewed, he did not see why the victory should be on the side of the minority. The defenders of the Church might apply to themselves the language of the Royal Proclamation upon the transfer of the Indian Government to the Crown—

"We desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and, while we will permit no aggressions on our dominion or rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachments upon the rights of others."

Mr. Stopford Sackville

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER: I am sorry, Sir, I did not hear the whole of the observations of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Sackville), but I am bound in honesty to state that what I heard seemed to me to tell more in favour of the Resolution before the House than in favour of the views the hon. Gentleman intended to take. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of the hallowed associations connected with a churchyard; he has referred to family feelings and to the sacred memories attached to the graves of the dead. I will ask the House—are these feelings and associations confined to members of the Church of England? Is it to be argued that in the case of a Dissenter whose father, and mother, and brethren are Church people, and who has himself become a Dissenter, owing perhaps to the extravagant views of the clergyman of the parish, it is unreasonable for him to ask that when he dies his body shall be laid beside those of his relations? I should not have presumed to trespass on the time of the House in this debate if it had not been that Scotland has been very freely referred to in the course of it. I am glad that Scotland has been referred to, for if the argument which can be adduced from the practice in that country is of any avail whatever, I think I shall be able to show the House that it is entirely in favour of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has left his place, for he made very full allusion to the practice in Scotland, and it seems to me that it would have been better for the arguments of that right hon. Gentleman if he had omitted that portion of his speech which referred to Scotland. It seemed to me that all that portion of his speech told far more against the point which he desired to show and impress upon the House than in favour of it. Now, Sir, the practice and the law of Scotland have been correctly stated by my right hon. Friend. According to the Common Law, the heritors are bound to provide churchyards and burial-places, and my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Osborne Morgan) although he did not state it, must know that that it is according to the ancient Scottish statutes, dating so far back as 1560 and 1563, by which the management and control of the parochial churchyards in Scotland were vested in the heritors, and these Acts continued in force until the Burials Act of 1855. The Home Secretary has pointed out to the House very fairly that, both by the ancient Scottish law and by the more modern Scotch statute, the control of the churchyards in Scotland was entirely removed from the ecclesiastical dominion. ["Hear, hear!"] I presume to ask the right hon. Gentleman, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just cheered my last sentence, whether, by any possibility, there can be any connection between the fact that the control of burial yards in Scotland is taken from the ecclesiastical dominion, and the fact that the conduct of burials in these churchyards is entirely free from the vexatious restrictions which we find imposed upon churchyards in England? I wish my right hon. Friend had been in his place to answer this question. The case is very much stronger than he has put it; not only is there entire freedom of service in churchyards in Scotland to every parishioner, but by an ancient decision given by an eminent Scottish Judge, every inhabitant of a parish in Scotland has a right to be buried in the parochial churchyard. My hon. and learned Friend has provided, both in the Resolution before the House and in the Bills which he has so frequently brought in, that there should be safeguards against improper services in the churchyards. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member who says "no" may not possibly have had a seat in this House a few years ago; but if I recollect rightly, the Bill I refer to provides that only the reading of Scripture and prayer, and a singing of hymns, should be permitted. [Mr. ORR EWING: There were no safeguards offered.] I am coming to that. You make the assertion in the face of Bills in the clauses of which safeguards are provided for. I accept the challenge of my hon. Friend. I believe I shall have arguments to adduce which will have some weight with the House. I conceive it is not unwise to say to the House that every proper safeguard shall be provided against improper services; but how does the case in Scotland stand? It stands thus—every parishioner and inhabitant, by the Act of 1855, has a right to be buried in the parochial churchyard. I need not say to the House that there is no restriction applied, or desired to be applied, to the performance of the burial services in these churchyards by the Church of Scotland, and I may be allowed to say that there is no section of Scotchmen who will more keenly oppose any attempt to sever the tie that binds Dissenters or Seceders to the Church by the means proposed by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) than the members of the Established Church of Scotland. All services are allowed in the churchyards of Scotland, and although the Home Secretary seemed to make light of it, I respectfully submit to the House that having regard to our ancient prejudices in Scotland, which I am happy to say we have very much outgrown, it is not a thing to be treated lightly by the House when I say that the services of the Roman Catholic communion and of the Episcopal Church are conducted in the parish churchyards of Scotland in full canonicals, and that there never has been, and I believe there never will be, the slightest objection made on the part of the members of the Church of Scotland, or by any other person in that country. And now I come to the question of safeguards, on which subject I am not the least afraid to meet my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing). As to the entire absence of safeguards, I may mention that only a few months ago I was in communication with a distinguished Scotch divine, whose name I do not feel at liberty to mention. I asked him if there had ever been any differences in consequence of the entire freedom of the service read over the bodies in the churchyard, and he replied in words somewhat to this effect — “I believe you may search the records of all the Presbyteries of the Church of Scotland, from the days of John Knox down to the present day, and I do not believe one single case of impropriety over a grave or at a funeral can be found.” But are not hon. Gentlemen on the other side traducing their own kith and kin? Are they not casting a reflection upon their own countrymen? Is it that Scotchmen are so infinitely superior in common sense to Englishmen? [“Hear, hear!”] I am glad to hear hon. Members on the other side cheer in that way, and I accept the compliment paid to my country. I would rather think, however, that England is to some extent on a par with Scotland. If any

hon. Gentleman thinks not, do not let them say that I run down his countrymen, for the reflection has been cast by their own countrymen. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary brought out a book, which I am exceedingly glad to say he did not read, and this, he said, had been put forward by those who do not believe in the Divine Being, and who enunciate certain horrible and monstrous doctrines. Well, Sir, we are not all good people in Scotland, although I think the large proportion of the people of that country are very estimable. From the nature of the case there may be some such persons in Scotland as the Home Secretary describes as existing in multitudes in England. Well, will you believe it, there is not a single word in any statute, law, or provision with reference to burials in Scotland which has reference to safeguards. I have said that I should be quite willing for my hon. and learned Friend to appoint a safeguard, but when I am challenged by the statement that he proposes to throw away all safeguards, I say he is only proposing to do that in England which for 300 years has been done in Scotland. I submit that that is a fact which the House should take into its most careful consideration. I admit that there is some power of control over burials, but I affirm that for 300 years that power has not been used. Then there cannot be such a difference between the state of things on one side of the Tweed and on the other that that which has been enjoyed for 300 years by every sort of Dissenter on one side, cannot be enjoyed on the other. I do not think that a very strong case was made out by the Home Secretary in his speech. One part of it was very remarkable. He said that even admitting that a Dissenter has a right to be buried in the parish churchyards, what are you to do in the case of churchyards that have been subscribed and paid for and erected by the Church of England and by private benefactors. It is a monstrous thing, he said, that private individuals should spend their money in this way, and that the Dissenters should have use of the churchyards. The right hon. Gentleman opposite appeared proud of the state of things which existed in his own Church; but I must say I should not be proud of it if it were mine, if such an argument was needed to support it. Does no other

Established Church build churches or establish churchyards besides the Church of England? I have here a statement showing the number of parish churches endowed by private members of the Church of Scotland during the past five years, and I see from that that the Endowment Committee of that Church during the period I have mentioned succeeded in creating 150 new parishes. This left many districts still unprovided for, and a plan for the endowment of 100 other parishes was therefore proposed.—I commend this statement to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) sitting on the back benches on this side, who once described the Church of Scotland as a “patient who was dying, and could not bear the knife.” I have long ago forgiven him for saying that.—The plan was put into practice, and its success has far exceeded even the most sanguine expectations. During the first four years there were 65 churches erected, so that the total number of churches built by private means is 215. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will say (for if the argument is good for England it is good for Scotland), what a monstrous thing that after the Established Church has been expending all this money, sufficient to endow 215 churches, a Dissenter is to come forward to claim to be buried in a churchyard (although in all cases there are not churchyards attached to the parishes). I should scorn to put forward such an argument, to say that because we have raised the money for the establishment of these churches, we will not allow a Dissenter to be buried in them. I do not think the Church of England has fallen into very good hands to-night. As far as I can see, all its friends are on this side of the House. My right hon. Friend has made a speech, one similar to which I trust I may never hear made in defence of the Church of Scotland, and I have heard other speeches all tending to represent the Church of England in this matter as desirous of maintaining a position of narrow exclusiveness. I may tell hon. Members on the other side of the House that I am a Churchman, and that I wish to see the Church of England maintain her influence and increase her hold on the confidence and affections of the people of the country; but may I express my opinion that the action of some of the dignitaries, and some of the clergy, and many of the laity of that Church is doing much to sap the foundations of the Establishment—has done more to sap those foundations than all the proceedings of the Liberation Society during the past five years. If we are to have a National Church, it must be a comprehensive Church; and if the hon. Member on the other side (Mr. Orr Ewing) desires to see the Church of England maintained in a national position, he must save her from the action of those who would induce her to pursue a course of narrow-minded bigotry. It is ridiculous for Church people to suppose that all Dissenters are their sworn enemies. That is far from being the case. Many of them, I believe, in whatever they do to affect the Church are actuated by friendly motives, and I believe that many would not take a step against the Church, if they were not driven to it. [“Oh, oh!”] I believe what I say to be the case. The condition of the Establishment would be much more satisfactory if my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Orr Ewing) and some of those over-zealous Friends of the Church would hold their hands. If my hon. Friend votes with the Government on this question, he will feel very uncomfortable all the time he is in the Lobby, and he will be still more uncomfortable when he presents himself before his constituents to give an account of his stewardship. [“Oh, oh!”] I do not mean to say that he is guilty of any unworthy motives, and the House, and he, I trust, will excuse me if I have said anything unpleasant to him. I shall be very much surprised when we come to see the Division List to-morrow, if we do not find that many Scotch Members on the Ministerial side have found it convenient to go to bed early to-night. In the interest of plain truth and honesty I wish to see this question settled, and I hope it is not too much to expect the Prime Minister to settle it, although he did say a few days ago that he would give the Resolution his most staunch and uncompromising resistance. [“Hear, hear!” from the Ministerial benches.] I should not cheer too much if I were hon. Gentlemen opposite, because there is no knowing what the right hon. Gentleman may do. I have no doubt he has too much the interest of the nation at heart to pay any attention to cheers which come from only a section of his party, and, I say, I hope that it is not too much to ask Her Majesty's Government to make up their minds to deal with this question in a bold and comprehensive spirit.

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in whose name an Amendment to the Resolution stood upon the Paper, said, he recognized with much pleasure the honourable spirit which had been exhibited by hon. Members opposite in their conduct of this debate, more especially when it was considered it was a question with regard to which strong views were held. The hon. and learned Member who had introduced this subject had on former occasions given the House rather impassioned diatribes against the course adopted on this question by the Church of England, but he had now shown a moderation that he hoped would lead to a settlement of this dispute. In order to bring about a satisfactory settlement—a step which he ardently desired to see effected—it was necessary in the first place to fully recognize the position of the Church of England, and also that of the Dissenters, with regard to this subject; and, secondly, to recognize its sanitary aspect. He had been quite convinced by the speech of the Home Secretary that, for the sake of the health of the population, most of the old churchyards should be closed with as little delay as possible, and with that belief he had given Notice of the following Amendment to the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman, which the Forms of the House would not permit him to move—

"That, considering the crowded state and insufficient area of many churchyards, it is desirable to make more general provision for the supply of public graveyards; such provision to be made by a cheaper and more simple method than that which is afforded by the provisions of the Burial Acts."

He had already brought before the notice of Parliament a Bill intended to provide greater facilities for the establishment of burial-grounds, and in so doing he had, perhaps, incurred the wrath of several hon. Gentleman with whom, as a rule, he acted; but he hoped, before the Bill proceeded much further, to secure the assistance of many hon. Members on both sides who desired to see the present system of local taxation reformed in the direction of reduction. He did not think the hon.

Sir Robert Anstruther

and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had treated him, in fact, with the generosity which he had evinced in words. He had on one or two occasions brought forward proposals in the hope of effecting a settlement of the question, but the hon. and learned Gentleman had used the Forms of the House in order to defeat his object. On the present occasion he was prevented from bringing forward the second reading of the Bill he had referred to by the bringing on of the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman. This was perfectly legitimate, but could hardly be described as generous. While, on the whole, he could not complain of the tone which had characterized the discussions inside the House, he must deprecate the manner in which the subject had been treated outside its walls. In the course of last month the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) presided at a meeting held in London for the purpose of considering the question now under discussion, together with other cognate subjects. On that occasion the hon. Member informed his hearers that, while attending to a pressing question like the Burials Bill, they must not forget that their great controversy lay with Church Establishments in any form, and that the axe must be laid to the root of a tree which, like the poison tree of Java, blasted everything it overshadowed. Resolutions were adopted by the meeting in accordance with those views. In the face of statements like that—it was not easy to preserve a perfectly calm tone and attitude. He must congratulate the hon. Baronet who had last spoken (Sir Robert Anstruther) on his recovery from his recent illness, and was glad to find that it had not caused him to lose any of his old fire. He (Mr. Talbot), equally with the hon. Baronet, desired a settlement of the question, but from an entirely different point of view. The hon. Baronet had taken great credit for the peaceful way in which burials had been conducted in Scotland during the last 200 years, but the explanation was simply this—that in Scotland there was no burial service at all.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER requested permission to make an explanation, as this was a subject on which they felt keenly in Scotland. The fact was, that while there was not usually any service at the grave, it was almost the universal custom to have religious services in the private houses.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that was the very point he was desirous of bringing out. The fact was, that the only service performed at the grave was that of the Episcopalian Church of Scotland, which was the same as that of the Church of England. Now, they all knew what that was; but if the principle laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted in England, they would have read in English churchyards the services of every religious sect, and possibly of sections of the community who had no religious belief at all. He desired, therefore, to avoid the possibility of scandal and to provide safeguards for the observance of the sanctity of our churchyards. In Ireland, as in Scotland, the religious denominations agreed not to differ at the grave. His Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, in a recent letter, referring to the state of things in Ireland, wrote that it had not been the habit of Roman Catholics and Presbyterians to have any religious services at the graves. His Grace went on to say that the religious services were held at the house of the deceased, but not at the burial-ground; and he added that the Acts of 1824 and 1868 had not been of the slightest use—that, on the contrary, they had stirred up strife, and been the occasion of parochial quarrels. Now, with respect to the case of foreign countries, the instances recited by the correspondents of the Archbishop of Canterbury did not, he thought, advance the case in favour of the Resolution. In France, those who did not belong to a particular community could not be buried in consecrated ground; in Germany, the right of every member of a religious community to be buried in a cemetery existed, but the burial-ground was under the control of a local Board, and Austria was very liberal, because there not only prayers but preaching was allowed; but the Minister of Public Instruction added—"The practical working of this law requires the greatest tact." In conclusion, he would only say that he had, by the proposition he had submitted, not taken up the non possumus view of the question. There was a principle in the case, and to that principle they must unflinchingly adhere, and that was that they could not admit into the churchyards of this country the ministrations of a minister who did not belong to the Church of England, because they believed, and justly believed, that if they did, on the same principle they could not refuse him admission to the church itself. He admitted that there might exist a small grievance on the part of a few Nonconformists, and if by facilitating the establishment of public graveyards that grievance could be removed, he would be the first to hail the fact with pleasure. It was no pleasure to him, as a Churchman, to see perpetuated after death the miserable differences which had divided them in life. The Church of England was ready to open her arms wide to every member of the community who was baptized in her faith, and whose relations would bring their remains to the churchyard, but on the conditions now suggested they could not admit alien ministers or alien services.

SIR WILLIAM HARTCOURT said, the question had been so largely and so ably debated that he, for himself, would not attempt to go over the general grounds of the discussion. There was, however, one point requiring notice, and that was, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. J. G. Talbot), as had also the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, contended that in this case no substantial grievance existed. He desired to meet that contention in a practical manner, because in a practical Assembly like that it was an argument which he believed to be of the greatest weight. The question he wished to discuss was not their ecclesiastical or theological differences, but whether any class of their fellow-subjects felt a just and legitimate grievance. Two days ago he received from a constituent of his own a letter which he would ask leave to read to the House, and he believed they would consider it deserving of their attention. That letter, he thought, in its simple pathos, in the moderation of its tone, and in the amazing self-control which it exhibited, under what appeared to him to be very severe and just provocation, was one which he was sure would secure the attention and sympathy of the House. He had the authority of the gentleman who wrote it to mention his name, if necessary. It ran as follows:—

"Dear Sir,—Will you allow me to make known to you a 'real grievance' in the Burials question? Eight years since I came to Oxford, and from conviction, not by accident of birth, I am a Dissenter and a Baptist. Before I had been resident four months I lost two dear children by death, and, of course, in consequence of their not having been christened, was denied the funeral service. As the law did not allow of my own minister officiating at the grave, I had a service at my own chapel, and then interred them in painful silence at the cemetery. Since then I have lost four others, and have on each occasion pursued the same course; but on the 28th of last month my beloved wife was taken from me. In this case, wishing to have a brick grave, I applied to the vicar, the Rev. T. Chamberlain, for a 'faculty.' While I was with him in his study, he took the opportunity of assailing my religious belief, and thus increased my sorrow with his, to say the least, ill-timed controversy. The fee for a brick grave, I found, would be £9 10s., and I also ascertained that £4 of that amount would go into this same vicar's pocket. I declined having it, and spoke to the sexton to prepare a grave as he had done on former occasions, and that I should not require any service whatever. Judge, then, of my surprise when on arriving at the cemetery we were met by the sexton, clerk, and others, with Mr. Chamberlain's curate, who demanded the body to read the Burial Service over it. In vain did I ask him not to do it. I told him we had already held a service in our own chapel, but he said he must read the service, he was carrying out his vicar's instructions, and he must do them. I asked him if he would hinder us going to the grave. He said yes; he must perform the service first. I then submitted under strong protest to what I think you would say is a piece of priestly tyranny. May I beg of you as much in the interest of the Establishment as of Dissenters to do all in your power to carry Mr. Osborne Morgan's Resolution which, I see, is down for the 3rd prox. I have written to you not in the interest of a sect, but in the name of our common humanity. Such seasons of grief should no longer afford an opportunity for religious animosity or even controversy."

He did not know what the feelings of hon. Gentlemen on that or the other side of the House might be in reference to that scandalous story, but all he could say, as a faithful and devoted member of the Church of England, was that he read it with grief, with pain, with shame, and with indignation. What was the meaning, in the presence of such a history as that, of telling the Nonconformists of England that they had not a substantial grievance? Was there any man among them, on whichever side he might sit, who, had he been subject to such treatment as that, would not carry with him an abiding sense of bitter indignation and resentment? He doubted if there were many present who would have the self-control to be able to act so moderately. There were few of them who had not listened to the solemn service of the Church of England with which she buried her dead. That service had often brought not only to those who belonged to her faith, but to those who were without her her pale, a consolation in their hours of sorrow and distress. What, however, was to be thought of those who perverted that service of consolation by forcing it upon unwilling ears, and making it a means of asserting a priestly supremacy under circumstances which converted it into a desecration of religion itself? They had read—he thought all of them—with disgust, the story of those who kidnapped a Jewish boy in order that they might secretly, and against the will of his parents, baptize him. Yet how was that different from insisting on a service over the insensible clay of a man who, if alive, would not desire their service, and in the presence of his relatives pronouncing a solemn service over the dead against their will. But then he was told that was law. If it were law, what a law! How long would they allow such a law to continue? The hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. C. Talbot) was surprised at this grievance about silent interment. The Nonconformists desired to have a service in their own chapels, if they were not to be allowed to have a suitable service over the grave, and if the latter were denied them, they did not want to have a service which they did not approve, performed by force over the corpse. When that course was taken against the wishes of the living, he declared that the service which members of the Church of England heard with so much solemn respect, instead of being a religious ceremony, was nothing but a superstitious incantation. Hon. Members opposite called this a sentimental grievance. Yes, it was a sentimental grievance because it appealed to a sentiment that was the dearest, and lay deepest and truest in the nature of man, and it was for this reason that a grievance of the kind was the more real and intolerable. They inflicted, then, by conduct of that kind, under laws which their clergy said they were bound to obey, upon a large portion—he would not discuss how large or what proportion—of the nation, wrongs which they deeply felt, wounds which they deeply resented, and then they said they did it upon principle.

But upon what principle? The hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of Ireland, and the Home Secretary also referred to the case of Ireland; but he ventured to say that the right hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the bench opposite were not in a position to affirm that they opposed the Resolution on principle; and he would tell them why. The Established Church of Ireland while it existed, like the Church of England, was under the operation of the Act of Uniformity. The law was the same in both Churches, and to make any distinction between the two was entirely incorrect. [Mr. ASSHERON CROSS: I said the practice was different.] He was talking about the law. He said that the law of the Church of Ireland was the same as the law of the Church of England. What happened? Lord Plunket, a great man, came forward in 1824, at a time when the spirit of bigotry was rampant, and yet he succeeded almost without opposition in inducing the House of Commons to pass a measure to say that the dead of all persuasions in Ireland should be buried in the churchyards of the national Church, and that they should have, subject to the permission of the incumbent, their own religious rites. That was the principle of Lord Plunket's measure. To talk of practice? He would like to know what there was in England now contrary to the feeling which existed in 1824 between the Catholics and Protestants in Ireland? Yet, with that antagonism which existed at that period between the rival sects, Parliament was capable of taking a wise and statesmanlike view of the question. In 1868, when hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the bench opposite were sitting upon it then, when the right hon. Gentleman who is now at the head of Her Majesty's Government was then Prime Minister, a Bill was introduced by Mr. Monsell, upon the allegation that the veto given to the Irish clergy had been improperly used, to take away that veto. What was the course of the Government in the matter, who now resisted this Resolution on principle? He would read the clause of the Bill—

"Whenever any person who at the time of his or her death shall not have been a member of or in communion with the United Church of England and Ireland shall be buried as of right."—the very words of the Resolution—"within the churchyard or graveyard, it shall be lawful for the priest or minister of the religious denomination to which such person belonged to attend such burial, and to read such prayers or perform such burial service at the grave as is usual or customary at the burial of persons belonging to such religious denomination."

And now attend to these words, and they apply to the parson to whom the freehold of the churchyard belonged as well as to anybody else—

"And any person wilfully obstructing such sermon or burial service shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour."

What was the period at which this Bill was introduced? The great question of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church had been raised. It was before the Dissolution. It was after the Resolutions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had been proposed, and when it was the interest and business of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to defend every outwork of the Irish Church. What course did they take? Why, Lord Naas, the Irish Secretary of the Government of the day, came forward, and said he was favourable to the principle of the Bill. That Bill was passed through the House of Commons with the assent of the Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite at that time was the head. It might be said, with the frankness of the hon. Member who last spoke—he (Sir William Harcourt) did not know whether he spoke for all—that the party to which he belonged had one policy when they were in a minority and another when they were in a majority; and he hoped the Nonconformists of the country would always remember that declaration. But though they might not have had a majority upon this question in 1868, when they were in power, the Bill went to the House of Lords, where they had an undisputed majority, and they might have put a negative on the principle of the clause which declared it to be a misdemeanour. But what was done? The Primate of Ireland moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee; but a Member of the Government, Lord Malmesbury, begged the most rev. Prelate to withdraw his Motion, because it would appear to be intended to shelve the Bill. He was, therefore, entitled to say that the measure was passed with the assent and assistance of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and how they could say that they were opposed to this Bill on principle he could not understand. They had always contended that the situation and principles of the Irish Church were the same as those of the English Church, and if they thought it consistent with their duty to throw open the churchyards of Ireland, he could not see how they could defend their opposition to this Resolution on the ground of principle. But even if the position of principle was not to be maintained, let him ask what was the policy of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite? He listened to the speech of the Home Secretary, and he confessed, with the exception of some hazy sentences at the end, in which the right hon. Gentleman figured out a universal rate for establishing new churchyards in every country village, whether they were wanted or not, he could discover no policy. It was a very adroit and a very able speech—as the right hon. Gentleman's speeches always were. He criticized verbally, with great acuteness, the Resolution, but hon. Gentlemen greatly mistook the character of the question, if they thought it was going to be settled by verbal criticism. The country outside knew there was a great deal more in it than that. They looked at the substance of the Resolution, and they would consider how either parties in the State dealt with it. One of the criticisms of the Home Secretary appeared to be entirely unfounded. He said that in Parliamentary practice it was not admissible to deal with the matter of the Resolution when it had been dealt with by Bill. His hon. and learned Friend referred to—and he would refer to it again—Catholic Emancipation, when year after year Bills were brought into this House and defeated by all the machinations of Opposition. Then Sir Francis Burdett took the course which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire had taken in the matter. In 1828 he relinquished all notions to bring forward a Bill, and he passed through this House a Resolution in reference to the Catholic claims, which he carried, and it was sent to the House of Lords, and a Conference was afterwards held on the subject. It was a matter of good omen that that took place the very year before Catholic Emancipation was accomplished. The Home Secretary asked what we were going to do 20 years hence, when the graveyards would be fuller than now. He did not feel disposed to enter upon a discussion of that question; he was sure this difficulty would have been settled long before that time. As to the duty of parishes to provide graveyards, it might be an interesting question, but he did not see what it had to do with the matter under discussion. The question for solution now was, what will you do for Nonconformists in the graveyards that exist? It was not a question with reference to graveyards we did not possess, and which might or might not be provided. What was the policy of the Government? Were they going to raise the flag of “No surrender?” If they listened to the hon. Member for West Kent they would do so. He said—“I was willing to be liberal and tolerant and to make terms with Nonconformists when in a minority, but now I am in power I will listen to nothing of the kind.” They, however, wanted to know from persons of more authority if that was the policy of the Leaders of the Conservative Party. Did they wish to tell the Nonconformists—“Whatever may have been our language, spirit, policy in those days when we were in Opposition, now we are in power we will give you no terms and no compromise whatever?” They wished to learn whether this was the language and policy of the Conservative Government? He was not alarmed by the language of “No surrender;” he had observed that the language of “No surrender” was always most loudly used on the eve of capitulation. In spite of what had been said by the hon. Member for West Kent, he knew there was sitting upon the Treasury Bench a sagacious and prescient statesman who at that moment was only revolving in his mind schemes of escape from a situation which he knew to be untenable. The right hon. Gentleman had been exposed to singular treatment of late. We had been accustomed to see the right hon. Gentleman educating his Party; but a certain section of his Party, in the course of last week seemed to have undertaken the rather difficult task of educating him. The principal pedagogues on that occasion were the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard); they went to lecture him upon this question, and to tell him what he must do. He doubted whether that was a game in which they would succeed. They might have a very docile pupil for the moment; but in the long run, it would be they who would have to learn the last lesson upon this subject. The education of such distinguished scholars was difficult, and lessons were long and tedious in an education of this character. We had seen before, and we might see again instances of instantaneous and miraculous conversion. But, whether the process was long or short, for his part he believed the result was certain. This question would run the same course many questions had run before. We had heard exactly the same language on the subject of Catholic Emancipation, the Jew Bill, and the Corporation and the Test Act that we had now heard from the hon. Member for West Kent. It was now said we should have a Jewish funeral service in a parish churchyard; and it was formerly said we should have a Jew in Parliament. Well, we had got a Jew, and Parliament was the better for it. We had exactly the same language on the subject of Church rates. It was said—and the people almost persuaded themselves of the truth of what they said—that if Church rates were abolished the Church would be ruined; but it had not been, and all prophecies of that kind had been falsified by the result; and the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme, (Mr. Allen) speaking as a Wesleyan Methodist, had said to-night that in his opinion the Church was stronger now than at any former period. Was the Church unanimous in its opposition to this proposal? Who was meant by the Church? If the clergy, he demurred altogether to the language used. He knew there were pretentious priests who arrogated to themselves to speak in the name of the Church; but the clergy were a section, and not the most important section, of the Church. The voice the House of Commons would look to was the voice of that congregation of which the clergy were only the ministers; and were the laity of the Church unanimous on this point? They were not. Even the clergy—though he would admit the great majority were one way—were divided, and had expressed different views at their meetings and in Convocation itself; and there were great and venerable leaders in the Church who took that view of this subject which the House was invited to take by the Resolution. As to the argument that the proposal was a sidewind, an indirect attack upon Establishment and the connection of the Church with the State, if he thought it would have that result he would not support it. The most Dis-establishmentarian argument he had heard for a long time was one used by the Home Secretary, when he thought it worth his while to quote the practice of the Society of Friends as a rule for the National Church of England. If that argument was good for anything, it would dethrone the National Church from its condition as an Establishment, and reduce it to a sect. Was it really believed that all who were going to support the Resolution desired the disestablishment of the Church of England? If those who were going into the Lobby from that side of the House in support of the Resolution were enemies of the Establishment, it was an ominous sign for the Church of England; but they knew it was nothing of the kind. It was true that there were persons outside the House and inside who supported the proposal who were adverse to the Establishment. That, however, had been proved of every one of the great measures they had passed—Catholic Emancipation, the Corporation and Test Acts, the Jew Bill, the Church rate question. But those measures were carried because they were supported by a great portion of the enlightened part of the community, both in this House and out of it, who were not adverse to the Establishment or the connection between Church and State. He knew and regretted that there were many Nonconformists who were hostile to the Establishment; but he knew also that there was a great body of Protestant Dissenters who, if they would only allow them, were ready to defend it. They had heard those sentiments most adequately expressed by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme. He believed that if the Church was true to herself, true to the principles of the Reformation, she had many friends, outside as well as inside her pale, who would not desire to see her light extinguished. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Denbighshire, that the people who would most regret the defeat of the Resolution would not be the enemies of the Church of England. It was those who wished well to her who most desired to see a settlement of this question. It was that sentiment which inspired that minority of the clergy to whom he had referred. It was that sentiment which actuated many who, like himself, desired to deliver the Church from a danger which they believed was menacing her. In 1873, in opposing this measure, the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown used this language—

“What I want to see is a cessation of this war between the Nonconformist Body and the Church of England.”—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 184.]

That was a sentiment worthy of an English statesman. He should like to ask, were they going to permit a cessation of that warfare? Were they going to defer the cessation of it by prolonging this exasperating controversy? He believed what all the friends of the Establishment should most desire was to remove all those just causes of offence, all invidious privileges which were not of the essence of the existence of that Establishment—that they should extend to those outside its pale a policy of charity, of conciliation, and of peace. How could they say that such a policy as that, which they were now insisting upon, was of the essence of charity? In Ireland they did not consider it of the essence of Establishment when that Establishment ceased. In Scotland they did not at that moment consider it of the essence of the Scotch Establishment. What, then, could be more unwise on the part of the friends of the Church than to identify that Church with a policy which enlisted against it the sentiments of humanity and the sympathies of mankind? For his part he would take no share in such a policy. It was as a friend of the Church of England that he declined altogether to link its living fortunes with dead and decaying privileges, for, if the two were inseparable, then it was his firm belief that many a man would be reluctantly driven to the conclusion that the cause of that Church was one which neither could be nor ought to be defended.

MR. RAIKES said, that as he had been more than once personally referred to, he wished to say a few words in vindication of the course which, in common with many other Members of that House, he had taken, and he hoped to be able to show that there was no reason why he or they should be censured for anything that they had done. He could assure his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir William Harcourt) that he took in good part the reference he had made to so humble a Member as himself and the deputation he had accompanied to the Minister of the day. They had not thought it unbecoming to submit to him their aversion for a particular line of policy and invite his serious attention to a question which was exciting a great deal of public interest, and he had yet to learn that there was anything unusual in that course, or that it involved any ground of reproach as if it had been something hitherto unknown in public life. His hon. and learned Friend commenced his speech by an affecting statement, which he (Mr. Raikes) frankly owned had excited his sympathy, as he was sure it had evoked the sympathy of many others on that side of the House. It was, however, one thing to sympathize with a particular case of individual hardship, and another to change a law, and thereby to entail a great deal of injustice on many other persons. His hon. and learned Friend had told them all the more sensational points of that case; but he was too good an advocate to tell them all the House might, perhaps, wish to know. Was there or was there not a public cemetery in the City of Oxford, or its neighbourhood? [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] Was the person over whose remains the parochial minister claimed the privilege of performing the last sad office a baptized person or not? They did not know whether she was a member of the Church of England or, at least, a baptized person. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: She was baptized, and I said the law was as the clergyman had interpreted it.] In that case he could not see what there was to complain of, especially when they remembered that the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had stigmatized silent burials in terms which he (Mr. Raikes) did not care to repeat. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford had just said that a different rule was adopted in Ireland and Scotland; but when the case of these countries was compared with that of England a marked difference was observable in the circumstances. The case of Ireland was one where the members of the Church were a small and almost hopeless minority, but in England the Church had a majority of the population, and its influence was daily increasing. With reference to the concession that had been made to Roman Catholics in Protestant churchyards in Ireland, what did Lord Plunket say on the occasion referred to? He said that up to a certain point it was the introduction of a new right and power—it was giving the Catholic the right to be buried in the Protestant churchyard; but the law, in fact, only took away a right which the Protestant clergyman had never exercised. His hon. and learned Friend said that certain Members of the Opposition would support the Resolution from their attachment to the Church; but he must be credulous indeed who, by going into the same Lobby with the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, hoped to prolong that institution of which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford was a devoted and dutiful member. They must look at the source from which the Resolution proceeded. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, although a “constructive” member of the Church of England, had never concealed that he was an advocate for Disestablishment. That hon. and learned Member had on two occasions voted for Disestablishment. But his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, with engaging confidence in his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire, adopted the Resolution: and thus to him—

Sir William Harcourt

“via prima salutis
Quod minime reris, Graiâ pandetur ab urbe.”

He could not help thinking, however, it became those who had real care for the interests of the Church to beware how they trusted in the tender mercies of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. With regard to the law of the case he (Mr. Raikes) adhered to the opinion he had before expressed. With reference to the case of “King v. Taylor,” he maintained, notwithstanding the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, that there was no such thing as a Common Law right of sepulture, apart from the right of being interred with the Burial Service. The two rights went together. He was not one of those who saw no difference between the position of the church and the churchyard. All that he had intimated with reference to the Resolution was, that if the word “church” were read for “churchyard,” and the word “worship” for “burial,” it would seem to go far towards laying the ground for Disestablishment. If the Resolution were adopted that night, it would be adopted by those who were friends of Disestablishment. It was not the first time that the principle had been put forward. He found from a resolution passed by some leading members of the Nonconformist Body in 1872, that they claimed equal rights for all citizens in the national or parochial churches and churchyards, and a protest was entered against any exclusive privileges being enjoyed by any part of the community in the burial of the dead. That amounted to the assertion of equal rights and privileges and sacerdotal authority on the part of other denominations and bodies. Even in the present cemeteries the hardship of the Nonconformist would still exist. There was consecrated and unconsecrated ground in those cemeteries, and Nonconformists might still be unable to be buried by the side of those dear to them. They would, therefore, have to make the same battle-ground of the cemeteries which they were now making of the churchyards. He wished to refer to one or two matters in reference to the state of public opinion out-of-doors. They had been told a great deal in reference to the exclusiveness and bigotry of clergymen of the Church of England in not allowing Dissenting ministers to bury in their churchyards. But how was it on the other side. The Secretary of State for the Home Department earlier in the evening had challenged the Nonconformists to set an example of comprehensiveness as far as their own burial-grounds were concerned. The vicar of Heaton, near Bradford, in a letter written in 1873, said he lived in a parish at least two or three miles from any cemetery. He had, unfortunately, no burial-ground attached to his church, but within 200 yards of his church there was a Baptist chapel, with an admirable cemetery attached thereto. He had offered to perform the whole of the funeral services in that cemetery gratuitously, subject to the approval of the Bishop, but his offer had been declined. The Baptists had no resident minister, and a person was paid to bury the dead. All he (the vicar) could do was to read the funeral service in the house of a deceased parishioner, and there his functions ended. He (Mr. Raikes) was not blaming the Baptists for their exclusiveness. But they should remember that charity began at home. They must be prepared to act in a different spirit before they could claim what was asked for them by the hon. and learned Member opposite. Another case brought to his (Mr. Raikes's) knowledge was that of a clergyman who lived in the neighbourhood of a cemetery in Harpurhey, near Manchester, and who wrote that a second part of the cemetery had to be consecrated in order to induce people to go and be buried there. People would not be buried in the unconsecrated portion, so that it did not seem to be so grievous a matter with Dissenters as had been alleged. He had a communication from the interesting town of Bala, in Merionethshire, which was a sort of metropolis of Nonconformity in North Wales. It was there that the principal Dissenting college was which had produced very eminent men. The Calvinistic Methodists, the most numerous and powerful sect in Wales, had there their college, of which Dr. Edwards was the president. The Nonconformists had four graveyards in the parish, whilst the Church had only two. In 1874 there were eight, and in the following year 13, buried in the Dissenting graveyards, whilst in 1875 no fewer than 38 were buried in the churchyards. It had been urged that the parishioners were perhaps attached to the old churchyards; but the fact was that more were buried in the new churchyard than in all the Dissenting graveyards. A tutor of the Calvinistic college, although he was a stranger and a sojourner in Bala, elected to be buried in one of the churchyards, and the president of the Dissenting college also had recently had prepared for himself a vault within the parish churchyard. There had been an inquiry among the clergy and laity, members of the Church in North Wales, as to the view taken with regard to this question in their parishes. He did not propose to quote more than one answer though many of them were worth reading. The Rev. Stephen Gladstone, who was vicar of Hawarden, wrote that he had never heard expressed any wish that Nonconformist ministers should perform service in the churchyards, and that until they applied to be rated in respect of the use of the church he did not think they could consistently claim any right to the fabric or the churchyard. He added that, as a rule, he believed that Dissenters there preferred Church burial, as they universally did Church baptism and Church marriage. Now that was the statement of a gentleman who bore an honoured name, and whose testimony was worthy of attention. He (Mr. Raikes) had never been one of those who said there was no grievance, though he did not think that it was nearly so great as had been supposed, or that it seriously affected the Nonconformist Body. It did affect the Nonconformist ministers, who were jealous of the position of the clergymen. He did not blame them; the feeling was natural to their position. It was not, however, because this feeling existed that they were to change the law. For the last 300 years the same words of consolation and hope had in our churchyards sounded over every grave, and they were now asked, on account of some hardship of Dissenting ministers, to break that continuity of service, to dissipate the peace which had remained unbroken in our churchyards in order to gratify the jealousy of a small, even though it might be considered a respectable minority.

Mr. LEATHAM thought if that was a Dissenter's grievance, the debate ought not to come to an end without one Dissenter being heard on the subject. There were questions the discussion of which was well qualified to throw light upon other and wider questions; and whenever they were beaten upon them in that House, they had a good deal upon which to congratulate themselves. He believed that no politician parted with a good grievance without a pang; and if he wished to take a narrow view of this controversy he should say—"Go on beating us year after year, for the harder you beat us the harder will you beat it into the public mind that there is no real remedy for the group of grievances of which this is one short of Disestablishment itself." The right hon. Gentleman opposite had made several impressive but somewhat irrelevant remarks with reference to the new churchyards. He said that they would be swept away from the church, yet the Resolution only applied to parish churchyards, and not to new ones. He had also challenged Dissenters to admit Churchmen to their burial-grounds; but if they invited a Mussulman to dinner they would hardly offer him salt pork, and the Dissenter would not think of insulting Churchmen by offering them the use of their burial-grounds, for the simple reason that no Churchmen would be buried in unconsecrated ground. It was said it was with an ill-grace that Dissenters made their present demand, considering that when a compromise was tendered to them during the discussions on Church rates, they refused to accept it or to pay for the maintenance of the churchyards. But surely when the use of a thing was coupled with conditions which deprived it of its value, what right had they to expect people to pay for it on those terms? Equality of payment presupposed equality of use, and he denied that Churchmen and Dissenters now used the churchyards on equal conditions. Everything was done that was congenial to the Churchman, whereas, when the Dissenter went there for interment, he was only buried to be put out of sight. Give the Dissenters equality of burial and enable them to bury their dead in the parish churchyard without contumely. But as long as they were only permitted to bury on sufferance, and their dead were taken from them at the churchyard gate, they resented the act as an indignity, and altogether declined to pay for it as a boon. The clergy especially ought to petition for the change now proposed, because many of them highly prized the Athanasian Creed and read its damnatory clauses with emphasis and vigour on Sunday. On Monday they might be called upon to bury a Dissenter who was the unfortunate object of the maledictions, and to declare that they committed him to the grave in the sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection. If it was true that in two thirds of the parishes of the United Kingdom there was no graveyard excepting the parish churchyard, and if people could not bury their dead there excepting under the services of the Church of England, it was impossible to deny that there was a grievance. He put it to the right feeling of the House whether at the close of a long life, or it might be of a long and painful illness, during which the deceased person had enjoyed the benefit of the ministrations of a particular minister, it was right that that minister should be wholly debarred from taking any part whatever in the last sad office—that another minister, a stranger, should step in and take his place, and that the deceased person should have to be buried in the parish churchyard amid surroundings against which he had all his lifetime protested.

MR. PELL said, he agreed with that portion of the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire which referred to decency and order. It would be very unwise to leave this question in its present state. It might not suit many, both Churchmen and Nonconformists, that we should first make provision for the decent interment of the dead before settling services; but the answer to that was to be found in the condition of our churchyards, and Parliament might be doing a great service, in a sanitary point of view, by removing evils—such, for instance, as preventing burials in churchyards where one body had to be dug up to make room for another. Any local burden rendered necessary for remedying such an evil would not be so objectionable as church rates. It would be unwise to allow the question to be annually raked up in every village in the country of establishing Burial Boards. Nor was there any reason for it, because the evil was as easily to be got over as any question with regard to drains and sewers. An overcrowded churchyard was a nuisance to the village where it existed, and unfortunately they were too general; but the difficulty might be got rid of by assigning the question to the Sanitary Authority, with power to levy a rate for the purpose of providing suitable places of interment. As to the vote he should give on this occasion, he could not forget that five years ago the hon. and learned Mover of this Resolution voted in favour of another Motion which declared that it was expedient at the earliest practicable period to apply the policy pursued towards the Irish Church in 1869 to the other Churches established by law in the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Member said he was a Churchman. He (Mr. Pell) was also a strong Churchman, and he hoped not a bigoted one; and just as the hon. and learned Gentleman felt it to be his duty, doubtless in the interests of the Church, to vote for the disestablishing Motion on a former occasion, so he (Mr. Pell) must be allowed in the interests of the Church to vote against the present Resolution, which he believed to be an insidious one, and one fraught with danger to the Church; and whatever they did hereafter—and he hoped something would be done with regard to this question—the Party with whom he acted would vote on this occasion in a way that would be perfectly well understood.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he felt that it was a bold thing on his part to rise at so late a period in the debate, when the House was impatient to proceed to a division. But hon. Members need not be alarmed at the formidable bundle of notes with which he appeared to be armed, for he assured them if they would indulge him for a few minutes he would not at that late hour inflict upon them the speech which he admitted he had prepared for that evening. The Burials question which had been before the House and the country in various forms ever since the year 1857, had now assumed the shape of a clear, simple, and intelligible issue—namely, whether the inhabitants of a parish ought or ought not to possess the right of burying their dead in the parish churchyard, according to those rites and ceremonies which were dearest and most acceptable to them upon so solemn an occasion. That was the issue they had before them; and to that issue he not only gave an unhesitating answer in the affirmative, but he believed that upon a just review of the legal and historical aspect of the question, and having regard to those principles of religious liberty for which they had fought successfully ever since the Great Reformation, it could be shown that the Nonconformist parishioners in making their present demand were only asking to be restored to those ancient rights which they were in strictness entitled to according to the Common Law. In approaching the subject he had endeavoured, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Cross) had entreated them to do, to place himself in the position of those who were opposed to his views, so that he might be able to appreciate and fairly grapple with their true objections, and also avoid as far as possible saying anything that might cause pain, or even annoyance, to those who looked at the matter from an opposite point of view; and he felt the less difficulty in doing that, because being himself a Churchman, his sympathies with the claims of the Nonconformists in this matter were not founded upon any agreement with their religious opinions, but upon a conviction that they suffered grievous injustice and oppression in being deprived of their common rights as fellow-citizens and fellow-countrymen. There was a time, and that not a very distant one, when this irritating grievance admitted of a fair compromise, and when, by a timely and generous concession, the Church might have strengthened her position in the hearts of the people, by proving that she was capable of regarding conscientious changes and differences of opinion as to the mode of performing the rites of burial with an enlarged and liberal spirit; but she let the golden opportunity pass, and the clergy, unfortunately too true to the worst traditions of the Church, would learn nothing, forget nothing, and give way in nothing. The opportunity was passed, never to return. The Church party took their stand boldly and firmly, and declared that they would not concede an inch. They denied the very existence of the grievance; or they said that it had been grossly exaggerated, and that the proposed remedy would substitute other grievances and evils far greater than those which it was intended to remove. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had disputed that portion of the Resolution which asserted the Common Law right of every parishioner to be buried in the churchyard, and the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes) had asserted that there was no right of sepulture separate from a burial according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England. To that proposition he begged to give the most unqualified contradiction. How did the matter stand? The origin of the dedication of the churchyards to the use of the parishioners, whether it was by private grant or through public contributions, was wholly lost in antiquity; but this they did know, that at the time they were so dedicated the whole people professed one common and uniform faith; and that, the Roman Catholic Faith. Since that time they had changed their faith, and also their habits and customs and religious practices in many essential particulars, which had been recognized and sanctioned by our laws in spite of the most strenuous and persistent opposition from the clerical party. Now the parish churchyards were vested in the parson for the use of the parishioners for the burial of their dead; but the Church of England had not kept pace with the advancing and varying opinions of the people, and now claimed the right to force its Ritual on all alike, as a condition of their using the common burial-ground of the parish. Long practice and some legal decisions had undoubtedly confirmed this claim. But he believed that it was originally without foundation, and that the Common Law right to burial was not subject to any condition. He would ask the attention of the House to the language of a great Churchman and Tory, and one of the profoundest lawyers who had ever sat on the Ecclesiastical Bench of this country. He alluded to Lord Stowell, who, in his famous judgment in the iron coffin case, said—

“The practice of sepulture has varied with respect to the places where performed. In ancient times caves seem to have been in high request; then gardens or other private demesnes of proprietors, inclosed spaces out of the walls of towns, or by the side of roads; and, finally, in Christian countries, churches and churchyards, where the deceased could receive the pious and charitable wishes of the faithful who resorted thither on the various calls of public worship. The connection (between burial-places and churches), imported from Rome, by Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, took place about the year 750. In what way the mortal remains are to be conveyed to the grave and there deposited, I do not find any positive rule of law or of religion that prescribes. The authority under which the received practices exist is to be found in our manners rather than in our laws—they have their origin in natural sentiments of public decency or private affection, they are ratified by common usage and consent, and being attached to a subject of the gravest and most impressive nature, remain unaltered by private caprice and fancy amidst all the giddy revolutions that are perpetually varying the modes and fashions that belong to the lighter circumstances of human life.”

The learned Spelman also, in his chapter De sepultura, in defending the right of free burial in the parish churchyard, said—

“The grave is the only inheritance that we are certainly born to—the inheritance which our grandmother the Earth hath left to descend in gavelkind among her children; shall one enter and hold another out, or drive him to pay a fine; is our tenure base like copyhold ad voluntatem domini, or not rather noble by franche almoigne free from all payments and services.”

After this, what became of the claim of an immemorial right to force the Ritual of the Church upon a non-conforming parishioner; no doubt, it had now acquired the sanction of law, and it was to alter this grievous innovation in the law, and to restore the parishioners to their ancient rights, that the present appeal was made to that House. Hon. Members had spoken of a compromise and settlement of this question; but of late years the claims of the Church had been put forward more loudly, and her resistance had been more obstinate and determined than ever. What was the cause of this? He was afraid that it was due to the alarming spread of sacerdotal claims and pretensions on the part of the clergy—claims with which the laity of the Church had no sympathy, and which, in fact, they had determined to check. Depend upon it, the more the clergy sought to associate superstitious ideas and practices with the burial of the dead, the louder and louder would be the public demand for the unrestricted opening of the churchyards; for there was an unmistakable and steadily growing feeling that the matter of the burial of the dead should be dealt with as one of civil concern exclusively, and that all burial-places should be placed under the control and management of civil functionaries. Hon. Members had misunderstood the reference to Scotland and Ireland. The experience of those countries had been referred to, to refute the suggestion that the change would lead to irreverence, indecency, or disturbance. The suggestion was as ridiculous as it was insulting, and was without a shadow of foundation. The examples of Russia, Austria, Germany, and other foreign countries, might also be cited in proof of this; and it was melancholy to think that England stood almost alone in this respect, and they had the humiliation of being obliged to confess that it had been left to the ministers of the Established and Reformed Protestant Church of England to set an example to the rest of Europe of bigotry and intolerance—[“Oh, oh!”]—yes, he repeated it, of bigotry and intolerance in a matter which touched the heart and conscience of the people to the very quick. He hoped that that night the Representatives of the people in that House assembled, on whichever side they sat, would emancipate themselves from this clerical influence and control, and show to Europe and the World that, in spite of sacerdotal bigotry and intolerance, they would not allow their National Church to be any longer open to the reproach of being so unworthy of the grand and liberal principles of religion which they had inherited from the great Founder of Christianity; and that they should not be compelled to cry, in the words of the learned and generous Spelman—"O! shame on our religion, when heathens and soldiers are more gracious to their dead enemies than Christian ministers to their friends and brethren."

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help feeling that there has been a good deal of exaggeration as to the importance of the question before the House, interesting though it may be. I am told by hon. Members that the heart of the people is touched upon this question, and I have heard in the course of this debate, that it is a question on which the whole nation is deeply intent. Now, Sir, though I admit that it is an interesting question, it does not appear to me to be one of general, certainly not of universal, interest. We have been told, and told continually, in this debate that it does not concern Ireland. We have also been told, and told continually, that Scotland has nothing to do with it. We are in possession of evidence that two-thirds of the population of England and Wales, amounting to 22,000,000, have now recourse to cemeteries, and therefore the result is that we have to consider the effect of the existing regulation upon one third of the population of England and Wales. I do not mean to say that it is not an important consideration, one which demands serious and grave consideration, but we should have this fact in our minds when reminded so frequently that we are now discussing a question upon which the passion and thought of the whole nation are intent. Let us analyze for a moment the position of these 8,000,000. I have heard it estimated, and it is, I believe, an estimate for which there is fair ground, that of these 8,000,000 of people, 2,000,000 are Nonconformists, considerably, if not adequately, provided with cemeteries of their own. We have, then, to consider the population of 6,000,000 belonging to the Church, among whom are found all the churchyards which we are now discussing. I am not insensible to the associations of a churchyard. I am the Member for Buckinghamshire, which possesses the churchyard the subject of the immortal elegy to which reference has been made. It is impossible without emotion to view the place where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep." But unfortunately the rude forefathers of the hamlet no longer sleep in these tombs. Their slumbers have been disturbed, and since the day of Mr. Gray the condition of our churchyards is very much changed. The population of the country has immensely increased, and the condition of the churchyards of England accurately described by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) as highly unsatisfactory—I would even say, is in a great degree disgraceful. Nor is there any adequate remedy for this great evil. Those persons who have given much attention to the sanitary condition of the country know how inadequate are the means which the Government possess to cope with the evil, and unless it is encountered, how imperfect and unsatisfactory will be all the results expected with regard to the churchyards of the country. The Secretary of State has under his charge the churchyards of England, but he has no machinery whatever to supervise their condition. If that great duty were transferred to the President of the Local Government Board, with an adequate staff under him, which possibly his office could command, very considerable results might no doubt be realized. And I must say that at this time, when we are entering into all these controversies, these conflicting and competitive efforts to enjoy the churchyards of England, it would be much more desirable if we could take measures to make more decorous the homes that await us, so that our posterity might recognize the fulfilment of the duty we owe them. Now, Sir, if this be the state of the country, and I believe—though I touch slightly upon it at this hour—that it may be proved by information in the possession of the Government, I am entirely opposed, on grounds different from those which have prevailed, generally speaking, in the course of this debate, to dealing with the churchyards in any other way than placing them in a condition favourable to public health, and shutting up all those the condition of which is quite hopeless. This is a subject intimately connected with the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman. In what way can we put these churchyards in a proper condition? The hon. Baronet the Member for Fife scorned the idea that where a landlord gave a portion of his territory for the use of his parish and his neighbours, he should be allowed to make any conditions as to the religious tenets of those who may take advantage of his gifts. We know very well that in England the majority of the owners of land are members of the Church of England. Well, we must deal with things as we find them, and if by legislation we attempt to induce the landlords of England to come liberally forward and assist us in making a considerable revolution and change in these churchyards, it is impossible not to feel that if we make it a condition that their use shall not be confined to those of their own religious belief we shall find in many, and probably in the majority of instances, a great want of zeal in their efforts to assist us. Then no doubt we should be forced, for the sake of public health, to close many churchyards among the population of 6,000,000. We may prevent a very expensive outlay in many of our parishes in the way of establishing cemeteries by inducing the landlords to come forward and assist us, but we cannot do this, unless we allow them to confine their munificence to a certain extent to those of their own faith. These may be bigoted and unphilosophical tenets, but everybody must acknowledge that to a certain degree they will prevail, and that there is no hope of bringing forward any great measure to reform these remaining churchyards and to put the cemeteries in a permanent sanitary condition, unless we are assisted by the landlords of the country. Therefore, in that aspect, this is not a sectarian, but a sanitary question. I admit, however, there is another aspect of the question, and to that I will now address myself. It is a sectarian question in one sense, and that is the very fault I find with the conduct of those who bring forward the Motion and support it. This is part of not a secret, but an avowed system, promoted by a well-organized and able party in this Kingdom to terminate the connection between Church and State. I did not mean to say and I do not mean to say, when speaking of that party, that I was speaking of hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite, who honourably and conscientiously agree with those opinions; but I am talking of a very powerful party organized in the country, and represented also in this House, who now for a series of years have not only avowed their intention, but have indicated the means and the measures by which that intention is to be accomplished, and among those means and measures is this very proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. How is it possible for us to shut our eyes to the consequences of our conduct in this matter? How innocent must you think us when you affect surprise because we feel alarmed by a measure which you yourselves describe as so cordial, so friendly, and so innocuous when it was at first devised, and is now ardently and industriously propagated and supported by those who avow that their object is to accomplish a great political end which we believe would be destructive to the best interests of the country. This is the reason we meet your proposal with such decided opposition. You must bear in mind that this is part of a concerted scheme—a scheme of numerous and diversified attacks—a portion of a well-devised and matured strategy, the object of which is to storm the outworks, and so to advance until at last it obtains possession of the citadel. The hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford stated that three years ago I lamented the bitter controversies that still subsisted between Churchmen and Nonconformists. I lament them now; I always have lamented them, believing as I do that the Church of England is one of the greatest securities for the welfare of the people, even for our liberties, as well as our moral happiness and general welfare. In saying that I desire to do justice to the great deeds of Nonconformists. I know and fully recognize how much in the history of this country we owe to the high moral qualities, the love of liberty, and the bold, heroic conduct of the Nonconformists of England, and therefore I much deplore the alienation between Churchmen and Nonconformists. I cannot see in the real nature of things why that hostility should exist; it exists only because there is a certain portion among the Nonconformists, modern in their thought, modern and novel in their conception of their public duty, who have taken, to my mind, a completely erroneous conception of the Constitution of this country and the possible results which they can obtain, consistently with a due observance of the requirements of that Constitution. We have come to a time when we have heard men speak with contempt of the toleration which was the great achievement of Nonconformists of old days, and who say that nothing will satisfy them but equality. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, but that cheer from the other side proves exactly what I wish to have believed—that those who cheer are in favour of the schemes of the party out-of-doors to which I refer. Equality on this subject is, in fact, inconsistent with the Constitution of this country, and therefore I regret the controversy between Nonconformists and Churchmen. It is because I believe they might live in harmony in the full and equal possession of civil and religious liberty that I regret they are attempting to get what they call religious equality; which is, in fact, destroying the Constitution, right or wrong—whatever may be their opinion of the Constitution, and I do not want to enter into an argument now upon the English Constitution—I say the religious equality they desire is the subversion of the existing settlement of this country. That is the reason why I must give my opposition to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It has been brought forward, as I have intimated, on a frail plea, upon a subject which has really little to do with the momentous principles invoked in this debate. I believe if the sanitary condition of this country were what it ought to be there would be no controversy now about churchyards. I trust the time is not far distant when that will be remedied; but when the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite comes forward with a Motion which, if carried, pledges the House to principles subversive of the political as well as the religious settlement of this country—for you cannot accomplish the object you have in view consistently with maintaining the Constitution of this country—I must give, although I regret ever to give a vote which savours at all of religious exclusiveness or bigotry—I must take the question out of the ingenious and eloquent representations and misrepresentations we have listened to, and to a measure which I believe insidious and dangerous I must give my most uncompromising opposition.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I know the House is anxious for a division, and I promise to detain it only for a short time. I do not think it necessary on this occasion to discuss the question of Disestablishment. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) reminded the House that the argument from Disestablishment has been often before employed when some grievance felt by Dissenters has been brought forward. That argument has been often before employed, but happily, it has been disregarded, and I should like to ask whether, in the opinion of the House, the Church is weaker in the estimation of the country than it was before? The right hon. Gentleman, following the example of the Home Secretary, depreciated as much as he could the extent of the grievance. But, I think, both right hon. Gentlemen utterly misunderstood what was the real nature of the grievance of which the Dissenters complain. It does not matter, in my opinion, whether the grievance extends, as was stated by this right hon. Gentleman, to 2,000,000 of our fellow-subjects, or to a much lesser number. The grievance is not felt merely by those who are compelled under the existing law to bury their relations in churchyards with rites which they do not approve—the grievance is felt to be a grievance of the whole Nonconformist Body. The Home Secretary made an ingenious speech; but, to a great extent, he avoided the question, and did not meet the grievance complained of. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, when he moved, three years ago, the rejection of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, stated that he could not admit that the Nonconformists had even a minute grievance. The right hon. Gentleman has not repeated that statement this evening, nor did the Home Secretary to-night make it. They have both minimized to the utmost of their ability the number of persons to whom the grievance applies; but I have not heard either of them deny that a real grievance exists. If they do not deny the existence of the grievance, neither do they admit it, nor hold out the slightest hope that they will either by compromise or any other plan remove that grievance. It is quite clear what the Government are prepared to do. They are prepared to maintain to the fullest extremity—and it is probably necessary for them to do so at the command of their clerical supporters—the vast extent of the privileges of the clergy of the Established Church, however much annoyance and dissatisfaction those privileges may cause to their Nonconformist fellow-countrymen. But they are prepared to treat this question as a sanitary question; and they indulge in what I believe will be a futile hope that by diminishing the number of churchyards in which this grievance will exist, and the number of persons directly affected by the grievance, they will get rid of the agitation which undoubtedly exists. The Home Secretary is prepared for a measure. He bewails the mistake that was made some years ago when the Burials Inspector was attached to the Home Office, and not to the office of the Local Government Board. The right hon. Gentleman is prepared to deal with this question by transferring that Inspector from his own Department to that of his Colleague, and I think he held out some hope that in another Session he would be prepared to deal with the existing state of the law, and would bring forward some measure by which all churchyards which are not in a good sanitary condition should be closed. But that treatment will not allay this agitation. You cannot upon sanitary grounds close all the churchyards in the country; and however active your Burial Inspectors may be, there will remain in many country parishes churchyards which you cannot find a sanitary reason for closing. A good deal has been said about the fast increasing population of the country. But the House must recollect that this question does not apply to populous suburban districts, but exclusively to rural districts; and if I am not very much mistaken, the population of these districts is not increasing, but rather diminishing, as the recent Census has proved. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he is a Member for Buckinghamshire. I have the honour to represent the Radnor Burghs, a constituency in Wales; and in many districts of Wales, where this grievance is felt to the utmost, I know that many churchyards are very thinly inhabited, because there is only a scattered population, and the right hon. Gentleman will find there no excuse for closing them. How will the sanitary treatment of this question by the Treasury Bench deal with this grievance? You are mistaken if you suppose that you will allay this agitation by reducing the area in which it operates; you are mistaken if you suppose that the Dissenters and the large body of Nonconformists who live in the large towns will abandon the rights of their brethren in the rural districts. As long as there is only one place in which inhabitants of a parish must be buried with rites to which they object in their lifetime, and which their relations and friends do not approve, or else must be buried without any service at all—as long as that grievance exists in a single parish I do not believe that you will allay this agitation. I have no doubt that before very long this question will be settled. I believe that it will be met in one of three ways, it must either be ignored or compromised, or the grievance must be removed. The speeches of many of the clergy and of many of the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman show that they have been seeking earnestly, but hitherto in vain, for some reasonable compromise of this question. The right hon. Gentleman sitting upon the Treasury Bench is disposed to ignore this question, or, at all events, to reduce it to the level of a sanitary measure. I believe that the well-meant efforts of the supporters of the Government who wish for a compromise will not succeed, because those hon. Members have not yet hit upon a practical form of compromise on which they themselves are agreed. I believe that the sense of justice of the people will reject the mode of treatment of this subject proposed by the Government; and I believe the solution of the question, that sooner or later the House will be constrained to adopt, will be that which is proposed by the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. NEVILL said, that as he had on two previous occasions voted for the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it was his intention to vote for the Resolution.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 279; Noes 248: Majority 31.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hn. Sir C. Croas, rt. hon. R. A.
 Allen, Major Cubitt, G.
 Allsopp, C. Cuninghame, Sir W.
 Allsopp, H. Dalkeith, Earl of Arkwright, F. Davenport, W. B.
 Ashbury, J. L. Deakin, J. H.
 Assheton, R. Denison, C. B.
 Astley, Sir J. D. Denison, W. B.
 Bagge, Sir W. Denison, W. E.
 Bailey, Sir J. R. Dickson, Major A. G.
 Balfour, A. J. Digby, hon. Capt. E.
 Baring, T. C. Diasraeli, rt. hon. B.
 Barne, F. St. J. N. Dyott, Colonel R.
 Barrington, Viscount Eaton, H. W.
 Bartelot, Sir W. B. Edmonstone, Admiral
 Bates, E. Sir W.
 Bateson, Sir T. Egerton, hon. A. F.
 Bathurst, A. A. Egerton, Sir P. G.
 Beach, rt. hn. Sir M. H. Egerton, hon. W.
 Beach, W. W. B. Elliot, G. W.
 Bective, Earl of Elphinstone, Sir J. D. H.
 Bennett-Stanford, V. F. Emlyn, Viscount
 Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C. Eslington, Lord
 Bentinck, G. W. P. Estcourt, G. B.
 Beresford, G. dela Poer Fellowes, E.
 Beresford, Colonel M. Fielden, J.
 Birley, H. Finch, G. H.
 Blackburne, J. I. Floyer, J.
 Boord, T. W. Folkestone, Viscount
 Bourke, hon. R. Forester, C. T. W.
 Bourne, Colonel Forsyth, W.
 Bousfield, Major Fraser, Sir W. A.
 Bright, R. Freshfield, C. K.
 Brise, Colonel R. Gallwey, Sir W. P.
 Broadley, W. H. H. Galway, Viscount
 Brooks, W. C. Gardner, J. T. Agg-Brymer, W. E. Gardner, R. Richard-Buckley, Sir E. son-
 Burrell, Sir P. Garnier, J. C.
 Buxton, Sir R. J. Gibson, E.
 Cameron, D. Gilpin, Sir R. T.
 Campbell, C. Goddard, A. L.
 Cartwright, F. Goldney, G.
 Cawley, C. E. Gooch, Sir D.
 Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G. Gordon, rt. hon. E. S.
 Chaplin, H. Gordon, W.
 Chapman, J. Gorst, J. E.
 Charley, W. T. Grantham, W.
 Christie, W. L. Greene, E.
 Churchill, Lord R. Gregory, G. B.
 Clifton, T. H. Guinness, Sir A.
 Clive, hon. Col. G. W. Hall, A. W.
 Close, M. C. Halsey, T. F.
 Clowes, S. W. Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Cobbett, J. M. Hamilton, I. T.
 Cobbold, T. C. Hamilton, Lord G.
 Cole, Col. hon. H. A. Hamilton, hon. R. B.
 Coope, O. E. Hamond, C. F.
 Corbett, Colonel Hanbury, R. W.
 Cordes, T. Hardcastle, E.
 Cotton, rt. hn. W. J. R. Hardy, rt. hon. G.
 Crichton, Viscount Hardy, J. S.

Harvey, Sir R. B. Palk, Sir L.
 Hay, rt. hon. Sir J. C. D. Parker, Lt.-Col. W.
 Heath, R. Pateshall, E.
 Hermon, E. Peek, Sir H. W.
 Hervey, Lord F. Pell, A.
 Heygate, W. U. Pemberton, E. L.
 Hildyard, T. B. T. Pennant, hon. G.
 Hill, A. S. Peploe, Major Hinchbrook, Visct. Percy, Earl Hodgson, W. N. Phipps, P.
 Hogg, Sir J. M. Pim, Captain B.
 Holford, J. P. G. Plunket, hon. D. R.
 Holker, Sir J. Plunkett, hon. R.
 Holland, Sir H. T. Polhill-Turner, Capt.
 Holmesdale, Viscount Powell, W.
 Home, Captain Praed, C. T.
 Hood, hon. Captain A. Praed, H. B.
 W. A. N. Price, Captain
 Hope, A. J. B. B. Puleston, J. H.
 Hubbard, E. Raikes, H. C.
 Hubbard, rt. hon. J. Read, C. S.
 Hunt, rt. hon. G. W. Rendlesham, Lord
 Jenkinson, Sir G. S. Repton, G. W.
 Jervis, Colonel Ridley, M. W.
 Johnson, J. G. Ritchie, C. T.
 Jolliffe, hon. S. Rodwell, B. B. H.
 Jones, J. Round, J.
 Kennaway, Sir J. H. Russell, Sir C.
 Knight, F. W. Ryder, G. R.
 Knightley, Sir R. Sackville, S. G. S.
 Knowles, T. Salt, T.
 Lacon, Sir E. H. K. Sanderson, T. K.
 Lawrence, Sir T. Sandon, Viscount Learmonth, A. Sclater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
 Lee, Major V. Scott, Lord H.
 Legard, Sir C. Scott, M. D.
 Legh, W. J. Scourfield, Sir J. H.
 Leigh, Lt.-Col. E. Selwin-Ibbetson, Sir
 Leighton, S. H. J.
 Lennox, Lord H. G. Shute, General
 Leslie, Sir J. Sidebottom, T. H.
 Lindsay, Col. R. L. Simonds, W. B.
 Lindsay, Lord Smith, A.
 Lloyd, S. Smith, F. C.
 Lloyd, T. E. Smith, S. G.
 Lopes, H. C. Smith, W. H.
 Lopes, Sir M. Somerset, Lord H. R. C.
 Lowther, hon. W. Spinks, Mr. Serjeant
 Lowther, J. Stanhope, hon. E.
 Mac Iver, D. Stanhope, W. T. W. S.
 Majendie, L. A. Stanley, hon. F.
 Makins, Colonel Starkey, L. R.
 Malcolm, J. W. Starkie, J. P. C.
 Manners, rt. hn. Lord J. Steere, L.
 March, Earl of Storer, G.
 Marten, A. G. Sykes, C.
 Mellor, T. W. Talbot, J. G.
 Merewether, C. G. Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
 Mills, A. Tennant, R.
 Mills, Sir C. H. Thornhill, T.
 Monckton, F. Thwaites, D.
 Morgan, hon. F. Thynne, Lord H. F.
 Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R. Tollemache, hon. W. F.
 Naghten, Lt.-Col. Torr, J.
 Neville-Grenville, R. Tremayne, J.
 Newdegate, C. N. Turnor, E.
 Newport, Viscount Twells, P.
 Noel, rt. hon. G. J. Walker, T. E.
 North, Colonel Wallace, Sir R.
 Northcote, rt. hon. Sir Walpole, hon. F.
 S. H. Walpole, rt. hon. S.
 Onslow, D. Waterhouse, S.
 Paget, R. H. Watney, J.

Mr. Nevill

Wellesley, Captain
Wells, E.
Wethered, T. O.
Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Williams, Sir F. M.
Wilmot, Sir H.
Wilmot, Sir J. E.
Wolff, Sir H. D.
Woodd, B. T.

Wroughton, P.
Wyndham, hon. P.
Yarmouth, Earl of Yorke, hon. E.
Yorke, J. R.

TELLERS.

Dyke, Sir W. H.
Winn, R.

NOES.

Acland, Sir T. D.
Adam, rt. hon. W. P.
Allen, W. S.
Amory, Sir J. H.
Anderson, G.
Anstruther, Sir R.
Antrobus, Sir E.
Ashley, hon. E. M.
Backhouse, E.
Balfour, Sir G.
Barclay, A. C.
Barclay, J. W.
Bass, A.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.
Bazley, Sir T.
Beaumont, Major F.
Beaumont, W. B.
Bell, I. L.
Biddulph, M.
Biggar, J. G.
Blake, T.
Blennerhassett, R. P.
Bolckow, H. W. F.
Brady, J.
Brassey, H. A.
Brassey, T.
Briggs, W. E.
Bright, J.
Bright, rt. hon. J.
Bristowe, S. B.
Brogden, A.
Brooks, M.
Brown, J. C.
Brown, G. E.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord E.
Burt, T.
Butt, I.
Callan, P.
Cameron, C.
Campbell, Sir G.
Campbell-Bannerman,
H.
Carington, hn. Col. W.
Cartwright, W. C.
Cave, T.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Cavendish, Lord G.
Chadwick, D.
Chaine, J.
Chambers, Sir T.
Cholmeley, Sir H.
Clarke, J. C.
Clifford, C. C.
Clive, G.
Cogan, rt. hn. W. H. F.
Cole, H. T.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Collins, E.
Colman, J. J.
Corry, J. P.
Cotes, C. C.

Cowan, J.
Cowen, J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.
Crawford, J. S.
Cross, J. K.
Crossley, J.
Davies, D.
Davies, R.
Dilke, Sir C. W.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Dixon, G.
Dodds, J.
Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Douglas, Sir G.
Duff, M. E. G.
Duff, R. W.
Dunbar, J.
Dundas, J. C.
Earp, T.
Edwards, H.
Egerton, hon. Adm. F.
Ellice, E.
Ennis, N.
Evans, T. W.
Ewing, A. O.
Fawcett, H.
Fay, C. J.
Ferguson, R.
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Fitzwilliam, hon. C.
W. W.
Fletcher, I.
Foljambe, F. J. S.
Forster, Sir C.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
Gladstone, W. H.
Goldsmid, Sir F.
Goldsmid, J.
Gordon, Sir A. H.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gourley, E. T.
Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Grieve, J. J.
Hankey, T.
Harcourt, Sir W. V.
Harrison, C.
Harrison, J. F.
Hartington, Marq. of Havelock, Sir H.
Hayter, A. D.
Henry, M.
Herbert, H. A.
Hill, T. R.
Hodgson, K. D.
Holland, S.
Holms, J.
Holms, W.
Hopwood, C. H.
Howard, hn. C. W. G.
Hughes, W. B.

Ingram, W. J.
James, Sir H.
James, W. H.
Jenkins, D. J.
Johnstone, Sir H.
Kenealy, Dr.
Kennard, Colonel
Kensington, Lord
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Knatchbull-Hugessen,
rt. hon. E.
Laing, S.
Lambert, N. G.
Laverton, A.
Law, rt. hon. H.
Lawrence, Sir J. C.
Lawson, Sir W.
Leatham, E. A.
Leeman, G.
Lefevre, G. J. S.
Leith, J. F.
Lewis, C. E.
Lloyd, M.
Locke, J.
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Lubbock, Sir J.
Lusk, Sir A.
Macdonald, A.
Macduff, Viscount
Macgregor, D.
Mackintosh, C. F.
M'Arthur, A.
M'Arthur, W.
M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
M'Lagan, P.
M'Laren, D.
Maitland, J.
Maitland, W. F.
Marjoribanks, Sir D. C.
Massey, rt. hon. W. N.
Maxwell, Sir W. S.
Meldon, C. H.
Middleton, Sir A. E.
Milbank, F. A.
Monk, C. J.
Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.
Morley, S.
Mundella, A. J.
Muntz, P. H.
Mure, Colonel
Murphy, N. D.
Nevill, C. W.
Noel, E.
Nolan, Captain
Norwood, C. M.
O'Byrne, W. R.
O'Callaghan, hon. W.
O'Clery, K.
O'Donoghue, The O'Gorman, P.
O'Keefe, J.
O'Shaughnessy, R.
O'Sullivan, W. H.
Parnell, C. S.
Pease, J. W.
Peel, A. W.
Peel, rt. hon. Sir R.

Pender, J.
Pennington, F.
Perkins, Sir F.
Phillips, R. N.
Playfair, rt. hon. L.
Portman, hn. W. H. B.
Potter, T. B.
Price, W. E.
Ralli, P.
Ramsay, J.
Rashleigh, Sir C.
Rathbone, W.
Redmond, W. A.
Reed, E. J.
Richard, H.
Ripley, H. W.
Robertson, H.
Rothschild, Sir N. M. de
Russell, Lord A.
Rylands, P.
St. Aubyn, Sir J.
Samuda, J. D'A.
Samuelson, B.
Seely, C.
Shaw, W.
Sheil, E.
Sheridan, H. B.
Sherriff, A. C.
Simon, Mr. Serjeant
Smith, E.
Stacpoole, W.
Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
Stevenson, J. C.
Stewart, M. J.
Stuart, Colonel
Sullivan, A. M.
Swanston, A.
Talbot, C. R. M.
Tavistock, Marquess of Taylor, D.
Taylor, P. A.
Temple, rt. hon. W.
Cowper-
Torrens, W. T. M'C.
Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
Hanbury-
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Vivian, A. P.
Vivian, H. H.
Waddy, S. D.
Walsh, hon. A.
Walter, J.
Waterlow, Sir S. H.
Watkin, Sir E. W.
Weguelin, T. M.
Whalley, G. H.
Whitbread, S.
Whitworth, B.
Williams, W.
Wilson, C.
Wilson, Sir M.
Yeaman, J.
Young, A. W.

TELLERS.

Martin, P. W.
Morgan, G. O.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

EXCHEQUER BONDS (£4,080,000) BILL.

[BILL 89.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Treasury may raise £4,080,000 by Exchequer bonds) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Interest on bond and repayment of principal).

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to take that opportunity of asking the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to give an explanation of the circumstances under which the correspondence between Sir Daniel Lange and Lord Granville had been laid upon the Table of the House. He presumed it had been done by inadvertence; but, in any case, it was a most objectionable and ill-advised proceeding. The letters of Sir Daniel Lange were of a private and confidential character, and were written to subserve English interests; and in consequence of their publication, that gentleman had been deprived of his position as the British representative of the Suez Canal Company. The motives which actuated Sir Daniel Lange were distinctly expressed in one of his letters, where, in speaking of his co-operation with M. de Lesseps, he said—

"We have worked together to unite the two seas; he for the glory of France, and I for the interest of England."

In 1871, when the Suez Canal Company were in great difficulties for want of sufficient capital, Sir Daniel Lange urged upon M. de Lesseps that he should look to Great Britain for the means of raising additional capital, and with that view, he prepared to concede the entire management of the Canal to English capitalists, retaining, at the same time, his position as President of the Canal in France. Sir Daniel Lange, in his private letter to Lord Granville detailing this interview, stated that—

"M. de Lesseps recoiled with aversion from this proposition, and declared that he never would be a party to the transfer and management of the Canal to other than French hands, and trusts to the introduction of a few English directors on the French Board, who would share the responsibility and strengthen and uphold its present management in France, which would defeat the object [of English influence] sought to be obtained; at the same time giving an appearance of influence, without its actual possession."

Now he (Mr. Rylands) wished to call particular attention to this passage, because it proved that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was not justified in supposing that the offer made by M. de Lesseps, to place three English directors upon the Board, was dictated by any desire to promote English influence, but on the contrary, as he himself said in 1871, it was "to give an appearance of influence, without its actual possession." And it was an account of the communication to Lord Granville of this important conversation between himself and M. de Lesseps, that Sir Daniel Lange had been summarily dismissed from his post: he had been sacrificed simply in consequence of his devotion to British interests, and of the indiscretion of the Foreign Office in publishing his confidential letters. But if that were so, what course did the Government intend taking in the matter? The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) claimed that the purchase of these shares would give England great influence in the management of the Canal; but would it enable the Government to insist upon the reinstatement of Sir Daniel Lange in his office? That was a fair test of the influence which the transaction carried with it; but, in any case, it was a remarkable fact, that immediately after our having paid these £4,000,000, a gentleman, devoted to English interests, was summarily dismissed from his office by the President of the Canal Company, simply because he had sought to promote those interests. Before sitting down, there was another point to which he (Mr. Rylands) wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In Lord Derby's despatch of December 6th, he instructed Major General Stanton to remind the Khedive, in courteous terms, that the 5 per cent interest on the purchase money of the Suez Canal shares, as provided in the contract signed on the 25th November, formed a "primary charge" on the revenues of Egypt; and in his reply, General Stanton said that he had reminded His Highness that the 5 per cent guaranteed interest was a primary charge upon the revenues of Egypt; but, on referring to the contract of the 25th November, the 5 per cent was made simply an ordinary charge on the revenues of Egypt; and he (Mr. Rylands) wished to know on what grounds Lord Derby had assumed that it was a primary charge upon the Egyptian revenues?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER repeated the explanation which he stated he had already given with reference to the sum of £200,000 forming a primary charge upon the revenues of Egypt. With regard to the correspondence of Sir Daniel Lange, it was not a matter upon which he had any official knowledge.

MR. DISRAELI said, that the Government had received no communication from Sir Daniel Lange, and he therefore did not know what he complained of, as no Member of the Government was in possession of any statement from him. With regard to the correspondence addressed to Lord Granville, it was published by no inadvertence, but according to the recognized rules which regulated the publication of despatches.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the question as it affected Sir Daniel Lange could not be adequately discussed upon a clause in the Bill before the House, and he would, therefore, postpone what he had to say in the matter. The dismissal of that gentleman was looked upon as a matter of great importance, and he should have something to say about it on a future day. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the letters of Sir Daniel Lange had been published in due course; but as he had been in communication for some 15 years with that gentleman on matters connected with the Suez Canal, he could state that these letters addressed to the Foreign Secretary were marked "private and confidential." Yet it now appeared from the statement of the Prime Minister that it was the regular course to publish such letters without even first communicating with the writer.

MR. DISRAELI said, that they were not sent to the present Government, but were addressed to Lord Granville.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, but they were addressed to him as Foreign Secretary. Lord Palmerston used to say that you took over a Government as you did a racehorse, "with all its engagements." He could not but think that these letters must have been published by inadvertence. [MR. DISRAELI: I beg your pardon. It was no inadvertence.] If so, it could not be too widely trumpeted forth that when a person unconnected with the Foreign Office, and not under its superintendence or control, wrote to the Foreign Secretary he must expect to see his letters printed and laid before Parliament without communication with him and although his letters might be marked "private and confidential." This must be matter for further consideration, because the dismissal of Sir Daniel Lange bore upon the question of the great interest and influence we were said to have acquired by the purchase of the Canal. He did not approve the manner in which the money was proposed to be raised under the Bill, because it involved the principle of a Sinking Fund without previous appropriation, which had been so often tried and failed. That point, however, was raised last year, and as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had carried his measure, there was no great public object to be served by discussing the same question substantially on the present occasion. Would it not be well to state in the Act that the power of borrowing was not to be exercised in the open market? He presumed it was intended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this should be a domestic transaction between the National Debt Office and the Exchequer, and it might be an advantage to embody that in the Bill. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state that he was about to keep this matter out of the annual accounts, but he saw nothing in the Bill to that effect, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend had altered his mind. It was essential that the entire expenditure of the country should be brought within the purview of Parliament, and he trusted that the £200,000 would distinctly appear in the annual account.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that when he spoke of keeping outside the finances of the year he used a misleading phrase, and did not propose to raise £4,000,000 by a charge upon taxation within the year, or to create stock, but he considered the payments would be such as virtually to provide the sums required. In point of fact, as the Bill was drawn, the matter would come regularly on the accounts of the year; and when he produced the other Bill of which he spoke it would be seen that it prescribed a form for a Return to be laid before Parliament which would show the nature of the transaction and the amount paid off from year to year. It might happen that in some years the £200,000 would not be forthcoming, and in that case it would be a charge upon the revenues of the year, and the £200,000 to be received from Egypt would be carried to miscellaneous revenue. It was certainly intended that these should be domestic transactions. At present the National Debt Commissioners were in funds, as money they had advanced for the purpose of the Irish Church was being returned and was seeking investment, and it would be convenient to make use of this money. Although strictly bonds would not be obtainable to be negotiated, and it was intended the National Debt Commissioners should hold them, it would not be convenient so to tie them up as to render their negotiation absolutely impossible. The proposal was that sums making up the £4,000,000 should be received from the Commissioners at such times as it would be convenient to them to pay them, and the payment would be made on three instalments, two of £1,500,000, and the last of £1,000,000.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Duration of bonds and application of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 25, to bonds) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Payment of money raised to Consolidated Fund).

In reply to Mr. GOSCHEN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was calculated the bonds would be redeemed in about 35 years, and it was proposed that a certain sum should be redeemed every year.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that a statement ought to be produced showing the intended operation of the scheme.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would promise that the scheme should be laid before Parliament.

Clause agreed to.

DEPRECIATION OF SILVER.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider and report upon the causes of the depreciation of the price of silver, and the effects of such depreciation upon the exchange between India and England."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

And, on March 9, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. BAXTER, MR. CHRISTOPHER BECKETT DENISON, MR. GOSCHEN, MR. KIRKMAN HODGSON, MR. HUBBARD, LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, MR. MASSEY, MR. MULHOLLAND, MR.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

FAWCETT, MR. CAVE, MR. SHAW, MR. HERMON, and SIR CHARLES MILLS:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

PETITION OF MR. CHARLES HENWOOD.

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Petition of Mr. Charles Henwood, presented upon the 16th day of February last,* be printed and distributed with the Votes."—(Colonel Beresford.)

[* Henwood, Charles, — Petition of Charles Henwood, for inquiry into his case to lie upon the Table.]

MR. HUNT opposed the Motion. The Committee on Petitions had refused to print it in the usual way, and it was a question whether the usual Order for the Petition to lie on the Table should not be discharged. He would move to that effect, inasmuch as it contained a gross libel on an hon. Member of that House, and an official who occupied a high position in the Admiralty. Beyond that, the Petitioner had raised a suit in the Courts, which he had withdrawn from, and now sought to make the House give currency to those libels.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Order that the Petition of Mr. Charles Henwood do lie upon the Table be read, and discharged,"—(Mr. Hunt.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GOLDSMID thought that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) ought to apologize to the House and to the hon. Member referred to (Mr. E. J. Reed) for having presented a Petition, which the First Lord had thought it his duty to characterize as "libellous."

MR. E. J. REED said, the allegations against himself and Sir Spencer Robinson were of such an unfounded character that if he had thought them worth notice, he would not have waited for the matter being brought before the House in that shape.

COLONEL BERESFORD declined to accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Rochester. He asked for simple justice, and if the House declined to accept his Motion, other means would be taken to secure publicity.

CAPTAIN PIM hoped the House would agree to the reception of the Petition. He would read the Petition, when—

MR. ANDERSON rose to Order. He understood that it was the usual course to make a Motion that a Petition should be read. That had not been done, and therefore he hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not be allowed to proceed.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Petition had been referred in the ordinary way to the Committee on Petitions, and that Committee had not thought fit to order it to be printed. The hon. and gallant Member was not out of Order.

CAPTAIN PIM was proceeding to read the Petition, when—

Notice taken, that Strangers were present:—

Whereupon, Mr. Speaker read the Resolution on the subject which was adopted by the House last Session, and stated that unless otherwise directed by the House he should abide by that Resolution. He accordingly, without further debate, put the Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw."

The House divided:—Ayes 6; Noes 16.

Forty Members not being present—

House was adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 6th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading— Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000); Consoldated Fund (£4,080,000).

FIRMAN ON REFORMS—THE SUBLIME
PORTE—THE ANDRASSY NOTE.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to move an Address for copies of the Firman on Reforms which had lately come from the Sublime Porte, and of the Austrian Note by which it had been followed. The noble Lord said, that a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne on the opening of Parliament gave more importance to the disturbances in the Herzegovina than language coming from any other quarter could impart to them. Having recently had a personal opportunity of ascertaining the opinions of persons at Constantinople qualified to judge, he found it to be the opinion of many that the Austrian Note was not adapted so much to promote tranquillity as to encourage the insurgents. That, he thought, was erroneous; but however that might be, he knew from personal knowledge that much uneasiness existed in the Danubian Principalities. If the ideas he had found to prevail at Bucharest were correct, it was now too late to do anything to calm the existing insurrection; but he thought the circumstances were calculated to call for the utmost vigilance. It was not his intention to enter into the merits or demerits of what Her Majesty's Government did during the autumn; but it appeared to him desirable that their Lordships should have before them the Papers for which he moved in order that they might see how far the Firman on Reforms fell short or exceeded what was promised by the Sultan. The origin of the insurrection was clear to all who had studied the Eastern Question. In October, 1874, the three great military Powers, whose union, however lawful or excusable, was always disastrous in its consequences to the sovereignty of the Porte, assumed an attitude hostile to that sovereignty in respect of its European Provinces. It was so regarded by the Porte; it was so regarded by our Foreign Office. Evidently it was one which would inevitably excite the races whose allegiance was always more or less disturbed, and it was quite evident at the time the debate took place last Session, that an insurrection was pending. It was not to be supposed that we could influence the foreign policy of Russia, nor were we in a position either to influence the foreign policy of Austria. One course, however, remained to us—namely, to bring the influence of Berlin, if we could, to bear upon those Powers; and if that influence were exercised in the manner he suggested, it would check the influences by which the insurrection in the Provinces was supported. He was not surprised that there should be mani-festated out-of-doors some sympathy with the insurgents; but he could not see that that sympathy could be justified on the ground by the sympathy felt towards the Greeks or the Poles, or with the Southern States of America. He thought there was no great object to be gained by Europe or by the world at large, by the establishment of a Kingdom of the Herzegovina or a Kingdom of Bosnia. Then as to the interests of the Turkish bondholders, certainly they were not advanced by the continuance of the insurrection. It should be remembered that the insurrection cost the Porte £50,000 a-day. If the insurrection did not exist that sum would be available for the bondholders, and so far the insurgents were the greatest enemies whom the bondholders had. It was also urged as an argument in favour of the insurrection that "the sick man" had reached that point of sickness that his general collapse was certain to occur at no distant day; but we could not point to a single instance in history in which a kingdom, no matter how enfeebled, had collapsed until external force had been brought to bear against it. Then there was now an opinion that the occupation of the Bosphorus by Russia would be harmless; but no one with any knowledge of the subject could be of that opinion. The elements on which the insurrection hung were so complex that we could not disregard it; the financial embarrassments were a source of temptation to those who would destroy the Turkish Empire, and at the same time those difficulties rendered the Government of the Porte less able to apply its attention to resisting attempts on its integrity.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of the firman on reforms which has lately come from the Sublime Porte, and of the Austrian note by which it has been followed.—(The Lord Campbell.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he did not rise to ask any questions which it might be inconvenient for the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary to answer at the present moment; but he thought he might, without seeking to place the noble Earl in any difficulty, ask him for some further explanation as to the policy recently adopted by Her Majesty's Government in reference to Count Andrassy's

Note. Hitherto we had had no explicit statement as to the obligations we had assumed. As he understood that policy, Her Majesty's Government gave a general approval to the Note, assented to its truth, and supported the suggestions made in it; but did not bind themselves to carry out any particular line of policy now or in future, and did not preclude themselves from taking any steps which the dignity and the interests of this country might require. The question was not one in respect of which the country would be of opinion that a policy of non-interference would be best; because it could scarcely be held that obligations which we had undertaken with regard to the Christian populations could now be evaded, or that they were not as binding at the present time as they were 20 years ago. It should be remembered that at that time, when we undertook the Crimean War, it was understood that there must be an amelioration of the condition of those populations if our responsibilities were to be satisfied; and, as Mr. Cobden stated in the other House, those were obligations not to be evaded. Yet these promises on the part of the Porte had been notoriously unperformed. The Note of Count Andrassy was, in fact, an indictment against the Porte for not having fulfilled its obligations. In his Note Count Andrassy referred to the Hatti-Humayoun of 1856 and to the Iradé of October last, and recapitulated the articles in those documents to show that they had been palpably evaded. The Hatti-Hamayoun purported to deal in a satisfactory manner with the tithe question, but that question was open, and was a principal cause of irritation up to the present moment. The question whether the promises contained in the reply of the Porte to Count Andrassy's Note were to be trusted might not be very material for third parties to consider; but it was one in which the populations now in insurrection were deeply concerned, because they were called upon to put down their arms on the faith of those promises. He wished to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), whether he had any objection to produce the answer made by the British Government to the communication accompanying that Note, the communication made by the British Government to the Porte in support of the Note, and the answer of the Porte to that communication?

Lord Campbell

THE EARL OF DERBY: I do not think that my noble Friend who began this conversation (Lord Campbell) or your Lordships will expect me to follow him through those very interesting, but, if I may say so without discourtesy, rather discursive, remarks which he has addressed to your Lordships upon the subject of the present position and possible future prospects of the Turkish Empire. My noble Friend has given great care and attention to this subject. He has studied it at Constantinople and in other European capitals; and he has very naturally and properly availed himself of this opportunity to give us the advantage of the information which he has obtained and the impressions which have been made upon his mind. But, my Lords, although it is proper and right for my noble Friend to speculate on the acts of foreign States in regard to those questions now pending, I cannot, without impropriety and without injury to the public service, display the same unreserve. I quite agree with some of the propositions which my noble Friend laid down. Nothing could be more natural than that those who are threatened with the loss of their money should show themselves angry, and should seek to revenge themselves by favouring the cause of the insurgents. But that certainly is not a course likely to improve their interests. It would be very like what is vulgarly described as cutting off your nose to be revenged on your face. I also agree with my noble Friend that, badly administered as the Turkish Empire was and still is, it has nevertheless very great resources remaining. I think it would in the event of a life and death struggle put forth a degree of strength, under the influence of religious fanaticism and patriotic sentiment, greater than most people give it credit for. But I do not think it necessary to use any argument to convince your Lordships that it is not our interest or the interest of the world in general that all Eastern Europe and those Provinces inhabited by a mixed population of Mahomedans and Christians should be put into a state of disturbance and anarchy which would probably end in a widespread war of religion and of race, and in which all these acts of cruelty would be perpetrated which fear and fanaticism tend to produce. It is clearly not desirable that this question should be settled in that manner. Therefore, I do not think that many people will differ from what was said by the noble Earl who spoke last (the Earl of Morley) to the effect that the position in which we find ourselves, and considering our past connection with this question, a policy of absolute non-interference was impossible. The noble Earl wishes to know what our obligations are under the recent correspondence with respect to Count Andrassy's Note. The noble Earl said that we have given a general support to the Andrassy Note. That we did so, and, with some reservations, urged the acceptance of that Note on the Porte, is quite true; but I think that the noble Earl carried his argument a little further than he ought, when he said that because we had done that we had made ourselves responsible for every statement in that Note. That is not the case. We had nothing to do with the framing of that Note. We only saw it after it was framed, and when the question was practically this—What course ought we to take in regard to it? Whatever course we might take it was certain that the Note would be sent to the Porte and would be supported by the three great Powers. The question was, should the Porte be advised to accept or to reject it? As between the two alternatives we had no hesitation in saying that it was the interest and duty of the Porte to accept it. That advice we accordingly gave; but beyond that we have given no pledge; and apart from Treaty obligations of old standing, which are not affected by anything recently said or done, we are as absolutely free to act in such a manner as our duty and the circumstances of the case may require as we were before we gave that advice. The noble Earl (the Earl of Morley) has reminded us of the obligations which we, in common with former Governments, are considered to owe to the Christian populations of the Turkish Provinces. I have no doubt that when 20 years ago we guaranteed the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire, we acquired the right in the case of extreme misgovernment to remonstrate on behalf of oppressed populations. I think it does not require much argument to prove that. All protection involves a certain right of control. But, my Lords, there is extreme delicacy and difficulty in endeavouring to lay down the precise line of demarcation between what may be regarded as a proper and reasonable interference and what may, however, well merit here the appearance of an attempt to over-ride the independence of Turkey, which it was the very object of the war to maintain. I have always held that it is our right and duty to watch over the interest of the various populations of the Turkish Empire, not as setting class against class, race against race, Christian against Mahomedan, but looking to the interest of all and to those of humanity and justice generally. I am sure your Lordships have no wish that I should go more into detail in the absence of the Papers which have been asked for, and which are in preparation. I hope that before long it will be in my power to lay them on the Table of the House. The present state of the case is this:—The Porte, as we all know, has accepted the Note of Count Andrassy with some reservations; but which reservations refer to questions of detail, and seem to be not unreasonable. Neither Russia nor Austria—nor any other Power—has attempted to interfere between the Porte and its subjects in the insurgent Provinces, but they have recommended certain reforms which, if adopted, will tend to prevent any further increase of the insurrection, and have given a pledge that they will use such moral influence as they may possess in favour of the restoration of peace, both with the insurgents and the inhabitants of Servia, Montenegro, and the Principalities. It is idle to attempt to predict to what extent it will be successful influence; but, for my own part, I believe they are acting with sincerity and in good faith, and that they are anxiously desirous of preventing the further spread of the insurrection. I have been asked why the Governments have not interfered sooner and more effectually; but it is obvious that where two countries have a long line of frontier running for the most part through a mountainous and difficult country, and where on the Austrian side there is a population which has strong sympathies with the insurgents on the other side, it is not easy even with the best will on the part of the authorities to enforce an entire neutrality. If I wanted an illustration of that I should not have to go very far. I should only have to remind your Lordships of what took place a few years ago during that civil war in Spain which is now happily ended. On the side of the French authorities there was every desire to fulfil the obligations which International Law imposed upon them, but they were entirely unable to prevent a great deal of help being given by Carlist sympathizers on the French side of the Pyrenees to the combatants on the other side of the French frontiers. I do not object to the Motion of my noble Friend (Lord Campbell) with respect to the Papers which he has asked for. But with regard to those asked for by the noble Earl (the Earl of Morley), not being aware that he intended to apply for them, I must, before giving any pledge off-hand, look into them again; though at present I am not aware that there will be anything to prevent our laying them on the Table. I shall be ready at all times to state the course which the Government will be prepared to take; but at present I do not see that there will be any advantage to the country in making further observations on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 6th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Referees on Private Bills, nominated; Oyster Fisheries, appointed; Printing, Captain Nolan added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES—R.P.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Telegraphs (Money) [90]; Drugging of Animals [85].

Committee—Offences against the Person * [1]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Council of India (Professional Appointments) * [69].

Third Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000) [89]; Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000), and passed.

The Earl of Derby

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH MESSAGES.—QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the public will be allowed to supply themselves with telegraph cards in place of those withdrawn; and, whether, if such cards bear a proper stamp, they will be collected from the pillar post boxes and be sent out as telegraph messages?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that for the reason which he assigned the other day, the telegraph cards had ceased to exist; but the telegraph message forms, with which the public were supplied, could be deposited in the pillar post boxes, whence they would be collected and despatched. For obvious reasons the latter were much less likely to be mistaken for letters, than were the old telegraph cards to be mistaken for halfpenny cards.

NAVY—COAL.—QUESTION.

MR. HUSSEY-VIVIAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph in "The Times" of the 29th ultimo, in which it is stated that experiments have been recently made by the Officers of the Steam Reserve at Portsmouth with certain coals from the Monmouthshire collieries, and that they have been classified in a certain order of merit; whether the results therein set forth are correct; whether it is intended to carry through a series of analogous experiments upon the leading coals of the South Wales coal field; and, whether any notice of such intention has been or is to be given to the owners of steam coal collieries in South Wales?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that until his attention was called to the paragraph in The Times of the 29th ult. he had not seen it. The Admiralty directed expected experiments to be made by the officers of the Steam Reserve at Portsmouth with certain coals from the Monmouthshire collieries for their own information, and with no intention of its reaching any newspaper, and how it got into that paper he did not know many days before the report reached him. He had no intention of instituting inquiries into the different collieries in Wales, the Admiralty being well aware of their quality. Whether the Report should have been produced by the Admiralty would have been a question for consideration; but as the statement that had been published was correct, it would be useless to withhold it, and if the hon. Member would move for it, it would be laid upon the Table.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—CASES OF SCURVY.—QUESTION.

MR. WARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that within the last week two vessels have arrived, one at Queenstown and the other in London, with an unusual number of bad cases of scurvy on board; and, whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to institute an inquiry into the causes thereof, and whether the result of these inquiries will be laid before the House?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I suppose the two cases referred to are the West Ridge, of Liverpool, and the Prince Rupert, of St. John, New Brunswick. In both of these cases there were several pronounced cases of scurvy. Inquiry has already been ordered in each case, to be held by the medical officers of the Board. Reports will be laid on the Table in due course, with other Papers, as I lately promised.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— WRENTHAM.—QUESTION.

MR. COLMAN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Education Department delayed, from the 6th September 1875 to the 21st January 1876, to intimate the condition of their consent, according to section 23 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, to the transfer of the Wrentham British School (being the only public Elementary School during that period in the district) to the Wrentham School Board, it having been offered to and accepted by the Board; and what was the reason for the delay; whether there is at present any obstacle to the transfer, the School Board having, in a letter of the 1st February, agreed to "relinquish the proposed term or condition of the transfer relating to the cost of carrying on the School, from the date at which the parish first asked for the School Board," as required by their Lordships on the 21st January 1876; and, whether the Department, having intimated for the first time on the 21st January, that

"my Lords have not yet determined whether the teacher of the National School is entitled to a Certificate. Until this point is determined it will be obvious that my Lords cannot decide whether they are justified in consenting to the transfer."

intend by their reply to make their consent to the transfer of the British School to depend on the position of the National School; and, if so, whether such reply is in accordance with the Minute of the Committee of Council of Education, dated the 17th July 1871?

VISCOUNT SANDON: This is a curious case, but it may not be amiss that the hon. Gentleman should have called attention to it, as it will show how easily, unless great care is taken, a locality may be made under the Act of 1870, to bear a double burden for its schools. The question is worded in such a manner that unless I state shortly the facts of the case a most erroneous impression might be created respecting it. Wrentham is a place which had two voluntary schools—one being National, and one British—with school accommodation considerably in excess of what is required by law; both had certificated teachers till 1875, when the National school engaged an uncertificated teacher, with the expectation of his getting a certificate from Her Majesty's Inspector in January, 1876. Two years ago the managers of the British school informed the Department officially that they intended to close their school, having passed a resolution to that effect. Upon this the Department, following the only possible course (Section 12 [2] of the Education Act, 1870, not applying to this, which was to be a united district), issued the usual printed notice to the locality, stating that a deficiency of school accommodation for 80 children existed, owing to the proposed closing of the British school, and that unless that accommodation was supplied within six months a school board would be ordered by the Department for the purpose of supplying it. Within the time named the requisite accommodation was supplied by the enlargement of the National public elementary school, and therefore a school board was not ordered, the equipment of the place being complete. Information was received some time after the place was ordered to provide further accommodation that the British school had, after all, not closed its doors as it announced it intended to do. There, therefore, remained two voluntary public elementary schools in the place; one, the enlarged National school, now become sufficient for the whole population, the other, the British school, which was still kept open, and both in receipt of Government annual grants. On the requisition of a meeting of ratepayers, a school board was ordered for Wrentham, it being at the same time intimated by the Department, in an official letter, that the school board, as matters then stood, would be unable to set up a school, though it would be able to pass bye-laws for compulsion, as the Department would not be justified in allowing a loan for a school, or probably also in allowing a Government annual grant to a board school, the place having put itself to the expense of supplying voluntarily the necessary accommodation in accordance with the requisition of the Department. The school board, when elected, requested the Department to agree to a transfer of the British school to the board; and here, in direct reply to a part of the Question, I have to say that the delay complained of arose principally from the National school having lost its certificated teacher and from the impossibility of ascertaining how the school would stand till the new master had been examined at the annual inspection of his school in 1876. If he had failed, it would have been a matter for our consideration whether the National school would not have ceased to supply efficient education. As it is, the master got his certificate in January, so that that part of the question is at an end. The obstacle, to which the Question alludes, now existing to the transfer of the British school to the board is this—The sanction of the Department is required by the statute for every transfer; and the Minute, to which the hon. Gentleman refers, only bears upon the details of a transfer, and not upon the principle of the propriety of the transfer itself, respecting which the Department cannot divest itself of the responsibility under the Act. We consider that it would be most unfair, and a breach of faith with those who have, in compliance with the requisition of the Department, supplied the necessary school accommodation, by sanctioning the transfer of the British school to the board, to throw the burden of the maintenance of that school upon the rate-payers generally, the locality having, at the bidding of the Department, on the announcement that the British school was to be given up, provided voluntarily elsewhere all the school accommodation needed. If we were to consent to such acts of injustice, I feel confident that the feeling of the country would soon turn against the Act of 1870. As it is, both the schools in question rank at present as public elementary schools; there is no deficiency of accommodation in the locality, the Department do not hold themselves justified in assenting to the transfer, but the two voluntary schools at Wrentham will, I trust, go on side by side, as they have done, for a long time past, supported with the aid of Government grants, by those who prefer them, as long as they wish to have them.

Mr. Colman

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—POOR LAW RELIEF.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether that Clause of the Elementary Education Amendment Act which provides that in cases where continuing Poor Law relief is given to parents it shall be a condition for the continuance of such relief that their children shall be kept at school, and that for this purpose, when necessary, additional relief shall be given, is intended to apply to cases where relief, owing to purely temporary causes, such as illness, is only given for a week or two, or for other very limited periods?

MR. SCLATER-BOOOTH: I cannot say what was the intention of the clause, but my opinion undoubtedly is, that where relief is given by weekly allowances, or for a period exceeding the interval between the meetings of the Guardians, the case comes within the terms of the Act. If the relief is given by the relieving officer on his own discretion in cases of sudden or urgent necessity, the condition does not apply.

THE NATIONAL BANK OF EGYPT. QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any foundation in the report that Her Majesty's Government has under consideration the nomination of a Commissioner who is to act on the Board of a Bank which it is sought to create in Egypt with the view of facilitating an advance of money to the Khedive?

MR. DISRAELI: It is true, Sir, that a proposal was made by the Egyptian Government to Her Majesty's Government that we should appoint a Commissioner to act, in the words of the hon. Gentleman's Question, "on the Board of a Bank which it is sought to create in Egypt;" but on inquiry we found that this would involve commercial relations between the contemplated institution and Her Majesty's Government, and of course we declined it. Had there been a proposal that a Commissioner should be appointed to receive certain branches of revenue and apply them to the redemption of debt, that would have been a proposal which might have received our consideration.

THE SCOTCH FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If definite instructions are given to the Commanders of the Cruisers on the Coast of Scotland in regard to their duties towards the fishermen; and, if so, if he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Instructions?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the instructions were sent by the Fishery Board of Scotland, and the question was one rather for the Home Secretary than for himself. He might state, however, on behalf of his right hon. Friend, that there would be no objection to lay a copy of the instructions on the Table of the House, if it were moved for.

SUNDAY DRINKING (IRELAND)—RETURN.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN (for Mr. MELDON) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return giving the number of persons who are reported by the police to have entered the publichouses of Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Londonderry, and other places on certain Sundays of the present year, giving at the same time the means adopted, if any, for ensuring that the same persons were not counted as different individuals on entering different publichouses or on re-entering the same house?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he would be happy to lay before the House all the information on this subject which had been furnished to him by the Constabulary. The Returns might not be precisely accurate, but he believed that, generally speaking, they would be found to be substantially correct.

RETURNS AS TO THE COURT OF SESSION.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the Lord Advocate, When Returns "Court of Session (Scotland) Litigated Cases," moved for on the 1st day of June 1875, presented on the 11th day of August, and ordered to be printed on the 13th day of August, would be in the hands of Members?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, that the delay occurred owing to an inaccuracy in the information received, but that the Returns would shortly be ready.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS—FOREIGN NATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. WILSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any further Communications have been received from Foreign Countries in reply to the Circular Despatch from the Foreign Office, dated the 3rd day of February 1875, on the subject of the Transfer of Unseaworthy ships to Foreign Flags, answers to which Circular were printed in a Return, headed Unseaworthy Ships (Transfer), and dated the 10th day of August 1875?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, further communications had been received from Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua. Of these, Denmark was legislating to prevent the use of unseaworthy ships, and the Swedish and Norwegian Governments were conferring with Maritime Powers about the transfer of unseaworthy ships to her flag; and the five South American Republics had all instructed their Consular agents to carry out our suggestion, that no transfer should be made without survey. These, together with the more important communications already laid on the Table, were, on the whole, satisfactory.

PARLIAMENT — PETITION OF MR. WILLIAM HENWOOD—EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SPEAKER: I think it right to call the attention of the House to a proceeding which occurred at the last sitting of the House. It will be in the recollection of the House that in the last Session a Resolution was agreed to, after much discussion, by which the ancient practice requiring the exclusion of Strangers on notice being taken of their attendance was suspended. That Resolution has not been renewed during the present Session or made a Standing Order of the House. Early on Saturday morning last an hon. Member took notice that Strangers were present, and it seemed to me that, after the House had deliberately discontinued its former practice, I was bound to consider, until otherwise instructed, that the new practice was henceforth to be observed. The House is aware that many Resolutions concerning matters of practice and order have been observed as binding without being renewed. I accordingly read to the House the Resolution of the 31st of May, 1875, and proceeded to put the Question for the withdrawal of Strangers in the terms of that Resolution. I then stated to the House the circumstances under which I deemed it my duty to give effect to that Resolution, but I think it proper that the House should have an opportunity of more fully declaring its purpose and determining whether the Resolution shall continue to be observed.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, after what you have said, I think it most convenient to say I will take an early opportunity of consulting the House upon this subject.

EXCHEQUER BONDS (£4,080,000) BILL. (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 89.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that the Bill be now read the third time, said, his object in moving the stage so early was to enable the Bill to be sent to the other House to be passed, so as to complete the matter

It immediately suggested itself to my mind, What is to be the position of this fortunate or unfortunate Commissioner? I will imagine myself, for the sake of argument, discharging, or attempting to discharge, the duties of the Commissioner: I set out to Alexandria armed, or not armed, as the case may be, with a plentiful following of financial and diplomatic secretaries. When I get to Alexandria I obtain a comfortable lodgment, and wait there to receive certain money which is to be brought to me. I am told that it constitutes the proceeds of the customs of Alexandria. When this money is brought to me my difficulties begin. How am I to know, being Commissioner for Her Majesty's Government, that this money constitutes the proceeds and the whole proceeds of the customs of Alexandria? If I am only to be there to receive what I am told constitutes the proceeds of the customs of Alexandria, then it seems to me that the appointment of this Commissioner may only be what I am sure is not desired by Her Majesty's Government—a mask under which Egypt, or the agents and advisers of the Egyptian Government, may inveigle the British public further with reference to Egyptian finance. Upon that consideration I am completely at the mercy of those who bring me the money—when they please, how they please, and in what quantity they please. I have no means of knowing whether it represents the customs of Alexandria. If the Commissioner is to be really responsible he must have the means of knowing what his revenue is, and that the money brought to him really represents the entire revenue levied under the head on which it has been paid. It is impossible that he can have that knowledge, unless he is naturally entrusted in every material and substantial respect with the levying of that revenue. For my part, I cannot conceive how there can be a fallacy in that method of looking at the case. If the Egyptian Government were to send a Commissioner to England, and that gentleman were to receive the customs at the port of London and apply them to a specific purpose, he would have no difficulty in ascertaining the amount from our system of accounts; but I do not at all feel the same assurance with regard to Alexandria. I should, therefore, wish to know whether,

if the proposition for the appointment of such a Commissioner be entertained, the right hon. Gentleman means the appointment of a Commissioner who would really have such an effective control over all arrangements and the mode of accounting for these revenues that he could guarantee to us the receipt of the whole, that it might be applied to the purpose in view? If this is what it does mean, it appears to me that we are only shifting the difficulty one step further; because in that case our Commissioner is to take into his hands the administration of a very important portion of the government of Egypt; so that the measures which we may think necessary as a matter of prudence to cover the proposal which we are to consider may entail upon us still greater difficulties and mix us up still further with a heavier responsibility for a portion of the internal government of Egypt. When we have begun with one portion of the internal government of Egypt we may pass on to another. We may come to occupy the entire ground by series of degrees not difficult to contemplate, and possibly this may have been in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the other night, when he said that while the people of this country would view the diminution of the Empire with horror, they would see it increased without dissatisfaction. I now wish to refer to the dismissal of Sir Daniel Lange. I must go back to the controversy with respect to the publication of these letters. My opinion is that the publication of these letters was an inadvertence. They were addressed to the Secretary of State in confidence; but I am not disposed to blame either the Government or the Foreign Secretary, because the preparation of these documents necessarily takes place in an office. It is impossible that the whole manuscripts can be revised by the Foreign Secretary, and it may be that, through the mistake of some official, these letters came before him without the important appendage of "Private and confidential" which was marked upon them. Now, with regard to Sir Daniel Lange, I cannot help saying, that there is no individual next to M. de Lesseps himself who has been more essentially associated with the whole history of this great enterprise, and with all its struggles in the period of its most formidable difficulties, than Sir Daniel Lange. I know least the communication to the House of the substance of the information which Mr. Cave had furnished to the Government; but as he understood there would be another Bill in connection with the subject of the Suez Canal shares shortly before the House, and that by that time Mr. Cave would probably have returned to England, he should defer putting any questions. He should like, however, to know when the Bill to which he alluded would be introduced, and when Mr. Cave might be expected home?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a great improvement in the Bill by his proposal to take the larger part of the commission by way of Vote in a Supplemental Estimate, and not in the form of a loan. There is still, however, a small part of the commission to be borrowed. It is proposed to borrow £20,000 and to vote £80,000, and I hold that the whole commission ought to be voted by the House. I should like to know something about another small sum which was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he computed the exact sum payable to the Khedive at £3,976,000, and raised the sum to £3,980,000, for the sake, as he said, of round numbers. It is a small sum, but I think the uniform principle is, that when a large sum is voted by this House, to vote the exact amount under that particular head, and not to vote a lump estimate for any supposed expenses. I do not desire to enter at large, although I should be quite entitled to do so, upon the subject of the Canal; but I wish to refer to one point which was alluded to the other night and to another which has arisen from something that has been said to-night. I will take first the point that has been raised to-night. In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright), it has been stated by the Prime Minister that the Government have refused the proposal of the Pacha of Egypt to appoint a Commissioner to superintend and to participate in the proceedings of a bank which it is proposed to found in Egypt in some kind of connection with the Government. The right hon. Gentleman says that Her Majesty's Government have declined, and I have not the least hesitation in saying the answer of Her Majesty's Government will convey a sense of considerable relief to the public mind. But unfortunately, as has been observed by an ancient poet—

“ Medio de fonte leporum, Surgit amari aliquid.”

The right hon. Gentleman did not allow us to enjoy the comfort which he administered for any length of time, for he proceeded to sketch out another extreme, which, if it were proposed, Her Majesty's Government would be in a condition to entertain. I hope it will not be thought that I am premature in calling attention to the very slight and at the same time appalling outline of the scheme which it is proposed to substitute for the scheme of the Khedive. I shall be glad if any explanation is given which will remove the difficulties and apprehensions which we may feel in connection with it. Let me say that while I can understand the motives connected with recent transactions which have led Her Majesty's Government to feel that it may be matter of importance, for reasons connected with their own conduct and proceedings, to bolster up Egypt, I think that in the whole of that matter they are treading upon tender ground. This is a question on which the public mind is extremely sensitive, and unless they are very cautious in the proceedings they adopt they may bring serious consequences on Parliament and on themselves. The scheme which the right hon. Gentleman has described as one which might be entertained we know nothing of, except from the language which was used. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he was not disposed to entertain —[Mr. DISRAELI: Consider.]—I am glad to be corrected, but we mean the same thing, though I think “consider” goes rather farther than “entertain.” Whether it goes farther or not, the proper course is to take the right hon. Gentleman's own word, and not the word which my imperfect recollection substituted for it. He said that the Government would not be indisposed to consider a proposition of the Khedive's, that they should appoint a Commissioner to be the receiver of certain branches of the revenue of Egypt, whose special office would be to apply those branches to the liquidation and payment of the calls arising upon a portion of the Egyptian Debt.

Mr. Dodson

It immediately suggested itself to my mind, What is to be the position of this fortunate or unfortunate Commissioner? I will imagine myself, for the sake of argument, discharging, or attempting to discharge, the duties of the Commissioner: I set out to Alexandria armed, or not armed, as the case may be, with a plentiful following of financial and diplomatic secretaries. When I get to Alexandria I obtain a comfortable lodgment, and wait there to receive certain money which is to be brought to me. I am told that it constitutes the proceeds of the customs of Alexandria. When this money is brought to me my difficulties begin. How am I to know, being Commissioner for Her Majesty's Government, that this money constitutes the proceeds and the whole proceeds of the customs of Alexandria? If I am only to be there to receive what I am told constitutes the proceeds of the customs of Alexandria, then it seems to me that the appointment of this Commissioner may only be what I am sure is not desired by Her Majesty's Government—a mask under which Egypt, or the agents and advisers of the Egyptian Government, may inveigle the British public further with reference to Egyptian finance. Upon that consideration I am completely at the mercy of those who bring me the money—when they please, how they please, and in what quantity they please. I have no means of knowing whether it represents the customs of Alexandria. If the Commissioner is to be really responsible he must have the means of knowing what his revenue is, and that the money brought to him really represents the entire revenue levied under the head on which it has been paid. It is impossible that he can have that knowledge, unless he is naturally entrusted in every material and substantial respect with the levying of that revenue. For my part, I cannot conceive how there can be a fallacy in that method of looking at the case. If the Egyptian Government were to send a Commissioner to England, and that gentleman were to receive the customs at the port of London and apply them to a specific purpose, he would have no difficulty in ascertaining the amount from our system of accounts; but I do not at all feel the same assurance with regard to Alexandria. I should, therefore, wish to know whether,

if the proposition for the appointment of such a Commissioner be entertained, the right hon. Gentleman means the appointment of a Commissioner who would really have such an effective control over all arrangements and the mode of accounting for these revenues that he could guarantee to us the receipt of the whole, that it might be applied to the purpose in view? If this is what it does mean, it appears to me that we are only shifting the difficulty one step further; because in that case our Commissioner is to take into his hands the administration of a very important portion of the government of Egypt; so that the measures which we may think necessary as a matter of prudence to cover the proposal which we are to consider may entail upon us still greater difficulties and mix us up still further with a heavier responsibility for a portion of the internal government of Egypt. When we have begun with one portion of the internal government of Egypt we may pass on to another. We may come to occupy the entire ground by series of degrees not difficult to contemplate, and possibly this may have been in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the other night, when he said that while the people of this country would view the diminution of the Empire with horror, they would see it increased without dissatisfaction. I now wish to refer to the dismissal of Sir Daniel Lange. I must go back to the controversy with respect to the publication of these letters. My opinion is that the publication of these letters was an inadvertence. They were addressed to the Secretary of State in confidence; but I am not disposed to blame either the Government or the Foreign Secretary, because the preparation of these documents necessarily takes place in an office. It is impossible that the whole manuscripts can be revised by the Foreign Secretary, and it may be that, through the mistake of some official, these letters came before him without the important appendage of "Private and confidential" which was marked upon them. Now, with regard to Sir Daniel Lange, I cannot help saying, that there is no individual next to M. de Lesseps himself who has been more essentially associated with the whole history of this great enterprize, and with all its struggles in the period of its most formidable difficulties, than Sir Daniel Lange. I know the untiring zeal and ardour with which this gentleman has laboured to dispose the public mind of England in favour of this project. In company with M. de Lesseps he held 22 meetings in the great centres of commercial industry, and the effect of these meetings was to satisfy M. de Lesseps that however the Government at that moment might, unfortunately, be indisposed to the prosecution of the enterprise, the commercial public perfectly understood its beneficial character, and would take full advantage of it in the event of its being carried into effect. It was, therefore, with a feeling of painful surprise that I heard of Sir Daniel Lange's dismissal. Of course, we have nothing to do with the dismissal of an officer of the Canal under ordinary circumstances, but I maintain that in this case the circumstances are not ordinary. This is the moment when we have been told that it is necessary for us to obtain a paramount influence and effective control over the Suez Canal. We have just paid £4,000,000 for the purpose of introducing England to the responsibilities and duties of this great undertaking, and yet this is the very moment chosen by the administrative Council in Paris and M. de Lesseps as Director-in-Chief to dismiss Sir Daniel Lange. Sir Daniel Lange is said to be dismissed on account of those letters marked "Private and confidential" addressed to Lord Granville seven years ago. I will only say I think it unfortunate that those letters have been published without the privity of Sir Daniel, who under the circumstances has a great title to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. In fact, I would suggest that the commanding influence we have acquired over the Suez Canal shall be at once exercised—and it cannot be more becomingly or more beneficially exercised than by the friendly intervention of Her Majesty's Government with M. de Lesseps and his colleagues on the Council at Paris in order to procure by amicable means the reinstatement of Sir Daniel Lange. His sole offence is that he has been too English in his feelings, for the plea of official irregularity is but a poor pretext for the dismissal of a man who has had more to do with the making of the Canal than any one except M. de Lesseps himself. I must, however, look for another reason for the dismissal of Sir Daniel Lange. It is complained that he communicated with the late Government in a manner which betrayed too much leaning towards his own country, and too much English prejudice. I know that the official objection was, that these were unauthorized communications; but my belief is, that the spirit of official pedantry cannot be so predominant in the Council of the Canal that this is the real reason. My opinion is, that the real reason was a little self-assertion on the part of M. de Lesseps. M. de Lesseps has read plenty of articles in the English newspapers; he has read the speeches of the ardent and glowing admirers of this transaction in its substance as well as its form. He was threatened with deposition from that throne on which he sits administering the supreme control of the affairs of the Canal, and it is not unnatural that he should say—"It is time for me to show the English Government and the English Press, and the world at large, that I intend to be master of my own house." If that was his intention, he could not possibly have adopted a more convenient and effective method of proving the reality of the power which he wields, and its complete concentration in his own hands—his determination that this country shall not cease either the control of this enterprise, or the influence in the conduct of its affairs which has been the result of these proceedings, than by this sudden and, I think, not very courteous dismissal of this most zealous, most indefatigable, and, I believe, able and faithful agent of the Company. I hope the Government will consider this matter. The people of this country cannot fail to perceive that it has a direct and serious bearing upon the existence of English influence. Sir Daniel Lange has been guilty of no offence that I am aware of, except that he loved his country a little too well, and was anxious that she should obtain a greater influence over the Canal. I am certain it is a matter of great satisfaction to all who are interested in the subject of the Suez Canal, if any hope is held out that this gentleman is to receive any—I will not say any compensation or reparation—but if any measures are to be taken with respect to him, which will have the effect of removing the consequences of the blow that has fallen upon him. There is yet another matter with regard to which I want to make a request of Her Majesty's Government. It is this—

Mr. Gladstone

No contradiction has been given by the Government to the statement which reached us some time ago from the East, with regard to the new arrangements between M. de Lesseps and Colonel Stokes on the subject of the surtax, and I am very anxious that the Government should, at the earliest opportunity, explain to us the particulars of the arrangement, and the exact operation of that charge which has been made in respect to the trade of the Canal. As I read the figures—and my computations are not founded upon as large information as theirs—the effect of the charges will be to impose an increased burden, and a prolongation of the burden upon the trade passing through the Canal. If that be so, naturally the country will again be surprised at the operation of this new and commanding influence which we are constantly told we have acquired. But I speak subject to correction: my only request is, that correct information may be given us through the kindness of the Government at as early a period as may be convenient.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman commenced by attributing to us some financial projects which were purely imaginary. An inquiry was addressed to me which I answered in frankness and without circumlocution, adding an observation which I felt it my duty to make, and which I was authorized to make. The right hon. Gentleman then creates a project or scheme of which he has no proof, and dissects and criticizes it at considerable length. Sir, I must protest against the introduction of imaginary projects on matters of this importance, precipitating events, arriving at premature conclusions, and not at all advancing the progress of Public Business in this House. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that, when negotiations are proceeding, whether with respect to the Suez Canal, or in answer to requests made by a foreign Potentate, he is at liberty to make comments which, I think, every man of sense and temper must feel may be productive of very injurious consequences. I cannot, therefore, gratify the curiosity of the right hon. Gentleman upon the first point, on which he dwelt at so much length. I think it will not be convenient to the public service to go further than I have gone upon this topic. I can only say that Her Majesty's Government will enter into no arrangements for sending Commissioners to Egypt or any other country, unless they believe that the course they are taking is for the public advantage, and they will guard the public interests entrusted to them to the best of their ability. With regard to the incident of Sir Daniel Lange, upon which the right hon. Gentleman also commented at length, I can only judge of it as others do, so far as Sir Daniel Lange is concerned, from the public journals. The right hon. Gentleman hints that we should make Sir Daniel Lange some compensation; but Sir Daniel Lange has made no communication to the Government, and no complaint has reached us from him upon the point mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. I believe Sir Daniel Lange to be an estimable and able man, and in this matter of the Suez Canal he has rendered service, and I should be glad to protect his interests as I would any other of Her Majesty's subjects. If he makes any communication to the Government he will be listened to with attention. But at present we are in total ignorance of the feelings of Sir Daniel Lange; he has made no complaint, and has not placed himself in communication with us. I may say that I do know privately that a personal communication has been made by M. Charles Lesseps to our Ambassador at Paris; and certainly so far as regards the feelings entertained towards Sir Daniel Lange and the explanation of his withdrawal from the partial management of the Canal, those feelings were not of a hostile, but were of a conciliatory, character. I should hope, indeed, that explanations may be given which will be generally satisfactory; and perhaps we shall find that the right hon. Gentleman has been unnecessarily alarmed with respect to Sir Daniel Lange. As to the passages published from Sir Daniel Lange's letters, the propriety of which publication the right hon. Gentleman challenged so severely, I repeat that these letters did not appear through inadvertence. The question whether they should be published or not was well considered, and they were published according to the rules and accepted regulations of our Foreign Office. There are five despatches of Sir Daniel Lange addressed to the distinguished statesman who was then Secretary of State, and a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. They were not all "private and confidential." Two of them are not so marked, and they are the most important. They were considered necessary to give the House a clear conception and complete history of the relations of this country with the Suez Canal, and of the previous negotiations which had occurred in this country respecting it. Moreover, the letters were submitted to the distinguished Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman before they were published. Having received his sanction, and no complaint of their publication having been made by Sir Daniel Lange, I am still in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman has taken a perverted view of these transactions—that ultimately it will be found that Sir Daniel Lange has not suffered from the publication of the letters as the right hon. Gentleman supposes, and that he may be restored to the position he held in connection with the Canal. The right hon. Gentleman asks for some further information as to the result of the negotiations between Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps respecting the surtax on the navigation of the Canal. As Colonel Stokes is almost daily, I may say hourly, expected in England, I think the House will feel it would be but fair to us to have the advantage of conferring with Colonel Stokes before we have any debate in Parliament upon this subject. Let me also remind the House that these negotiations between Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps respecting the surtax and other matters connected with the Canal cannot be decided by the mere will of Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps; they must be submitted to the signatory Powers represented at the International Convention upon the Canal which met at Constantinople; and though I anticipate no difficulty, this is an affair which requires some time. The comity of nations requires that we should not attempt to decide these things without duly consulting the Powers concerned. I think, therefore, it will be on the whole more beneficial to discuss the question when it is completely settled rather than prematurely. At the same time, when Colonel Stokes comes over, and we have the documents in our hands, we shall be glad to give information and enter into explanations, on the understanding that we do so provisionally, subject to the ultimate acceptance and ratification of the terms by the other Powers. These, I think, are the three points noticed by the right hon. Gentleman. I protest against his imaginary project respecting the conduct and duties of the Commissioners whom, he says, we are going to send to Egypt. I hope that, notwithstanding the dark view he takes, the relations between the Suez Canal Company and Sir Daniel Lange are not of that tyrannical character which he indicates; and with regard to the negotiations respecting the surtax, I think the House, and even the right hon. Gentleman, will feel that our discussion on this subject had better be postponed till Colonel Stokes returns and the Papers are in our possession.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that before the Bill was read a third time he was anxious to express his regret at the manner in which the financial part of the operation had been carried out by Her Majesty's Government. He confessed that while fully recognizing the necessity of preserving our access to India and the desirability of assisting a friendly Power, he was unable to see in what manner we should have acquired any additional power by the purchase of the reversion of these shares; but even supposing that it was desirable to purchase the shares, the manner in which the operation was effected seemed to him open to very grave objection. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, said that the Government could not go to the Bank of England, because the Bank was by law forbidden to lend money to the Government. But that was no answer to the right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. Lowe and Mr. Gladstone), who urged that the Government would have done well to consult the authorities of the Bank, and if they had done so, they would certainly have obtained the money on much more favourable terms. It had been supposed that the intention, in the first instance, must have been that some mercantile house should purchase the shares for the £4,000,000, contracting at the same time to re-sell them to the Government at an advance of £100,000. If that had been done, and if Parliament had really been free to act, the case would have been very different. But as the operation was actually carried out, it was a simple loan to Government at 15 per cent.

Now, what was the state of the money market at the time? The purchase was made on the 25th November, at which time the rate of interest was very low, and money very plentiful. The Times City Article of the 24th of November said—

"The figures continue daily to droop, and are now quoted at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$ . Money in large amounts has been returned on the banks by borrowers, who could find no profitable employment at all for it, and the rates charged for the day-to-day loans against the security of Government stock are purely nominal. To the great increasing abundance of money is due mainly the rise referred to in Consols through the purchases of bankers, who see no prospect at present of preventing their surplus balances from becoming troublesomely large.

But then the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government said—"Oh, but the firm which lent us the money would of course have to sacrifice securities, and in doing so might easily lose even the whole of the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent commission." That was no doubt the impression under which the right hon. Gentleman acted; but if he had consulted any confidential adviser in the City, that idea would have been dispelled; and he thought he was speaking quite within bounds when he said that if the proper course had been adopted the money might easily have been borrowed without paying any commission at all. We had been told that this was a very small matter. Economy was, no doubt, just now at a discount. A great deal, however, might be done with £100,000. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he came to submit his Budget, would be able to look upon £100,000 as being a matter of very little consequence; but it was not so much the amount of money which had been lost as the humiliating fact that England should at this moment be borrowing money at 15 per cent. Her Majesty's Government seemed to have thought there was a necessity for secrecy in the matter. There was no need for secrecy; there was a great need for publicity. And that brought him to the second aspect of the question, in which, also, as it seemed to him, Her Majesty's Government were seriously to blame. As soon as the purchase was made they ought surely to have announced it publicly. Why, if a railway company declared a dividend, the fact was at once made known; if a telegraph cable was broken, the public were at once informed. Yet here was an operation which must necessarily have had a great effect on prices, yet it was kept a secret; and those who were in the secret were enabled to make large profits at the expense of the public. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government did not deny that there were gigantic speculations, but he said that they were in consequence of telegraphic orders from Grand Cairo. But suppose they were, that did not affect the broad question at all. With regard to Mr. Cave's Report he did not know how far the telegraphic summary of it which had recently appeared was authentic. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Not at all.] Before sitting down he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reconsider some of the advice which he had tendered to the Khedive. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Khedive had fallen into the error of parting with valuable and improving property for too low a price. He (Sir John Lubbock) ventured to say that the Khedive had done exactly the reverse. Many a man in this country had brought himself into pecuniary difficulties by borrowing money at 4 and 5 per cent to buy land which only paid 2 or 3. The Khedive was one of the largest landholders in the world; he was probably the largest farmer in the world, and one of the largest manufacturers and merchants, and these gigantic operations were carried on to a great extent by means of capital borrowed at a high rate of interest. In conclusion, he would only say—and he did so with regret—that whether this purchase was wise in itself or not, the manner in which it was carried out gave an unfortunate opportunity for speculation, and imposed an unnecessary expense upon the country.

MR. MONK said, that in the publication of the despatches of Sir Daniel Lange it appeared that some letters marked "Private and confidential" had been published as well as those not so marked. He would like to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, first, whether, when Papers were marked "Private and confidential," it was usual to publish those so marked; and, secondly, whether it was usual to publish them without communicating with the writer? He heard with surprise from the Prime Minister, if he understood him rightly, that Lord Granville had given his consent to the publication of those letters. If so, he was convinced that Lord Granville must have felt satisfied that no injury could have accrued to Sir Daniel Lange. But, so far as appeared, the publication of those letters was most indiscreet. There were in the letters expressions which might have wounded the feelings of M. de Lesseps; but the whole correspondence did honour to Sir Daniel Lange, as an Englishman who had at heart the interests of his country, and at the same time faithfully represented the interests of the Company.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have only one observation to make on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. In speaking of the despatches addressed by Sir Daniel Lange to Lord Granville, the right hon. Gentleman stated that a copy of those despatches was sent to Lord Granville, and that it was with his consent they had been published. It is true that a copy of the despatches was sent to Lord Granville, but I have not been able to ascertain the circumstances under which it was sent, whether as a matter of courtesy or in accordance with the usual practice of the Foreign Office. But it is entirely a mistake to suppose that if the despatches were sent, Lord Granville was consulted as to their publication. No expression of opinion from Lord Granville was expected or asked; and Lord Granville would have gone entirely out of the way if he expressed any opinion as to the propriety of the publication or not. So far as my information goes, there was nothing in the despatches submitted to Lord Granville by the Government to show that they were private and confidential. If the House wishes, after having an opportunity of seeing Lord Granville, I can lay further information on the subject before it; but this I can state at once—that Lord Granville took no responsibility, nor was he expected to take any, in the matter of the publication.

MR. DISRAELI: I did not for a moment wish to intimate that Lord Granville underwent any responsibility by reading those despatches, but only that it was usual for the Foreign Office to submit despatches which it had received to a late Foreign Secretary, and when they are submitted he has certainly an opportunity of objecting to their publication.

MR. LOWE said, he wished to say a word or two upon the subject of these despatches. It seemed to him that a very extraordinary doctrine had been propounded by the Prime Minister. Some of these despatches were "private and confidential," and the right hon. Gentleman said that they had been published by the Government notwithstanding. The meaning of that was, that the Government received information, given on the express condition by the informant, that it should be "private and confidential," and then, having gained the advantage of that information, assumed to itself the right to break the condition on which the information had been given, and thus subjected the person who had given it to great disadvantage and loss. He maintained that no Government had any right to do that. He utterly denied that any Government could discharge themselves of their moral obligation to preserve faith with people who had given them their confidence? And, further, he would say, even if those despatches were sent to Lord Granville, and even supposing he were asked his opinion as to whether they should be published or not, it was no more in the power of Lord Granville than of the right hon. Gentleman to break faith with the man who had given the information. One word more. The right hon. Gentleman the other evening was never tired of telling us of the immense influence and power we had gained by the purchase of the Suez Canal shares. Well, here was a fine opportunity of showing it. A most estimable person had been discharged from his place and put to a good deal of annoyance for doing a service to us. He could not imagine a more fitting occasion on which this great power and influence which we had gained could be shown. The right hon. Gentleman might say that though the Government had acquired great influence they did not want to abuse it. He did not want them to abuse it. But let them use that influence. Lord Derby, when boasting of the great influence we had obtained by the transaction, had said that even though we should receive no dividends for 19 years, and even if we should obtain no share in the direction, the man who did not see that we did gain immense additional influence by this expenditure of £4,000,000 it was useless to argue with. Now was the time to show what influence we had gained. In the case of any other person, instead of summary dismissal the matter would have been laid before Her Majesty's Government and some conferences or correspondence would have been entered into before any step was taken. But here a man had been summarily dismissed without any communication whatever with Her Majesty's Government. Could there be a better opportunity of showing that the Government had gained the power of which they spoke? On the other hand, could any one believe that we had influence if we could not redress an injury to a most meritorious man?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to say one word in explanation. He had been asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich whether the intention was to submit a Vote for £80,000 in Committee of Supply, but the Vote in Supply had already been taken for £4,080,000, and the only question now was how to find the Ways and Means for it. With respect to the issuing of Exchequer Bonds for £4,080,000, he did not expect to issue more than £4,000,000. The case was analogous to that of the Alabama Claims. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) took power to issue the whole, but he did not find it necessary to do so.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (£4,080,000) BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Mr. William Henry Smith.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. DODSON asked what were the circumstances with regard to the fragmentary sum to be asked for?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, something was paid to the captain of the ship for bringing over the bonds, and that, with the interest, came to something more than £79,000. They took a Vote to cover the entire expenditure, but it was not certain yet as to what particular item the sum would be applied, but if it were found to be more than sufficient for the purpose, the balance would be surrendered to the Exchequer. Mr. Cave was expected in England in a few days, and the Government would have an opportunity of obtaining further information.

MR. GLADSTONE considered that the more correct and Parliamentary course for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have adopted would have been to have dealt separately with the sum which was to be paid to the Khedive and that which was to be paid to Messrs. Rothschild. He admitted, however, that it was now too late for that. With regard to the fragmentary sum also, the course which the right hon. Gentleman proposed was rather an inconvenient deviation from Parliamentary practice—namely, to ask the House to vote a certain sum, however small, without any Estimate, and for the insufficient reason that it was to make up a round number. The right hon. Gentleman had evidently not the smallest knowledge as to what the sum was to be applied, and that was scarcely the way in which the voting of the public money ought to be conducted.

MR. SULLIVAN wished, in justice to M. de Lesseps, to say that when the proper time arrived for discussing the dismissal or withdrawal of Sir Daniel Lange, it would be found quite an erroneous assumption which had run through the short debate, that M. de Lesseps had been actuated either by bitterness, heat, or injustice in his conduct. He would only add that the letters written by the representative of the Canal Company, while displaying that partiality which an Englishman ought to show to his own country, were wanting in loyalty to the president of the committee of which Sir Daniel Lange was the representative, and that there was no commercial nation on earth and no mercantile firm in England which would allow its representative or secretary to act as Sir Daniel Lange did on that occasion towards M. de Lesseps.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY ESTIMATES.—RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in rising to bring forward the Motion of which he had given Notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the interests of the Nation do not demand any increased expenditure on the Land Forces."

said, that in common with the rest of the House, he heard with great admiration the clear and eloquent exposition of the Army Estimates made on Thursday night by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War. There was one sentence in the speech which pleased him much; it was when the right hon. Gentleman said with sincerity that there was no warmer friend of peace in the House than he was. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) believed in the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman's assertion, and as he also was a friend of peace, they did not differ in their object, but only in their opinions, as to the best means of promoting it, and the question he brought forward was whether their large standing Army was really more likely to produce peace or to lead us into war. Having congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on his speech, he wished that he could congratulate the Government upon a certain portion of the Queen's Speech. The Government had introduced a new system as regarded the form in which the Queen's Speech was delivered. They used formerly to be told that the Estimates would be laid before them with due regard to economy. But that was now entirely omitted. He did not know why it should be omitted, for, indeed, it indicated the temper of the country. He was not under the insane delusion that in bringing forward the Motion he was acting a popular part. Economy was the most unpopular of doctrines. The popular doctrine was thus represented—

"The jolly old soldier who lives on his pay,

And spends half-a-crown on his sixpence a day."

The Government which spent money generously was far more popular than a cheeseparing Government which looked after the interests of the taxpayer. He and those who supported his views admitted that the country might not be with them at present; but he was content to follow the example of those right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench who spoke so much about the Suez Canal shares. This country was against them, but he honoured them all the more, as that was the time for men to speak out, and although the part they took was not popular now, they would have their reward hereafter. He was very glad that the debate of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) was over, because they need not be distracted by going into military details. They had a good many the other night; but when they got into Committee they would have to fight a good many more, and he wished the Secretary at War a good deliverance from them. He should like to know why they required this great standing Army. He was afraid that it was vain to ask why they had such an expenditure upon it. Without going into any administrative details, he hoped those who followed him in the debate would confine themselves to the policy of the country in this particular matter, for as the Prime Minister, in one of those maxims with which he sometimes favours the House, most truly said—"Expenditure depends on policy." That was the only opportunity they had of discussing the broad spirit of the question, and it was important that they should do so. Lord Derby, in one of his sensible speeches, talking about Army organization, said—"Let us decide what we want the Army for—what are its duties?" That was his sole object in bringing forward his Amendment. He wanted a statement from the Crown as to what was the object which they proposed to themselves in levying those forces. He asked the question every year, and never got an answer yet; but he was in hopes of getting an answer to-night. An Army must be for one of two objects—either for offence or defence. Besides, hon. Gentlemen must not forget the existence of the Fleet, which was sometimes utterly ignored on this question; and the Fleet, being now free from looking after slaves, could devote itself entirely to the protection of the country. He did not think that 500,000 armed men were required for the protection of this country from invasion. It might be that the Volunteers and Militia could not count for much; but he heard a glowing account from the Secretary at War the other night, and he proved that these branches of the Service contained some of the greatest warriors that the world had ever seen. Then, if they did not want so large an Army for home protection, it must be to enable them to interfere in foreign affairs. That was what he said they did not want an Army for. He had read a letter from the chaplain to the Forces, who spoke of the Army as "God's high police," but he would like to know from whence they got their high commission? He concurred in the opinion already expressed that the Army was corrupting the people. Some people contended that England was not to give up the European position to which she was entitled; but he thanked Heaven they had given up that notion altogether of interfering in Europe. They never suggested an interference to save Poland from injustice, and he did not know when the House was more stirred than when Prussia attacked Denmark. Then the French and German War broke out, and England sat by and allowed two great nations to cut each other's throats without going to make the mischief worse. He might also mention the Alabama settlement at which hon. Gentlemen opposite jeered the other night, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to his everlasting credit, took part in that settlement, by which England, in submitting fairly to the award, though it went against her, gained more honour than she could have won by the bloodiest victory on the battle-field. They had few opportunities now-a-days of obtaining preeminence by fighting, so they had lately adopted a new system of getting influence in the world—namely, by buying up shares. To accomplish what the head of the Government called a great political transaction, we gave a great price for shares with the coupons cut off. The country was delirious with delight at the purchase; and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) declared that it would make the Prime Minister's name memorable for all time, in which he quite agreed with him. Such a policy was certainly better than fighting; but if they adopted it they did not want so big an Army. The right hon. Gentleman had paid his £4,000,000 like a man; but why did he not knock off that sum from the Army Estimates? No one would miss it there. The settlement of disputes by force could be reduced to three alternatives. If they went to war it must be either with a Power that was stronger than themselves, or with a Power that was weaker than themselves, or with one that was exactly of the same strength as themselves. If they fought with a weaker Power they were cowardly; if they fought with a stronger Power they were foolish; and if they fought with a Power of equal strength, it was a toss up who should win. But then people would say that they must have a standing Army, and that what the Minister was doing was to provide for the efficiency of the Army. He asked them not to throw themselves into a fever for the purpose of obtaining efficiency. That was the sort of language that had been going on as long as he could remember—as long as he had had the honour of a seat in that House. In one of his speeches the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich said the plea of efficiency as a ground for extra charge ought not to be admitted without a great deal of careful scrutiny, for the result of his experience was that whenever there was a disposition to spend money it was invariably discovered that the services were inefficient. Years ago they were told that if they only got the Militia they would be safe. Well, they got the Militia, and then they wanted fortifications. The fortifications were erected at a great expense; but people were then as much alarmed as ever, and nothing would appease them but the enrolment of the Volunteers. The Volunteers were accordingly raised, and yet our military expenditure had been increasing ever since. Then came Lord Cardwell with his scheme for blending the Army into one harmonious whole—what they had been trying to do with the Liberal Party for the last two years; and now they had a mobilization scheme, the meaning of which nobody knew, and therefore he would not speak about it. But after all these changes, which were to work such wonders, an hon. Gentleman like the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) got up and, backed by some of the colonels, told them the whole thing was as rotten as any human institution could well be. Why, in 1876, were they asked for the largest peace establishment this country ever had? [An hon. MEMBER: No.] Well, however that might be, it was far too large. Against whom were they arming so tremendously? In the Queen's Speech they were told that our relations with all foreign Powers were most cordial. They could not now have France as a bugbear, as in Lord Palmerston's time; while Prussia, on the other hand, had enough to do in looking after France. Then, as to Russia, to judge from the tone of public opinion, we were more likely now to fight by her side than against her. Having fought for the Turks 20 years ago, if we fought again, we should probably turn about and go against them. But, in his opinion, instead of fighting for the Christians of Herzegovina, we had better settle how to bury our own Dissenters. He knew what the answer of his right hon. Friend would most likely be. He would say very truthfully he had no doubt that he had no intention to disturb the peace of Europe and mix in their affairs, but that we must be ready for these little wars in Ashantee, Abyssinia, Malay, and on the Gold Coast, where our troops went out, and, after shooting a few Natives, came back and got decorated as if they had defeated the whole Prussian Army. But we had been able to carry on these little wars on our present establishments, and therefore there was no reason for increasing them. It was said that we might, in spite of all precautions, get into quarrels of a European kind; so we might, but then we might and ought to keep out of them. The Times, in an article the other day, summed up the matter in a few words, when they said that what a Minister had to do was to measure not possibilities but probabilities. That was so; let us then deal with probabilities like rational men. He had heard that Mr. Green, the aeronaut, lived to a great age, and the one reason of this was the living so much of his time up in the air in balloons, he did not run a risk of getting run over by cabs. It was said that we might get into these quarrels. So we might; but why did we put right hon. Gentlemen opposite into places of honour and profit for but that they might prevent England getting into these quarrels? If they did get into quarrels which they could not get settled without an appeal to force, they were, he maintained, failures in statesmanship; and he maintained that they were more tempted to cut the Gordian Knot with the sword and settle matters by brute force if they had a great army than a small one. The House would, he thought, agree with him that the present state of Europe was horrible and heart-rending. There were now 9,000,000 men in arms, at a yearly expenditure of £136,000,000. This might be called peace, but it was in reality nothing but smothered war. And yet most of these countries were professors of the Christian religion of peace on earth and good-will to men. Most of them had established Churches professing to be Christian Churches; but the real established religion in those countries was that of Mars as much as it had ever been in any country on the face of the earth, and at any time in the history of the world. England had now a great opportunity of setting a great example to the world. Indeed, there never was such an opportunity. Here we were without a whisper of discontent in any part of the United Kingdom. We had no unworthy objects to seek; we had no territorial disputes; we had no quarrel with any great Power. Surely, then, we might reduce armaments, which so cruelly pressed upon the springs of industry. He did not know what support he should get for his Motion. He did not expect much support from his hon. Friend opposite, although he was happy to say that on a former occasion the Nestor of the Tory Party—the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire—had voted against this rapid increase of our armaments. But still he could not expect that many hon. Gentlemen opposite would vote with him, because having confidence in the Government they would naturally back them up in their Estimates. But the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench were heirs of the traditions of the Whig Party. Let them show that they shared the opinions of the Party. The Whig Party had once won great laurels by advocating peace, retrenchment, and reform. Let right hon. Gentlemen now support the retrenchment which was the earnest of peace. They had heard a good deal lately of the height of our soldiers and their girth round the chest, and the House cheered loudly when they heard that that height and girth had not diminished. Well, he was not anxious about the stature and proportions of the British soldier, but he was anxious about the stature of British statesmen, and he did hope that the occupants of the front Opposition bench would show that in this respect there was no degeneracy, either in their heads or their hearts. If they voted with him they would, at any rate, show that there was some difference between them and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, for they could not go to the country on the cry of Sir Daniel Lange. There was certainly a small number of hon. Members on that side of the House—let them be called if they liked a wretched minority, or a Radical residuum—who would vote with him on that Motion, and thus declare that in their opinion mighty armaments were not the glory, but the disgrace of a country, and that true statesmanship consisted, not in providing the machinery for human slaughter, but in gradually leading the minds of men to that superior way of settlement which was in accordance with peace, justice, religion, and humanity. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. RICHARD: I rise to second the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle; and, in doing so, I cannot but express my deep regret that we should be called upon to vote £600,000 additional to our military expenditure this year. And that is not all; for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, with that perfect frankness which we should have expected from him, has told us that, if we accept his proposals, there will be a considerable prospective expenditure, stretching over many years to come. The only hope of reduction he holds out to us gleams upon us through a vista of 36 years a-head; for if any of us undertake to live to the year 1912, he promises us a diminution of £50,000 at that period in one of the items. And yet, compared with the preposterous and extravagant demands and expectations put forth in some quarters, perhaps we ought to be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his moderation. But surely an Army expenditure of £15,000,000 during peace is monstrous. No country in Europe has so little justification as we have for a large expenditure on its army; and, in my opinion, no country in Europe gets so little for what it does expend. For the mortifying and discouraging fact is, that we seem to gain nothing as regards even our professed objects by lavishing such enormous sums on our armaments. I have watched with some attention the gradual growth of our naval and military establishments for the last 35 or 40 years; and what I observe is this, that in proportion as we add to what are called our national defences does the sense of insecurity increase, if we can trust those whom I may designate as the professional alarmists. I am old enough to remember 1835, when, under the Administration of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, we were satisfied with a little more than £11,500,000 for all our fighting establishments—Army, Navy, and Ordnance. And certainly we were then perfectly calm and contented, able to sleep comfortably in our beds, far more so than we can, or at least ought to do now, according to the views of the alarmists. And there is this further peculiarity about the case, that when you have conceded anything to the clamours of those who demand large armaments, what they have obtained becomes comparatively worthless in their estimation, and is immediately made a point of departure for demanding something else. So it has been with the Militia, the Volunteers, the Fortifications, the Army and Militia Reserve, the localization of the Forces, and other changes introduced by Lord Cardwell; and so it will be, I have no doubt, with the mobilization scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. When gotten, everything is utterly unsatisfactory, and we want something else. Thus we find, in an article in the current number of The Edinburgh Review, the writer tells us, after all that has been done for the last 30 or 40 years; after raising our forces from 100,000 men in 1835 to more than 500,000 in 1876, after spending more than £320,000,000 sterling on the Army alone within 20 years, from 1856 to 1876, “as respects the guarding of our national honour, and providing for the national defence, we are in a faulty, ruinous, and dangerous condition.” But surely if, after these prodigious sums have been lavished on the Army, we are now told that we have no effectual defence, the people of this country have a right to ask—“What have you done with our money?” Now, there was a sentence once uttered in this House, by Sir Robert

Peel, which I would respectfully recommend the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War to have inscribed in large letters upon the wall of the War Office, opposite the spot where his desk is placed, that he may have it continually before his eyes. It is this—

“If the House listens to the opinions of military men, who were naturally prejudiced upon this subject, they would involve the country in an outlay that no revenue could bear.”

I hope I shall not offend the many hon. and gallant and quasi gallant Gentlemen with whom this House abounds by what I am about to say. But it is with me a matter of deep and earnest conviction, that one of the greatest calamities under which Europe is suffering at this moment, and has been suffering for many years, arises from the fact that its policy is so much under the influence of the military class. Everywhere—in the Courts of Kings, in the councils of Cabinets, in the deliberations of Parliament—their influence predominates, and that influence is constantly and steadfastly employed to propel the Governments deeper and deeper into that fatal system of rivalry in armaments under which all the nations of Europe are groaning, as a burden too heavy to be borne. I do not mean to say or insinuate, that military men love or desire war for its own sake, or that they are reckless of human slaughter and human suffering. On the contrary, I believe there are among them men as generous and humane, and as full of kind and benevolent sentiment as any class of the community. It is not among military men, especially if they have been engaged in actual service in the field, that we shall find those who speak of going to war with a light heart. And probably there are many of them who would sympathize with the sentiment of a very distinguished member of their profession, General Trochu, who, in a work published by him in 1867, uses these remarkable words. After a very vivid description of the evils inflicted by war on inoffensive populations, he continues—

“The spectacle of these devastations and sufferings is distressing to military men who have any elevation of spirit. They are astonished that modern civilization, which is so proud of having everywhere, in individual transactions, substituted for force the principles of law, still leaves international differences to be settled by letting loose the scourge of war. Their minds are filled with contempt for those men of the drawing-room (ces hommes de salon) who welcome and celebrate war in conventional language, which only reveals their own vanity, their ignorance, their ambition, and selfishness.”

And I cannot but recall with pleasure that when I brought forward and carried in this House a Motion in favour of international arbitration as a substitute for war, I was supported by the votes of a considerable number of hon. and gallant Gentlemen. Still I cannot but feel that it is a great evil that a large body of intelligent and active-minded men, who perhaps have nothing particular to do during these piping times of peace, should have all their faculties and energies devoted to extending the fighting establishments of the world. I do not blame them. Like all other professions, they do what they can to magnify their own office. But, unhappily, their professional prejudices colour everything they look upon. By dwelling continually upon one class of ideas, these grow into such proportions as to occupy the whole sphere of their vision, so that they cannot conceive of civilized and Christian nations as existing in any other relation to each other than that of armed and mutual menace. I know no remedy for this, but for the people of Europe to take the management of their affairs out of the hands of the military class into their own. On this ground I feel grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) that he, as a civilian, should, with such laborious diligence, have sought to master the details of our military system, and expose what he considers its defects. It required a great deal of courage to do this, for he must have known that he was thrusting his hand into a hornets' nest, and that the military wasps would come out and buzz about his head as they have done, and, I have no doubt, will continue to do. Now, I must repeat the question already asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, what do we want all these forces for? Is it to defend ourselves against attack? But from whom do we apprehend attack? France used to be the great God-send of the panic-mongers, and I think few can look back without humiliation and shame to the series of ignoble panics to which we delivered ourselves as a nation as respects France. It mattered not under what Government France was placed, whether a Constitutional Monarchy, or a Republic, or an Empire. It mattered not how France was engaged, whether in the agonies of a domestic revolution, trying to construct a Constitution for itself out of the ruins of that which preceded it, or fighting the Austrians in Italy, or negotiating Commercial Treaties with this country, we were required to believe that France was always meditating mischief against this country. Nay, when we were in close and friendly alliance for purposes of peace it was all the same, for I remember the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister, in rebuking one of these panics, said—

Mr. Richard

“At the very time when France was working with you for the common weal of humanity, her ruler is held up as a bandit and a corsair, who was about piratically invading this country, without the slightest warning or previous cause of quarrel.”

But the circumstances of France are now such that the wildest of the alarmists cannot profess to apprehend danger from her. Then, for what other purpose do we want a large Army? We have renounced the policy of intervention in the quarrels of the Continent, at least all our statesmen have done so—Conservative as well as Liberal. In proof of this I may cite the words of Lord Derby, the Foreign Secretary. In addressing his constituents at King's Lynn, when he was a Member of this House, adverting to the debate on the Dano-German War, which had taken place in 1864, he said—

“The ostensible object of that debate was to take the sense of this House as to whether the Danish negotiations had been mismanaged, but the object with which many Members—I among the rest—went into it, was to obtain from Parliament a distinct and decided expression of opinion in favour of a policy of non-intervention in Continental disputes; in that we perfectly succeeded.”

The right hon. Gentleman himself the Secretary for War made an admirable speech in the same debate, in which, referring to the facts of the Dano-German War, and the part we had taken in the matter, he said—

“I say that facts point to the conclusion that the position of England, free from Continental complications and embarrassments, fits her for being the mediator of Europe. They point out that, having nothing to gain from the oppression of the smaller States, nor from the damage of the larger, she is qualified to occupy a position of dignified neutrality, a position in which she can wield more influence than she could ever gain by war.”—[3 Hansard, clxxvi. 1022.]

It seems to me, Sir, that the only hope of salvation for Europe is, by the Governments beginning to retrace their footsteps—that, as they have been going on for generations, adding to their armaments on a system of rivalry to which there is absolutely no limit—so they should agree to enter on a process of mutual and simultaneous disarmament. I am happy to say that there is an important movement in this direction going on on the Continent of Europe. A proposal, backed by a large number of Members, has been laid before the Austrian Reichsrath, proposing not only that there should be a reduction in the Austrian Army, but that the Imperial Government should “use its best endeavours to promote the idea of such a general, proportionate, and simultaneous reduction of armies, as would not affect the balance of power of the various States.” A similar movement is contemplated in Germany, and it is probable that, before long, a proposition to the same purport will be submitted to the German Parliament. I should like, if an opportunity offers during the present Session, to ask the opinion of this House on the same subject. I should rejoice, indeed, if our country were to have the honour of taking the initiative in so beneficent an enterprise. There were words once uttered in this House by the present Prime Minister, which I should like to hear uttered again. They were words which he recommended the Government then in office to address to the Government of France. I wish he would now address these words not to the Government of France only, but to all the Governments of Europe, and I am confident that his voice would awaken a cordial and general response, at least among the nations of Europe, whatever the Governments might say. These are the words, and with them I conclude my observations—

“Let us terminate this disastrous system of wild expenditure by mutually agreeing, with no hypocrisy, but in a manner and under circumstances which admit of no doubt, by the reduction of our armaments—that peace is really our policy.”

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he would frankly confess that he had not been able distinctly to follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms), but he would say this generally, that with regard to all questions of deferred pay and the increase of the Army, that the amount required had been made up by those who made up the Estimates, and he was assured that the Estimates would cover the demand for the year. There might, however, be a greater number of deaths or a greater number of men discharged in a particular year than was allowed for; and, therefore, in all cases there could only be a rough estimate formed. He was sorry not to have been able to lay on the Table that day the Paper moved for by the hon. Member for Reading. The instant, however, it would be ready—and that would be soon—he would lay it on the Table. He found that, in the final calculations the Army and the Reserves had been mixed together, and the figures would not have conveyed to the House the clear information which he wished the House to have. When it was in the hands of hon. Members it would be seen how and to what extent the calculations were made, not for this year, but for the ensuing years. The calculations he was, however, bound to say could only be founded on somewhat rough Estimates for each particular year. As to the additional Forces which were to be added to the Army, the hon. Member for Hackney seemed to have assumed that every recruit was paid from the first day of the year, though that was, of course, a complete fallacy. Some men did not join until the very last month of the year, and therefore, when the hon. Member assumed that a very large sum would come in course of payment during the year, the amount should really be put at one-half or one-third of that at which he put it. With respect to the calling out of the Reserve, he quite agreed with the hon. Member that it ought to be done with great delicacy and consideration for the men; but what he and the country wanted to see was that the men came into the ranks; that they did not come merely for pay, but that they were prepared to put themselves in a position in which they would be ready for service. The Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was founded upon the assertion that the expenditure on the Army was excessive, and he asked what was the object of the Army? Well, the Army was intended for the defence of India, of our colonies, and of our own country; and, further, it was intended for offensive purposes also, should the necessity unhappily arise. These were the essential purposes for which we maintained our Army, which was certainly not a large one compared with those of other countries in Europe. When those facts were considered he did not think that the Estimates before the House could be regarded as excessive. Certainly, when our Army was compared with those of other European Powers, no one could say that it was maintained for the purposes of offence. For himself, he must state that, if he thought that European complications were at hand, he should have proposed greater additions, lest at the last moment he might be obliged to do what his Predecessor in office had done—namely, under circumstances of great haste and confusion to bring up at once, probably 20,000 recruits. Now, what had been the consequences of bringing up 20,000 recruits in one year? the consequence was, that the Army was affected for years after by it, as they could not under such pressure get the kind of recruits that they required. That 20,000 being hurriedly raised had brought discredit upon the Army, from which it had scarcely recovered yet. With respect to the general question, he thought the House would admit that if they were to keep up their stores, fortifications, and armaments, and to lay the basis of an efficient Reserve, the proposed expenditure was necessary. Not only was all that he asked for necessary, but if he were to press for more he thought he could make out a strong case in support of such a proposal, and that the House would see the repression he had been obliged to exercise, and in some instances not without apprehension. But his endeavour had been to cut down the Estimates to that which he considered to be absolutely necessary. In that way his hon. Friend twitted him with studying “efficiency only;” but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to which he referred, terminated in a very different way from what the hon. Baronet seemed to infer. The right hon. Gentleman

"in the opinion of this House, the interests of the Nation do not demand an increased expenditure on the Land Forces," — (Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

—instead thereof.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he must express, as others had done, their debt to the Secretary for War for the remarkably clear manner in which he had introduced the Army Estimates, and for the index which made reference to them comparatively easy. Although he could not express unqualified approval of the Army Estimates, yet the right hon. Gentleman had made many proposals that were in the right direction, and among them was the increase of pay to non-commissioned officers and to the Reserve. While admitting that we must see more of our Reserves in the future than we had in the past, he doubted the policy of calling them out for too long a period. In Prussia, after men had been made thorough soldiers they were allowed to go home, and were scarcely called out at all afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give 2*d.* a-day extra to all ranks below that of non-commissioned officers. [MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Not to those who come on the pension list after 12 years.] As all except these were to receive 2*d.* a-day extra, he scarcely thought the House was in a position to tell what would be the exact cost of the Army for 1876-7. The Estimate provided for an increase of 3,600 men, and of £603,900 in expenditure. The pay amounted to £163,000, and that sum would have a great deal of duty to do. The right hon. Gentleman said that the increase required for non-commissioned officers' pay amounted to £104,000, of which sum India was to provide £37,000. The lodging expenses for non-commissioned officers amounted to £15,000, the additional pay to the Foot Guards to £8,000, and that for the men passing into the Reserve to £13,000, making in all, roundly, £126,500, or leaving £36,000 only for the pay of the 3,600 men who were to be added, or £10 per man, which seemed to show that they were at last beginning to pursue a policy of economy in respect of the British Army. But taking the pay at the moderate sum of £25, it would amount in all to £95,000 less the £37,000 which was provided, leaving a deficit of £58,000. His calculation, therefore, was that the increase of the Estimates would be £656,900. There remained the question of the deferred pay. According to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, 2*d.* a-day would not now be given to all privates, but all would expect it, and if withheld they would see greater dissatisfaction than ever. Now, on the 1st of January, 1875, the number of effectives borne on the Estimates was 155,000 men. This number receiving the increased pay of £3 0*s.* 10*d.* a-year would involve an expenditure which would amount roundly to £470,000, but the Estimate only provided for £13,000, leaving £457,000 to be provided for; and, moreover, the Reserves were to receive an increase of £2 a man, or £19,000, for which no provision was made. He did not complain that those sums were not to be found in the Estimates, as the custom was that only the sum required for the current year appeared there. He thought, however, that it ought to be made clear to the House and the country that the proposal of the Government pointed at an increase of £476,000 a-year. Of that sum no less than £204,000 a-year would be contributed by the taxpayers of India. Hon. Members from Lancashire who were seeking for a reduction of the tax upon their goods should bear this fact in mind. He wished also to say a word or two as to recruiting. In 1861 the number of effectives which we had at the end of the year was 206,500, and to that number we had to get only 10,600 recruits. Three years later the number of men we had at the end of the year was 194,000, whilst we took 16,000 recruits; and in 1872-3 and 1874 we had 188,700 men, but the recruits were no fewer than 21,000. He must further say that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had said nothing as to the rivalry which existed between the recruiting sergeants of the Militia and the Line, and which undoubtedly affected India in the obtaining of recruits. Comparing the condition of our Army at present with what it was in 1861, he wished to point out that whilst the number of recruits required had gradually increased, whilst the number of effectives at the end of the year was absolutely fewer showing that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was right, and that whilst more men and money were asked for, we had at the present time a weaker force than before.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he would frankly confess that he had not been able distinctly to follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms), but he would say this generally, that with regard to all questions of deferred pay and the increase of the Army, that the amount required had been made up by those who made up the Estimates, and he was assured that the Estimates would cover the demand for the year. There might, however, be a greater number of deaths or a greater number of men discharged in a particular year than was allowed for; and, therefore, in all cases there could only be a rough estimate formed. He was sorry not to have been able to lay on the Table that day the Paper moved for by the hon. Member for Reading. The instant, however, it would be ready—and that would be soon—he would lay it on the Table. He found that, in the final calculations the Army and the Reserves had been mixed together, and the figures would not have conveyed to the House the clear information which he wished the House to have. When it was in the hands of hon. Members it would be seen how and to what extent the calculations were made, not for this year, but for the ensuing years. The calculations he was, however, bound to say could only be founded on somewhat rough Estimates for each particular year. As to the additional Forces which were to be added to the Army, the hon. Member for Hackney seemed to have assumed that every recruit was paid from the first day of the year, though that was, of course, a complete fallacy. Some men did not join until the very last month of the year, and therefore, when the hon. Member assumed that a very large sum would come in course of payment during the year, the amount should really be put at one-half or one-third of that at which he put it. With respect to the calling out of the Reserve, he quite agreed with the hon. Member that it ought to be done with great delicacy and consideration for the men; but what he and the country wanted to see was that the men came into the ranks; that they did not come merely for pay, but that they were prepared to put themselves in a position in which they would be ready for service. The Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was founded upon the assertion that the expenditure on the Army was excessive, and he asked what was the object of the Army? Well, the Army was intended for the defence of India, of our colonies, and of our own country; and, further, it was intended for offensive purposes also, should the necessity unhappily arise. These were the essential purposes for which we maintained our Army, which was certainly not a large one compared with those of other countries in Europe. When those facts were considered he did not think that the Estimates before the House could be regarded as excessive. Certainly, when our Army was compared with those of other European Powers, no one could say that it was maintained for the purposes of offence. For himself, he must state that, if he thought that European complications were at hand, he should have proposed greater additions, lest at the last moment he might be obliged to do what his Predecessor in office had done—namely, under circumstances of great haste and confusion to bring up at once, probably 20,000 recruits. Now, what had been the consequences of bringing up 20,000 recruits in one year? the consequence was, that the Army was affected for years after by it, as they could not under such pressure get the kind of recruits that they required. That 20,000 being hurriedly raised had brought discredit upon the Army, from which it had scarcely recovered yet. With respect to the general question, he thought the House would admit that if they were to keep up their stores, fortifications, and armaments, and to lay the basis of an efficient Reserve, the proposed expenditure was necessary. Not only was all that he asked for necessary, but if he were to press for more he thought he could make out a strong case in support of such a proposal, and that the House would see the repression he had been obliged to exercise, and in some instances not without apprehension. But his endeavour had been to cut down the Estimates to that which he considered to be absolutely necessary. In that way his hon. Friend twitted him with studying “efficiency only;” but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to which he referred, terminated in a very different way from what the hon. Baronet seemed to infer. The right hon. Gentleman said do not listen to the cry of "efficiency" without carefully scrutinising it, but look into it to see that that which you were doing might tend to promote it. He (Mr. Hardy) had never asked the House to give anything without a careful scrutiny, and he was far from wishing the House to give him anything without careful scrutiny, or to debar hon. Members from taking the sense of the House upon it, and discussing the subject at any length they might desire. Now, with respect to the increased expenditure, the new fortifications and barracks could not be kept up at the same expense as the barracks previous to that time, and, generally speaking, these large buildings could not be maintained without an increased expenditure, which must have been foreseen by those who were parties to planning and building them. His object, like that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, was peace; but, at the same time, he meant to be in such a position that he should not, in case of emergency, be driven into excessive haste—not driven to do anything under panic—and he could assure them he was under no panic now, or he should have proposed very different Estimates. He wanted to guard against haste, against panic, against uneasiness of mind, against false economy, which led to vast expenditure afterwards, and also against the suspicion that this great country could leave itself in a position which was founded upon the hope or expectation that it would always be at peace. He did not believe that the world at large had arrived at such a purely Christian state as had been spoken of by some hon. Members, so that it was incapable of going to war. He saw, indeed, every indication of the reverse of such a state of things, and, therefore, he wanted to lay a foundation of national defence which, if not large, should be solid. He had done something, he believed, to secure that result by a better treatment of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and by proposing measures to put the Army Reserve in such a position that it might be regarded as a reliable force. For these reasons, he might almost ask for the votes of the two hon. Gentlemen who had moved the reduction of the Army.

MAJOR BEAUMONT said, that he should vote for the Amendment with the view of saving money and not for the purpose of diminishing the efficiency of the Army. He should not attempt to reply to the shadowy arguments of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, because it would be like the Quixotic attempt of kicking a windmill—or, more properly, a water-mill.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 192; Noes 63: Majority 129.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 132,884, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and for Depôts for the training of Recruits for Service at Home and Abroad, including Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 122,884, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and for Depôts for the training of Recruits for Service at Home and Abroad, including Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."—(Mr. Pease.)

MR. ANDERSON said, he wished for further information than had yet been afforded as to the guns which were proposed to be placed in the fortifications, and he also desired to know why Major Moncrieff was no longer employed to carry out his system of gun carriages, and whether or not those carriages had been found efficient? Something had been said by the Minister for War in introducing the Estimates with regard to balloting for the Militia. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it would be necessary to put the system of recruiting for the Militia on a more satisfactory footing. Well, the country was somewhat apt to look upon that as a threat that they might have the ballot for the Militia; but if it was not intended to institute ballot for the Militia, why had it been broached? The right hon. Gentleman would perhaps inform the Committee why he had introduced the subject. Then as to Militia adjutants, he should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether Volunteer adjutants could not be put on the same footing as regarded retirement as Militia adjutants. He wished also to know what would happen in the event of a Volunteer regiment or a Militia regiment being without its commanding officer and majors in the field? Would the Militia or Volunteer captain take command, or would it devolve upon the adjutant, seeing he, as a full-pay captain, had seniority over all Reserve Force captains. The arrangement suggested by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the Army Reserve was a very good one. But with regard to the Militia there were two points which he (Mr. Anderson) would like to call attention to. One was this—that the Militia was made a back door through which incapable officers were transferred into the Line without passing through any examination, by favouritism on the part of the commanding officer of a Militia regiment. That was a most improper way of admitting officers into the Army. The other point was with reference to the want of rifle practice amongst the Militia. The men were never taught to shoot at all, and he had proved that last time he addressed the House on the subject, by the respective quantities of ammunition used. It was all very well to say that the Militia were a very efficient body of men, and that they were fit to be put with the Line regiments in drill; but what on earth was the use of efficiency in drill if the men could not shoot? He considered it was a mistake also to give up the practice of requiring officers to pass through class firing. He cordially agreed with the proposals to grant deferred pay and to increase the pay of the men in the Guards. He thought it very proper that the deferred pay should be forfeited by deserters, but hoped that in cases of death it would be paid to the surviving relatives. As far as the Guards were concerned, he thought better men would be induced to join if the time taken up by sentry duty was reduced. With regard to systematic desertion, which consisted in men going from regiment to regiment, he was very glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman had thought it worth while to take into consideration the proposition he (Mr. Anderson) had thrown out—of marking of all men who entered the Army. He believed that would be a complete safeguard against repeated desertion—a much better safeguard, at all events, than the old practice of branding was, for the deserter could not be marked until he had been caught. Marking, if made general, would, no doubt, cease to be looked upon as a disgrace; but of course it would require to be optional for the officers and men now in the Army. He disapproved of the proposal to increase the Estimates and the number of men, and thought that the recruits who were required could have been got without those new and expensive arrangements. The right hon. Gentleman could have kept 18 regiments up to their full strength—up even to 1,000 men strong—without increasing the Vote, or adding to the number of men. It could have been done by keeping some of the regiments at two-thirds, or even a half, their proper strength, though of these the full staff of officers and non-commissioned officers should be maintained. It would be very easy to get such regiments to a thoroughly efficient state in a short space of time. Then it was costly to have large barracks in different parts of the country, and the necessity for this would be obviated if the number of men actually in the ranks in the Army were not increased. These institutions were nothing more nor less than moral plague spots in the country, and it was absurd to say that they were necessary. It looked as if they were kept for the purpose of over-awing the country, and of keeping it in subjection, and he was sure no one would say that was necessary.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, it was all very well to speak of marking the men as an honour, but he thought the people of the country were too shrewd not to see the real object of the marking. It was because the soldiers were distrusted, and because it was wished to keep them from deserting from the regiments. If he might offer counsel to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Department, he should say—"Be very cautious before you take the step suggested." This was a matter in which the right hon. Gentleman would do well not to trust too much to the opinions of military men because they were biased in favour of their profession. It was civilians who had no connection with the Army who were most competent to form a sound opinion on the subject. The marking had hitherto been a brand of ignominy, and he very much doubted whether the country would ever view it as a brand of honour. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had at length decided the vexed question of hospitals. It was more than 20 years since he (Sir Alexander Gordon) became an advocate of the general hospital system, and he knew what opposition had been offered to that in favour of the regimental system. The regimental system was all very well in time of peace, but in time of war it broke down. He was very glad, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman had decided to hear no more complaints on the subject, and to carry out the general hospital system. He was less gratified, however, to find that the retiring age of medical officers had been fixed at 60. The work of those officers, being mainly administrative, could be as well performed by men at 60 as at 55, and by compelling them to retire at 60 we should be deprived of their great experience and ripe judgment. It was of no use endeavouring to popularize the service with the younger branches, while they made it unpopular with the older branches; and thus while increasing the non-Effective Vote they would deprive the country of the services of the most able and experienced men. There was one point in the right hon. Gentleman's statement on which he thought the House required more information, and that was with regard to the plan for a tactical station in the North of England. In 1872 the House of Commons voted £3,500,000 for carrying out the scheme of localization, and £300,000 of that sum was intended to be devoted to the formation of a tactical station in the North of England, partly because it was required for a corps to protect the North-eastern Coast. The right hon. Gentleman said he had been unable to find sufficient land for a tactical station, but that he had purchased a tract of land four miles distant from the town of York, and proposed out of the balance of the £300,000 to purchase 6,000 acres at Aldershot. He thought the House ought to be informed how much of the £300,000 had been applied to the one purpose, and how much to the other. In his opinion, the additional land at Aldershot would not compensate for the tactical station in the North, because the ground in the neighbourhood of Aldershot was so well known that manœuvres held there could not be of much practical utility. The mobilization scheme, which he believed was not yet generally understood, had been described as a scheme for the defence of the country from invasion. For his part he agreed with a statement made some time ago by the Commander-in-Chief, that a successful invasion of this country was almost impossible. At the same time, he thought it desirable that the subject should be placed in a little clearer light. By that scheme it was intended that England, should be prepared from whatever quarter an attack might come, and unless she were attacked by all the world, any scheme of defence that was applicable to all the world would be inappropriate. If England were at peace with France, and a war were to arise with Germany and Russia, the arrangements for the defence of the country would be different from what they would have been if they were at war with France and at peace with Russia and Germany. It was said that the soldier was to know by the scheme where he was to go; but it was because they were not all called to go to the front that he took exception to it. In the Channel Islands, which, if a war were to arise, would be a point of some interest to the Government, as it was a part of our dominions very likely to be attacked, one of the two regiments kept there during times of peace for the maintenance of order would be at once sent away to Petersfield, and the defence of these Islands would be left to the remaining regiment and the Militia, who had hardly ever been called out since the Peninsular War, except on holidays like the Queen's birthday. The defence of the Islands was in a marvellous condition, and he could not understand what the framer of the scheme had been thinking of. So also with troops at Shorncliffe, Brighton, and elsewhere on the South Coast which, in the event of a threatened invasion, were at once to march into the interior of the country. He also objected to the manner in which the scheme had been put forward. In fact, the scheme had appeared suddenly one morning in the

Sir Alexander Gordon

Army List without any name attached guaranteeing that it had been considered by a competent authority. He wished to point out that there was a great omission with regard to the colonies. The troops had been withdrawn and centred at home, although it was well-known and admitted that if England were attacked her colonies would be attacked also.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War said he wished to give the present system of recruiting a fair trial. But what was the present system? He had asked the question several times, but he could get no answer. It was neither short service nor long service, but something between. If they looked to the letter of the recruiting regulations he approved it as far as it went. He had asked what effect had been given to the regulation by which men, after serving three years, were to pass into the Reserve, but he had got no satisfactory answer. Again, as to long service men, it appeared from the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting about 2,000 had been recruited for the long service instead of 3,750. It was clear, therefore, that the regulations were not properly complied with, for they said that 25 per cent should be long service men, whilst they were in reality only 15 per cent. He trusted proper effect would be given to the regulations, for if they were carried out they would have a short service force from which the Reserve could be supplied and another which would be fitted for service in India. He feared the truth was that the right hon. Gentleman was trying to kill two birds with one stone, while the birds were so far apart that he would be apt not to succeed in hitting either of them. He might point to the opinion of a distinguished military authority, as set forth in a late article in a magazine, to show how very ineffectual the six years' system was likely to be for the purposes of our Reserve. Under it, it was argued, boys were enlisted before they were able to learn a trade, while they would be too old to learn one when they left the Army. As to the Militia, he was not disposed to go so far as his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms), and he thought the right course to pursue would be to amalgamate the Militia and the Reserve, taking men for short service and returning them when sufficiently drilled to the Reserve. He believed by that plan they would get the bone and sinew of the country for its defence. In order, on the other hand, to make provision for the requirements of India and our colonies, it was, in his opinion, absolutely necessary to maintain a professional Army. He entirely concurred with the writer of another article in a monthly periodical, who also was a high military authority and a Member of that House, who said that our Indian Empire had not been saved at the time of great peril by raw soldiers, who had only seen two or three years' service, but by veterans, who had been inured to long service. It was with 800 such veterans that the father of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to whom he referred took Cawnpore, which a distinguished Crimean officer, General Wyndham, found himself unable to keep with six, or eight, or ten times the number of unseasoned troops. In order, therefore, to provide that efficient force, he thought that a soldier should serve at least six years in that country, and longer if possible. He thought that we should be running the risk of a great military disaster in India if the right hon. Gentleman were to determine to commit the safety of that country, not to long service men, but to young soldiers, who, as it were, would be continually coming and going. He was quite ready to admit the justice of the statement that the interests of England must not be considered to the sacrifice of those of India. India could, and in his opinion ought to pay for a sufficient number of long service men to preserve that Empire, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman had some system by which long service soldiers might be sent to that country.

COLONEL NORTH hoped the right hon. Gentleman would lose no time in laying before the House the Report of the Royal Commission on Promotion and Retirement, as great discontent prevailed in the Service in consequence of nothing having been done, although the Commission had been sitting 14 months. He was sure the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman that the Commissioners for the Sale of Commissions would require £172,000 less than they did last year was a strong proof that officers would not retire until something more was known on that point. A great deal had been said about the disgraceful desertions in our Army; but there was a general opinion in the Service that they were in great part owing to the extraordinary decisions arrived at in the office of the Judge Advocate General, where the officers of the Army were not supported as they ought to be in maintaining discipline. It had been laid down that a man could not be tried as a deserter unless it could be proved that he intended to desert; but how could any one prove what a man's intention was? Another stranger case was this. A soldier in private clothes, passing under an assumed name, and having in his possession a ticket for America, was about to sail, and was brought on shore, and in that case it was ruled that he could not be tried as a deserter because he had in his pocket an unexpired furlough. Those decisions might possibly be in accordance with the law, but if so the law ought to be altered, as they undoubtedly threw considerable impediments in the way of preventing desertions. He therefore hoped that before the Mutiny Bill came on for discussion his right hon. Friend would direct his attention to this unsatisfactory state of things. Nearly 20 years had elapsed since he first suggested that officers of the Army who held Staff appointments should have money advanced to them to enable them to furnish their houses, such sums to be repaid with interest. The military authorities, he believed, did recommend that this should be done, but it was refused by the Treasury, and he thought it only fair that the saddle should be put on the right horse. In conclusion, he remarked that the suggestions of the last speaker respecting long service in India well deserved consideration.

MR. MUNTZ agreed with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, that in India there ought to be an Army of an age adapted to the climate, for young troops were physically unfitted for duties required of them in that country, and the difficulty of obtaining troops there was greater than in any other part of the Empire. He would proceed to explain why he should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease). In 1872 he himself proposed a reduction of 10,000 men, as his hon. Friend had now done. That proposal was rejected, but in the succeeding year Lord Cardwell reduced the force by 8,500 men, and at present further reduction was inexpedient. The force had since consisted in round numbers of 126,000 men, and the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to add 3,500 men, in order to put 18 battalions in such a condition that at a fortnight's notice they could sail to any part of the world. He was far from saying that reductions in the military expenditure of the country were not both necessary and desirable; but he thought the time for fixing the nature and amount of such reductions would not arrive until the Secretary of State for War had a Reserve Force of 40,000 or 50,000 men, and the system on which the Reserve Force was based had been fully and satisfactorily tested. The system laid down by Lord Cardwell was the result of long and careful consideration, and he should deprecate any attempt to alter it until it had been submitted to a full and fair trial. Otherwise perpetual changes would so worry the Army that they would not know what they were about. What he argued against was any reduction in the number of men which would place the Army below a state of efficiency. He was not an alarmist. He had no fear of this country being attacked; but he could not lose sight of the fact that, in addition to guarding against possible attack—or difficulties arising in India—England had vast commercial interests in all parts of the world which required protection, and he could not, therefore, support any proposal for reducing the strength of the Army below the point at which the responsible Ministers of the Crown thought it should be maintained in order to protect the honour and interests of the Empire. He had observed with much pleasure the way in which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department had mastered the details of his office, and also the remarkable clearness with which he had laid his proposals before the Committee. Credit must be given to the Government for knowing what was requisite, and he could not, therefore, support a proposal to reduce the Vote by so large a number as 10,000 men.

COLONEL KENNARD expressed his approval of the system of deferred pay, which had been tried some years ago in the Marines with great success. The Marine service was then exceedingly popular, and was able to get a number of recruits of the very best kind. He understood that the system had been discontinued, and that the popularity of the service had in consequence fallen away. He felt sure that the effect of the system of deferred pay would be to encourage long service and to diminish desertions. In America, where it had been tried with considerable success, the desertions last year had diminished to the extent of 43 per cent. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) seemed to think that soldiers would not appreciate the advantages of deferred pay. To meet that difficulty, he would suggest that at the end of every year the amount due to the soldier should be made up, inserted in his pocket-ledger, and certified by the captain of his company. He had always thought that the Army laboured under a great disadvantage as compared with the Navy in the matter of training schools. He would, therefore, suggest that training schools might be made an excellent reserve from which to draw our non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and that those training schools might be fed from the reformatories. By training young persons in such schools, we might in a great measure get over the difficulty which had been experienced with respect to the supply of non-commissioned officers; and what training could do had been shown by the heroism exhibited by the boys at the burning of the Goliath. How much admiration the conduct of the boys had excited in that case had been shown by a graceful acknowledgment made by an Indian Prince, an act which was greatly appreciated in England.

MR. DUNBAR said, that the East India Finance Committee of 1874, on which he served as a Member, directed its attention to the question of military service; and he believed that there was scarcely any Member of that Committee who did not think that, as a local Army could not be re-established, some kind of long service was required for India. Under the old East India Company recruiting was done at an average cost of £20 per head, whereas at present it was £100, and for two years' service that was a costly system. With regard to the Army Medical Department, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had stated the other night that he intended to give £1,000 to those who had served in that department for 10 years, to enable them to purchase a practice. That might do very well in England or Scotland, but purchasing a practice was a thing unknown in Ireland. At present, if an Irishman entered the medical department, he chose that pursuit for life; and if after 10 years' service he had to retire with £1,000, he would be placed at a disadvantage compared with those who had been in the medical schools at the same time and had settled down to practise at home. Such a man would be in much the same position as a barrister who had come from India after 10 years there, and then tried to get on at the Bar in this country. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to do something for those who were at the top and bottom, but would he not do something for those who were in the middle? There were 430 surgeon-majors, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman what he would do for them. There was another point which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider—What could be done for those who had been in the Service for, say, nine years? If anything could be done for that class, he believed it would tend very much to remove the dissatisfaction which existed in that department of the Service. The right hon. Gentleman said that, under the new system, six men would be promoted from the temporary to the permanent list: he should like to know whether the intention was to reduce the establishment, and maintain only such a number as would be kept up by six promotions every year. If steps were taken to clear away the block which now existed with regard to surgeon-majors much dissatisfaction would be removed.

LORD ELCHO congratulated his right hon. Friend on the great approval which his exposition of the Army Estimates had met with on every side of the House. He (Lord Elcho), unfortunately, was not able to be present last week, when they were introduced by his right hon. Friend; but looking to the candour, the frankness, and the courage which characterized it, he must say he entirely sympathized with that approval. There were many excellent points in it. If he ventured in anything to differ from his right hon. Friend it would not be in any unfriendly or captious spirit, and his right hon. Friend was the last man to object to any fair criticism. The first important matter to which he would refer was as to the Report of the Commission on Promotion and Retirement. It was not ready yet, but if rumour spoke correctly, it only awaited the signature of the Commissioners, and their signature only waited for the completion of certain actuarial calculations which had to be filled up. He thought, therefore, with a little pressure put on the actuaries the Report might be laid on the Table, signed by the Commissioners, in a short time. It was desirable that that should be done, because there was a block of promotion in the Army, and there was a natural dissatisfaction that the promise made by that House in 1871—that the flow of promotion should go on under the new system as under the old—had not been carried out. He hoped his right hon. Friend would press forward the Report, for every day's delay was a wrong to the officers and an injury to the Service. When it was produced the House of Commons and the country would know what this whistle of the Trevelyan family had cost them, and he believed it would be found to be about £1,000,000 a-year for ever, so that the change was dear at the money. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that 80 officers had been brought from half to full pay, but he did not tell them at what cost. He had also told them that the Yeomanry were to be simply Light Cavalry, and that their guns were to be done away with. He (Lord Elcho) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman did not agree to make them Rifle Cavalry; for, as such, they would be more useful than as Light Cavalry. He now came to a point on which he was sorry to be at issue with his right hon. Friend, and that was with regard to the new military decoration—the Order of the Broad Arrow, or Anderson's brand. It was seriously proposed by a Member of that House, and the Government proposed to consider it, that because there was a difficulty in dealing with a certain number of fraudulent deserters they should ask every man who served Her Majesty, from the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief to the lowest drummer boy, to have stamped on his cuticle the same mark as that stamped on every military pigskin saddle. That seemed to him one of the most monstrous propositions possible. It was an absolute giving up of their system, for it showed that the system was so bad that they could not attract men into the Service, and that when they had got them they could not keep them. This new military Order, instead of flowing from the fountain of honour, the Queen, was to flow from the fountain of dishonour, the fraudulent deserter. If this new Order were adopted, he hoped there would be, as in the case of the Bath, a civil branch, and that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues would set a good example by submitting their cuticles to this honourable distinction, and that they would be followed by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite now in the Reserve and anxiously waiting for their deferred pay. There were matters in the speech of his right hon. Friend which all must agree in praising without qualification. There was the purchase of the ground at Aldershot, and there was the sum to be spent in stores. Incidentally, in connection with stores, a discussion had been raised with reference to the Martini-Henry rifle, and he wished to say that he had been a Member of the second Committee which sat on that subject. When he entered the Committee he was hostile to the arm; but when he knew the testing experiments to which it had been subjected before it was adopted by the first Committee, he was convinced that there must have been some fault in the subsequent manufacture of the arm. He should like to know what stores of small arms there ought to be, and what we actually had in store. He also wanted to know how Gibraltar and Malta were off for stores if they had to stand a siege. They must all agree as to the wisdom of what was to be done for the non-commissioned officers. He also approved of raising 18 regiments to 820 men, and so with respect to the calling out of two corps. He thought it eminently desirable that we should test the existence of the Reserves to see whether they would come out. He now came to what was called the mobilization scheme. A few officers said the mobilization scheme was mere waste paper. But it had been prepared by most able officers, who had considered every detail as far as they had materials. Therefore, he thought we ought to be extremely grateful to the officers who prepared it, and grateful to the Government for having the courage to bring it forward. It required courage to do so, because it exposed the deficiencies of the existing system, comparing that scheme with the number of men and materials on the Estimates. He had made out that if we had to put our existing force on a war footing, making allowance for Army Hospital Corps, &c., we should require, in addition to what we had, 105,000 men and 58,000 horses. The horses could be procured without much difficulty; it was not so easy to get the men. We had 342 guns in the Artillery, but we required a great many more, say, 800, to complete the requisite number. There were two ways in which our Artillery Force might be increased at little or no expense. In the first place, the system of employing the powerful horses engaged in agricultural work might be extended, the men being obtained in the shape of volunteers, and the horses being ready harnessed and fit for employment at little or no cost. That was tried in a Volunteer review, and it was found that they could do 30 miles a-day. That system might be extended throughout the country ad infinitum. An enormous Artillery Force could be got up in that way. This was the only country in Europe which in time of peace had its batteries complete. We had plenty of Artillery drivers, and with one waggon to each battery we could double our effective force. But the main difficulty was the question how to keep up our Army. His right hon. Friend proposed to do that by various means. He proposed to give increased pay to the Guards, to which no one could object, for if a good article was wanted, they must give a good price for it. He proposed also that furlough pay should be increased to men on furlough; and, lastly, came the question of deferred pay. He (Lord Elcho) had always thought that a pension was preferable to deferred pay; but the giving of deferred pay appeared to be well worth trying, and he thought his right hon. Friend had done wisely in testing it. His right hon. Friend said when once we had given men money we could not get it back from the men to whom we had engaged to pay it. But if the plan did not answer, deferred pay could be cut off from those who came in afterwards, provided we got them on different terms. His right hon. Friend had proposed to give to a man in the Guards 1*d.* a-day more than to a Linesman, because in stature, &c., a Guardsman was a more valuable article than a Linesman. His right hon. Friend should carry downwards that principle of payment, according to the value of the article. Let a line be drawn at 20 years of age for the purpose of testing the value of a man, and do not give deferred pay to a man below 20, or whose physique, in the opinion of a military surgeon, was not equal to that of a full-grown man at 20. As to the age of recruits, his right hon. Friend said we could not get recruits enough if we limited the age of recruits to 20 years. Nobody had proposed that that should be done. But this was urged on the House last Session—that recruits should not be sent abroad until they were grown men. Notwithstanding the promise that was given on that subject, he found that 1,144 men under 20 years of age had been sent to India. He earnestly hoped that we should have an improvement, not only as to the number of our men, but as to their age and physique, for on looking through the last statistics respecting the Army he found that if the recruits were measured round the chest in the same manner as the police, out of 178,276 men; only 39,353 would be accepted by the police, and out of 112,424 infantry only 23,370 would be so accepted. Although the present Government had already done something, he thought that more should be done in giving employment in the Civil Service to soldiers. If the War Office Department were open to soldiers, it would be a great inducement to men to enter the Army. We could have much more work done and at much less cost than at present in the War Department if soldiers and officers were employed there. He was greatly disappointed by his right hon. Friend not having completely grappled with the question of the Militia. An hon. Member had been going about the country during the last Autumn, and had done a great deal of good in showing our military deficiencies, but he suggested that the Militia should be swept away. He might as well talk of sweeping away the Established Church, trial by jury, or any other of our institutions. Englishmen when they reformed their institutions were not in the habit of knocking them down like a pack of cards. No one knew so well as the Secretary for riod of reliefs in India, so that they might not arrive in this country from a hot climate in the cold weather as at present; but the fact was, that if they marched through India to the coast, except in the cold season, the amount of illness and the number of deaths would be twenty-fold. On the whole, he believed the Army would be well satisfied with the Government proposals, and that under the increased inducements offered, a large number of recruits would come in.

Lord Elcho

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE desired to draw attention to the increased charge which would result from the proposal as to deferred pay. The right hon. Gentleman told the House the other day that the charge for the present year would amount to £13,000, but that it would be more in future years, but he did not state what it would ultimately amount to. The right hon. Gentleman had intended to lay upon the Table that evening a table which would throw light on the subject, but unfortunately it was not in such a condition that he could present it. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be in a position to give the Committee an idea as to what the ultimate charge would be. He did not like to say he was opposed to the proposal, but he thought the Committee ought not to accept it without serious consideration. In the absence of an estimate he had endeavoured to calculate what the charge would be and he found that 2*d.* a-day to be paid to 160,000 rank and file would amount to £480,000, of which over £150,000 would have to be borne by India. There would be the Reserve men in addition, who were to receive additional pay, so that while the charge would be but £13,000 for the year, ultimately, and perhaps in 10 or 12 years, it would amount to no less than £500,000. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the representatives of deceased soldiers would be entitled to the deferred pay due to them at the time of their death; and what would be the effect upon men who entered upon long service—would they be entitled to the 2*d.* a-day in addition to their pensions? [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: No.] Well, these matters ought to be made clear to the Committee. They ought to keep clearly before them the effect of the proposal—namely, that though they were now asked for £13,000 only, eventually the charge would amount to about £500,000. What was now done for the Army would, he presumed, be also necessary for the Navy and Marines before very long.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that so far from wishing the House to vote under any disguise, those who had done him the honour to listen to his statement on Thursday would remember that so far from understating what the charge would be, he overstated it when he said that the deferred pay would cost £17,000 this year, and in the result would be £225,000, while in the year 1890 it would rise to about £325,000. Probably when these sums came to be carefully considered there would be some variation, according to the number of men voted in each year. He agreed that it was desirable that the Report of the Commission on Promotion and Retirement should be before the House as soon as possible. It was true it had not yet been signed; but immediately after it had been placed before Her Majesty it would be laid upon the Table. The conclusions of the Commission would very much depend on the calculations of the actuaries, which, he understood, it would take three months to complete. With respect to the pension after 12 years, he had had an actuarial calculation made. He found that the pension after 12 years to 21 years was equivalent to 6½*d.* a-day, as against the deferred pay of 2*d.*, and that was a gain so large that it seemed unreasonable to give those men deferred pay in addition. With regard to the question as to billeting, it must be kept up for the Regular troops, because it was never known in what direction they would have to go, and it was impossible to make permanent engagements. He was anxious not to put undue pressure on those upon whom the men were billeted; but the billet pay had been increased of late years, and where there was a constant flow of troops he was told that if anyone would undertake it as a speculation to accommodate them, it might be made to pay. He was still strongly of opinion that it would be well to have training barracks for the Militia, as they were unaccustomed to live under canvas and in bad weather met with great difficulties in the way of keeping their clothes dry, cleanliness, and other matters. Until barracks were built the system of billeting for the Militia must, therefore, be kept up here and there. The men received money enough to obtain lodgings in many parts of the town, which were practically as good as those that they got at the public-houses. With regard to the alleged falling-off in the Militia, he found that the enlistments in 1875 were 29,961; in 1874, 29,831, and in 1873, 25,361. So that, notwithstanding all difficulties, recruiting for the Militia was kept up pretty well, although there was a slight falling-off in the re-enrolment owing, as he thought, to the change of bounty which had not been properly understood. The employment of a greater number of boys had been pressed upon him, and he had given a great deal of attention to this subject. When, however, he had got a young man of 18 he was told by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) and others that he ought not to pay him as a soldier; and if he had to pay £60 for two years previous training for a lad of 18, and should have to meet his noble Friend in conflict as to whether that lad was a soldier, the question became more difficult. The boys, no doubt, would be well trained, and would in time make good non-commissioned officers, but only a certain number could be used up in that way, and to set up training schools for boys would involve so great an expense that he was by no means sure it would not be far more expensive than the present system. He had been told by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir George Balfour) that his mobilization scheme had been copied from the German system, while the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) said that the reverse was the case, and as the two hon. Gentlemen sat so near together, he might leave the point in dispute to be settled in conversation between them. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) seemed to think that he had a proposal for immediately bringing the Ballot into force for the Militia; but, in fact, he was one of those who looked upon the Ballot as the last resource; but if the voluntary system for the Militia failed, the Ballot would be, he thought, a most justifiable thing to adopt. The Militia were not sent out of the United Kingdom, and as they would only be called out to defend their own homes there would not be the least injustice in calling upon every man of proper age to take his chance of the Ballot. He would admit that the present system of Ballot was unfair, unequal, and difficult to work, and long before we might want it it would be well to set it in proper order; and although he could not hope to find sufficient time to deal with the matter during the present Session, yet it should be well weighed in order to see what defects existed and how the Ballot could be adapted for an emergency should it ever arise. Then came the question raised by his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) of the encouragement to be given to the Army by offering places in the Civil Service to men of good character. Now, he had stated the other night that it was an illusion to hold out to the Army that there were so many places as it was sometimes represented at the disposal of the Civil Service which could be reserved for them. He was quite willing that this question should be tested before a Select Committee, and if the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), who had a Motion on the subject, would change it so as to move for a Committee he should be willing to agree to it. Another hon. Member had referred to the supplies at Malta and Gibraltar. He could not quite understand whether stores or food were meant. With regard to food, two questions arose—a food supply for the garrison and one for the inhabitants. As to the duty of Government to supply food for the garrison there could be no doubt, and the time might come when it would be necessary to supply the inhabitants. The question was, however, whether it was the duty of the Government to go to the enormous cost of keeping stores for the latter purpose. This was a question of importance, because the time might come when the inhabitants of the place might be exposed to the danger of dying of starvation, but that could not be if we had the command of the sea. At the same time, it was a vast expense to keep up stores at a place like Malta, and the matter was one which had to be weighed along with fifty others. The questions that had been raised with respect to fortifications were too large to be discussed on the Estimates. Nor was that of coaling stations less complex; for instance, if the Suez Canal were stopped up by accident or warlike measures, it would be necessary to send troops round by the Cape, and Simon's Bay would then become important. There was a coaling station at Jamaica; and, indeed, all over the world there were stations the importance of which would be great in the event of certain possible contingencies. It would be unjustifiable to cast the whole expenditure in these cases on the Estimates of the year; it ought rather to be treated as we had treated the expenditure for fortifications and for the brigade depôts. In giving the figures as to the measurement of the recruits, he quoted, not from one Paper, but from two Papers, having, as he stated at the time, when he was furnished with the averages, asked for the maximum and the minimum in each case—except those in which it was fixed—and these extremes he read to the Committee. As to the age of recruits, he protested against his noble Friend taking only men of 20 and saying that they would not be fit for their work until they were 21. He believed the Army would contain as many men of the age of 20 this year as it did last; and in Germany they were taken at the age of 19.

LORD ELCHO said, he had no objection to their being taken under the age of 20, so long as they were not reckoned as effectives until they reached the age of 20.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not get younger men at less pay, and he did not mean to change the system of recruiting, under which selection had been carried so far last year that only 18,000 out of 27,000 who offered themselves had been enlisted. As to the deficiencies of Army Corps, they were not meant to be filled up to the strength of Army Corps abroad; they were only meant to be cadres. Of Artillery, we had 63 batteries manned and horsed—with 378 guns, and we had in reserve 43 batteries, of course not manned and horsed—with 258 guns, so that we had 106 batteries with 636 guns, which would be in readiness by the beginning of next year. [Colonel MURE: Are they fully manned?] The guns he had referred to as such were manned and horsed; and he need not say our Artillery was horsed beyond that of any other Power. He had not attempted to keep the plan of mobilization secret because he should have occupied an unpleasant position in being continually asked Questions about it. For two Sessions the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George

Campbell) had repeated Questions the answers to which he could not understand, and he had reiterated in fifty shapes the speech he had made that night. He could scarcely understand how the hon. Member had misapprehended him so far, for what he had said was, that he was doing the best he could to obtain men who would serve five years in India. He had had a Departmental Committee examining officers, and among them that great authority upon the subject, for whom he had a great respect in his place, Lord Sandhurst; but neither his reputation nor that of his article in The Edinburgh Review would induce him to accept the noble Lord as his guide in this matter. The article in the Review was a theoretical one. No doubt nothing could be more advisable than to exercise men three years in the Militia and then draft them into the Army if you could do it. But it could not be done. If the Militia would do it they would please him excessively and improve the Army; but he could not compel them to do it. The proposition in the article would not bear argument; and with great respect for the noble Lord, who was to take part in a public meeting to-day—Tuesday—on the subject of the Knightsbridge Barracks, he must object to his Lordship setting himself up as an infallible authority on either question. With regard to the three years' enlistment, it was never intended that the War Department should take the initiative, but that only on the recommendation of commanding officers should these men be transferred to the Reserve. If there was a real steady flow of recruits, such as would keep the Army up to the full amount, with a certain overflow, then it might be easy to pass three years' men into the Reserve; but, if they could not keep up their Regular forces without retaining the men longer, then they could not wonder if commanding officers were not ready to allow those who had served only three years to pass into the Reserve. But no impediments were offered to that by him or by any one in the War Department. He had been asked by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire about the number of small arms which they had. Of the Martini-Henry this year there would be 316,000, and of Sniders 240,000. Then with regard to guns for fortifications, 30 38-ton guns would, he thought, be placed in position in the course of this year. He should have wished to place a few more, if the Estimates were not so high; but under present circumstances, he would allow that wish to remain in abeyance. There was a great number of new fortifications, the gradual armament of which would be a work of considerable expense, and if artillerymen went on demanding heavier guns, he was afraid that would be a matter for his successors to deal with, because he assumed that the country would desire to arm its forts with the best possible ordnance. With respect to Major Moncrieff's system, Major Moncrieff had really completed the work he had to do at the War Office, and had been paid the sum that was agreed upon at the conclusion of his services. Nothing more ingenious could be imagined than that officer's system, which had been carefully examined and found very useful in many ways; but it was not applicable in all cases. He did not know that Major Moncrieff had any complaint, because he had received the terms on which he was engaged. An hon. Friend behind him had made some remarks about desertion, and the noble Lord had requested him to submit to be stamped in his own person as belonging to Her Majesty's service. Well, if any good would be obtained for the country by it, he would submit to that with the greatest pleasure. He was not the least ashamed of serving Her Majesty or afraid of the indignity, if such it was, which would be put upon him in that shape. The noble Lord went too far in speaking of conclusions having been come to on that subject, because there had been no such conclusion. The hon. Member for Glasgow, in view of these frequent desertions, had suggested a thing which might be applied without detriment to anybody—namely, that as every recruit was vaccinated, the operation should be performed in a particular way to show that it had been done in the Army. The hon. Member for Glasgow said that all men at present in the Army ought to be exempted from the process unless they liked it, and therefore no injury would be done to anyone. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) wanted some alteration of the law respecting desertion, and said it was impossible to prove a man's intention to desert. Now, his hon. and gallant Friend was an excellent magistrate, and no doubt in his own county he had known many a man to be convicted whose intentions had been proved by his acts and his words. If a man broke open a place without actually stealing anything from it, there might be circumstances in the case which would lead a jury to convict him of intending to steal. And so if a man belonging to the Army was found to have taken a passage to America and to have gone off, there would be no real difficulty in proving that it was his intention to desert. Yet it might be necessary, though he did not say that it was so, to make some slight alteration in the Mutiny Act as to soldiers attempting to desert. The hon. and learned Member for New Ross (Mr. Dunbar) had asked him a question about Irish surgeons in the Army. Now he had always thought that Irish surgeons and English surgeons were the same until the hon. and learned Gentleman told him there was a difference between them. The Irish surgeons, the hon. and learned Gentleman said, never wanted to leave, and then he rather inconsistently asked him what provision he would make for those who wished to retire after 10 years' service? There were a great many Irish surgeons in the Army. In fact, if it had not been for the supply of surgeons from the Irish schools, he did not know how they could have got on in the medical department of the Service. One might, however, he thought, notwithstanding what the hon. and learned Gentleman said, purchase a practice in Ireland, for when a man had a property in his tenant right he could not understand how it was that the goodwill of a business should not find as ready a sale in Ireland as in any other part of the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not know all the property his countrymen possessed. He really could not dwell on a difficulty of that sort; but if Irish surgeons, as he declared, did not wish to retire, and were selected on account of their ability, to go on for promotion, we should soon have a long roll of the highest officers in the department speaking with a most elegant brogue. His belief, however, was that Irish surgeons would very willingly pocket their money at the end of 10 years, and lay it out as profitably as their English fellow-officers, if they were not selected to re-

then become important. There was a coaling station at Jamaica; and, indeed, all over the world there were stations the importance of which would be great in the event of certain possible contingencies. It would be unjustifiable to cast the whole expenditure in these cases on the Estimates of the year; it ought rather to be treated as we had treated the expenditure for fortifications and for the brigade depôts. In giving the figures as to the measurement of the recruits, he quoted, not from one Paper, but from two Papers, having, as he stated at the time, when he was furnished with the averages, asked for the maximum and the minimum in each case—except those in which it was fixed—and these extremes he read to the Committee. As to the age of recruits, he protested against his noble Friend taking only men of 20 and saying that they would not be fit for their work until they were 21. He believed the Army would contain as many men of the age of 20 this year as it did last; and in Germany they were taken at the age of 19.

LORD ELCHO said, he had no objection to their being taken under the age of 20, so long as they were not reckoned as effectives until they reached the age of 20.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not get younger men at less pay, and he did not mean to change the system of recruiting, under which selection had been carried so far last year that only 18,000 out of 27,000 who offered themselves had been enlisted. As to the deficiencies of Army Corps, they were not meant to be filled up to the strength of Army Corps abroad; they were only meant to be cadres. Of Artillery, we had 63 batteries manned and horsed—with 378 guns, and we had in reserve 43 batteries, of course not manned and horsed—with 258 guns, so that we had 106 batteries with 636 guns, which would be in readiness by the beginning of next year. [Colonel MURE: Are they fully manned?] The guns he had referred to as such were manned and horsed; and he need not say our Artillery was horsed beyond that of any other Power. He had not attempted to keep the plan of mobilization secret because he should have occupied an unpleasant position in being continually asked Questions about it. For two Sessions the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George

Campbell) had repeated Questions the answers to which he could not understand, and he had reiterated in fifty shapes the speech he had made that night. He could scarcely understand how the hon. Member had misapprehended him so far, for what he had said was, that he was doing the best he could to obtain men who would serve five years in India. He had had a Departmental Committee examining officers, and among them that great authority upon the subject, for whom he had a great respect in his place, Lord Sandhurst; but neither his reputation nor that of his article in The Edinburgh Review would induce him to accept the noble Lord as his guide in this matter. The article in the Review was a theoretical one. No doubt nothing could be more advisable than to exercise men three years in the Militia and then draft them into the Army if you could do it. But it could not be done. If the Militia would do it they would please him excessively and improve the Army; but he could not compel them to do it. The proposition in the article would not bear argument; and with great respect for the noble Lord, who was to take part in a public meeting to-day—Tuesday—on the subject of the Knightsbridge Barracks, he must object to his Lordship setting himself up as an infallible authority on either question. With regard to the three years' enlistment, it was never intended that the War Department should take the initiative, but that only on the recommendation of commanding officers should these men be transferred to the Reserve. If there was a real steady flow of recruits, such as would keep the Army up to the full amount, with a certain overflow, then it might be easy to pass three years' men into the Reserve; but, if they could not keep up their Regular forces without retaining the men longer, then they could not wonder if commanding officers were not ready to allow those who had served only three years to pass into the Reserve. But no impediments were offered to that by him or by any one in the War Department. He had been asked by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire about the number of small arms which they had. Of the Martini-Henry this year there would be 316,000, and of Sniders 240,000. Then with regard to guns for fortifications, 30 38-ton guns would, he thought, be placed in position in the course of this year. He should have wished to place a few more, if the Estimates were not so high; but under present circumstances, he would allow that wish to remain in abeyance. There was a great number of new fortifications, the gradual armament of which would be a work of considerable expense, and if artillerymen went on demanding heavier guns, he was afraid that would be a matter for his successors to deal with, because he assumed that the country would desire to arm its forts with the best possible ordnance. With respect to Major Moncrieff's system, Major Moncrieff had really completed the work he had to do at the War Office, and had been paid the sum that was agreed upon at the conclusion of his services. Nothing more ingenious could be imagined than that officer's system, which had been carefully examined and found very useful in many ways; but it was not applicable in all cases. He did not know that Major Moncrieff had any complaint, because he had received the terms on which he was engaged. An hon. Friend behind him had made some remarks about desertion, and the noble Lord had requested him to submit to be stamped in his own person as belonging to Her Majesty's service. Well, if any good would be obtained for the country by it, he would submit to that with the greatest pleasure. He was not the least ashamed of serving Her Majesty or afraid of the indignity, if such it was, which would be put upon him in that shape. The noble Lord went too far in speaking of conclusions having been come to on that subject, because there had been no such conclusion. The hon. Member for Glasgow, in view of these frequent desertions, had suggested a thing which might be applied without detriment to anybody—namely, that as every recruit was vaccinated, the operation should be performed in a particular way to show that it had been done in the Army. The hon. Member for Glasgow said that all men at present in the Army ought to be exempted from the process unless they liked it, and therefore no injury would be done to anyone. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) wanted some alteration of the law respecting desertion, and said it was impossible to prove a man's intention to desert. Now, his hon. and gallant Friend was an excellent magistrate, and no doubt in his own country he had known many a man to be convicted whose intentions had been proved by his acts and his words. If a man broke open a place without actually stealing anything from it, there might be circumstances in the case which would lead a jury to convict him of intending to steal. And so if a man belonging to the Army was found to have taken a passage to America and to have gone off, there would be no real difficulty in proving that it was his intention to desert. Yet it might be necessary, though he did not say that it was so, to make some slight alteration in the Mutiny Act as to soldiers attempting to desert. The hon. and learned Member for New Ross (Mr. Dunbar) had asked him a question about Irish surgeons in the Army. Now he had always thought that Irish surgeons and English surgeons were the same until the hon. and learned Gentleman told him there was a difference between them. The Irish surgeons, the hon. and learned Gentleman said, never wanted to leave, and then he rather inconsistently asked him what provision he would make for those who wished to retire after 10 years' service? There were a great many Irish surgeons in the Army. In fact, if it had not been for the supply of surgeons from the Irish schools, he did not know how they could have got on in the medical department of the Service. One might, however, he thought, notwithstanding what the hon. and learned Gentleman said, purchase a practice in Ireland, for when a man had a property in his tenant right he could not understand how it was that the goodwill of a business should not find as ready a sale in Ireland as in any other part of the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not know all the property his countrymen possessed. He really could not dwell on a difficulty of that sort; but if Irish surgeons, as he declared, did not wish to retire, and were selected on account of their ability, to go on for promotion, we should soon have a long roll of the highest officers in the department speaking with a most elegant brogue. His belief, however, was that Irish surgeons would very willingly pocket their money at the end of 10 years, and lay it out as profitably as their English fellow-officers, if they were not selected to remain in the Service, as he had no doubt many of them would be. As for the Volunteer adjutants their position was being very considerably improved, and they were relieved of the necessity of recruiting, at which they had no great opportunity of doing much. In the matter of precedence, they would, of course, follow their rank, but he believed they were never put in command of a regiment. The hon. Member for Glasgow had complained that the Militia were made a back-door for incapable officers to get into the Army. Well, it was not in his time that that connection between the Militia and the Army had been established. The relations existing between the two Forces might be open to objection; but he did not see how any incapable officers could pass from the one to the other, as had been described. In the first place, Militia officers before entering the Army required to have two years' training and to pass an examination, which was much harder now than formerly, and which was being made harder by degrees. The examination no doubt was held at a later age than for the Army; but then there was the advantage of the two years' training and of whatever extra pains the officer might take to qualify himself for his position. He was not aware that any incapable officers had got into the Army in this way, although some who had failed in the earlier examination had succeeded in the second. As for shooting, it was quite true that a month's training was not sufficient to make the Militia very expert in that; but animated as they were with the spirit of Englishmen, it was hardly likely Militiamen would have a rifle in their hands for a month without learning to use it with some effect. Under existing circumstances it was perhaps impossible to give them all the facilities for learning to shoot that might be desirable; but he would take care to call the attention of the Inspector General of the Auxiliary Forces to the subject in order to see how far the present system might be improved. The question of sentinel duty had been raised. Well, it was necessary that all regiments should have experience of sentinel duty, and although he was prepared to make the soldier's life as agreeable as possible, it was important that the men should be well tested in time of peace. He hoped to give the Guards a little relief. Hitherto they had gone from one place to another where there was a great deal of this duty to be performed, but it was now proposed to send them to Shorncliffe or elsewhere in the country where they would have a period of rest. The hon. Member for Glasgow had regretted that there was going to be an increase in the number of men; but that subject he (Mr. Hardy) had already gone into so fully, that he would only now observe that regiments to be properly worked must have a certain amount of solidity, and that they might be reduced to too much of a skeleton form for practical purposes. The new Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had raised several objections to proposals before the House. He (Mr. Hardy) was very glad he was going to have the benefit of the hon. and gallant Member's criticism on military questions, drawn as it would be from practical experience. The points to which the hon. and gallant Member had objected, however, happened just to be those with which he was, perhaps, not practically acquainted. As to the compulsory retirement of medical officers, it was no doubt true that a man might be fit for something at 60; but there were other considerations to be borne in mind. There were other people who particularly wanted to step into their shoes. He had a great consideration for those gentlemen of 60, many of whom no doubt were perfectly fit for service, but there was a multitude of aspirants to their places, and promotion was the soul of the Service. Without promotion there would be no hope, without hope no emulation, and without emulation the Service would be dead and apathetic. He was, therefore, most anxious to assist the promotion of the medical officers. He denied that he had forgotten the non-Effective service; he had said he could not deal with a reduction of that service. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) had referred to the tactical station in the North; but he could assure him that if he could look into all the facts, he would see that a right conclusion had been come to on the subject. Great advantages would be derived from their being at York. The stores would all be in the neighbourhood of York, and there would be excellent ground there, if not for manœuvres, for training. They would have at least

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

1,115 acres, and Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry would have an opportunity of training together. The Militia called upon to take part in the training would also derive great advantages. With respect to Aldershot he had looked out for more ground there, and he hoped to get between 6,000 and 7,000 acres. This would enable them to have much more extensive manœuvres, without putting anyone to inconvenience. His hon. Friend spoke of disguise; but he (Mr. Hardy) did not wish to do anything in the dark. That was the last thing he should attempt to do in the House. With respect to mobilization, the steps they had taken would enable them in case the pressure was on the colonies and not on England to send troops to the colonies; and if the pressure was on England and not on the colonies, they should be able to keep the troops at home. A great deal depended on the Fleet in the first instance. He did not forget that there were accidents—accidents which were quite unforeseen; and he must not suppose the Fleet to be always in the exact place in which it might be most needed. He hoped that this country would keep command of the seas. Even Mr. Cobden said that the English Navy ought to be three times as strong as any Continental Navy. It ought to be sufficient to afford us security under all ordinary circumstances; but extraordinary circumstances might happen, and it would be madness to be taken unprovided in such a contingency. He should be the last person in the world to depreciate the Navy. His object was that under any possible circumstances they should be ready as far as they possibly could, without the country being put to unreasonable expense, to meet circumstances as they arose. With respect to the enormous Army which they had, let him call attention to what their neighbours had. We had in this country about 90,000 soldiers; and in the colonies about 24,000. They had an Army Reserve of 6,000—that was, in round numbers, they had available from 120,000 to 130,000 trained men. France had, as its peace establishment (without looking at her territorial reserve), 450,000, and a war establishment of 1,100,000 men. Germany had a peace establishment of 400,000, and a war establishment of 1,250,000 men—the Landsturm not included. Russia in Europe had a peace establishment of 846,000, and a war establishment of 1,250,000, irregular troops not included. Austria had a peace establishment of 271,451, and a war establishment of 776,487, not including the reserve. Italy had a peace establishment of 220,441 men, and a war establishment of 456,330 men. Belgium—a little country of 5,000,000 inhabitants—had a peace establishment of 48,000, and in war 104,000 men. Looking at these facts, and remembering the enormous interests which were at stake in this country, he did not think he was asking for anything exorbitant in the number of men comprised in the Vote now under discussion; and he could not believe that after the Committee had declared earlier in the evening that it would not reduce the proposed expenditure, it would now take the nibbling course of striking off 10,000 men from our Regular Forces at the bidding of his hon. Friend.

Mr. PEASE said, that as far as he was personally concerned, he had no wish to put the House to the trouble of a division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £4,722,200, Pay and Allowances, &c. of Land Forces.

Mr. GOSCHEN asked what would be the effect of the deferred pay on the Estimates of the next three or four years?

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had already stated that the ultimate sum would be £325,000. The rise in the Estimates, however, would be very gradual, and in the first few years would not, probably, exceed £50,000 or £60,000 a-year.

Mr. GOSCHEN asked whether the nation did not become liable to those who remained in the Force to the extent of £3 a-year, so that, supposing there were 160,000 men, we should be liable to £480,000 less what was forfeited by deserters and others or recouped by India?

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, the liability attached to the nation, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, but the money would not be paid until it became actually due. Meanwhile it would be recorded in the soldier's small book, so that he and his officers would know the amount of his claim.

COLONEL HAYTER agreed with the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that the best way to furnish a stimulus to recruiting would be to give immediate, and not deferred, pay. The enormous proportion of desertions from the Royal Artillery might, perhaps, be counteracted by giving that force an additional 1*d.* a-day. As to the deficiency in the Foot Guards, that might be easily accounted for. The daily average of sick in the troops generally was 37·47 per 1,000; in Infantry regiments it was 31·98, in the Foot Guards 45·20. This high average in the Guards was entirely caused by the enormous sentry duty to which they were exposed, and he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman intended to make some reduction of duty in the West End.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, as the Secretary for War had instituted a new mobilization scheme, and the pay and allowances of the Staff which would in consequence be necessary would cost the country £400,000 a-year, it was important to know how the Staff was appointed. Some 15 years ago a Staff College was instituted, and it was declared that only officers who had been distinguished in the field or who had passed through that college would in future be eligible for Staff appointments. Instead of that principle being carried out, the great bulk of the Staff appointments were given to whomsoever the Horse Guards chose to select. Thus only 23 appointments out of 180 had been given to those who had passed through the Staff College, and these were the lowest appointments on the Staff.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Queen's Regulations did not lay down that the Staff College should have an absolute right to these appointments, but only to a portion of them. He thought very great consideration should be given to the claims of those who had passed the examinations; and to a certain extent that had been done. As far as he was concerned, he should approve of giving those appointments requiring intelligence to intelligent men.

MR. MUNTZ thought that if those officers in the Staff College did not receive the rewards which were supposed to be incidental to their appointment, they had better be quit of it altogether.

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT contended that if the Staff College was worth anything to the country it ought to be fully encouraged. As he understood, the great object was to get the best men to go through the Staff College examination; but if only 23 out of 180 officers who had gone through all the labour of preparing for the examination, and had given up their regimental service for the purpose, received places, then he thought a gross injustice was inflicted upon them.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £49,200, Divine Service.

(4.) £27,900, Administration of Military Law.

(5.) £262,400, Medical Establishments.

MR. WARD said, he would take advantage of that occasion to say that the proposal of the Government for the improvement of the position of medical men in the Army was a mere temporary scheme, which was entirely due to the fact that they could not, as things stood, induce competent candidates to offer themselves for the service. He complained that they did nothing for those who had done all the hard work, and only held out fresh inducements to the new men.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £672,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Militia Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1876 to the 31st day of March 1877, inclusive."

COLONEL HAYTER moved that, as there was likely to be some discussion on the details of this proposal, Progress should be reported.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

TELEGRAPHS (MONEY) BILL—[BILL 90.]
(Mr. Raikes, Lord John Manners, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord John Manners.)

MR. GOSCHEN said, the House ought to have full explanation of the purposes for which the £500,000 proposed to be raised was required. It was desirable they should know whether the money was to be exclusively applied in payment of the purchase of railway lines of telegraph, or for the amount agreed upon some time ago, together with the interest since accrued?

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wanted to ask three questions—namely, 1. What the total capital expenditure on the telegraphs, up to the present time had been; 2, how much it was thought would still have to be paid to close the capital account as far as the agreements of 1868-70 were concerned; 3, with how many railway companies the price of the purchase of their interest in the lines of telegraph was not yet settled, and what companies those were?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) was well aware that the late Government undertook the duty of purchasing the telegraphs, and that the Act of 1873 provided for £1,250,000 for various charges arising under the earlier Acts. Certain arbitrations had been concluded this year to meet the awards on which no fund existed. They amounted to about £200,000, of which £169,000 or so had been awarded to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company. There still remained the claims of several other railway companies, and he hoped that £300,000 would be sufficient to meet those claims, which were inherited by the present from preceding Governments, and accrued under the Act of 1868 and 1869. The awards in each case included interest. It would be hard at this time to charge upon revenue more than the actual cost of the service and the interest on the capital sum which represented the charge for acquiring it. Under the Act of 1873 provision was made for the commutation of pensions to the extent of £230,000. He regretted being the organ to ask for a large sum which possibly did not represent the total claims for completing the acquisition of the telegraphs; but he trusted they would soon arrive at the end of the account, and no exertion would be spared on the part of the Treasury to bring about that result. The total of the capital account to the present time, so far as was ascertained, was £9,250,000, of which there was a balance left of £87,000, which, however, was due to the fund set apart under the Act of 1873 for the commutation of pensions.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH doubted whether the House had heard a more discreditable statement in connection with the purchase of the telegraphs than that just made. He could not but say that it was desirable that the hon. Gentleman should give the House more information on the subject, and that it should know the entire amount to be taken for the railway companies: £700,000 had been granted lately, and now £500,000 was asked for. Perhaps the noble Lord the Postmaster General would inform the House how it was that money had been paid for some of those telegraphs twice over?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had not the Papers at hand showing the total amount, but in the case of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, which claimed £1,129,814, with interest amounting to £137,460, and £1 per mile per wire annually for way leave, the amount awarded was £169,197, and 1s. per mile per wire annually for way leave; and in the case of the Great Eastern Company, whose claim was £412,680, and £200 per annum for way leave, with £22,349 as interest, and £1 per mile per wire annually for way leave, only £73,315 was awarded. The claims of the railway companies were increased by the passing of the monopoly clauses, and he contended that the Government were simply carrying out the intentions of the Legislature in meeting the claims which were preferred by the railway companies under the Act of Parliament and settled by arbitration.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

DRUGGING OF ANIMALS BILL.

(Sir John Astley, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Bidwell.)

[BILL 85.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Sir John Astley.)

MR. GOLDSMID said, the hon. Baronet owed it to the House, if he understood the meaning of his own measure, to explain its object. It was impossible the Bill could be allowed to pass without material alterations in Committee, and he trusted they would receive an assurance from those who had it in charge that such Amendments would not be resisted.

SIR JOHN ASTLEY said, he was much obliged to the hon. Member for the opinion he entertained of him. He evidently thought him (Sir John Astley) no more fit for his position in that House than any menial position outside. He knew his brains were not as clear as those of his hon. Friend, and if they were of the same calibre, they would be useless or worse to him, because they would only stir up small matters in his mind which would interfere very much with the comfort of his life. Some people thought, because he was fond of racing, he was now trying to legislate for racehorses, but that was not so. His Bill was intended to prevent the administration of arsenic and other deleterious drugs to horses, which was frequently done to improve the appearance of the animals, but which injured their constitution and eventually killed them. He had been urged by a large body of his constituents to bring in the Bill, and he thought it his bounden duty to do so. He hoped his hon. Friend would vote for the measure, and he really thought his only reason for objecting to it was to get him (Sir John Astley) on his legs.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

PRIVATE BILLS—CANVASSING IN THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, pursuant to Notice, rose to move—

"That the solicitation of Members of this House to oppose or support Private Bills on Second Reading by Members connected in any way with interests concerned in that opposition or support, has a tendency to restore the evils which this House sought to redress by the present system of Private Bill Committees chosen by a Committee of Selection."

The hon. Member said, he made the Motion in consequence of what took place the other day on the second reading of the Metropolitan Railway Bill, which was rejected on grounds which would not have stood for a moment the closer examination of a Select Committee. It could not, therefore, be denied that a great wrong was done by the summary and unjust rejection of that Bill. He denied that there was anything in that Bill contrary to precedent or to previous legislation sanctioned by the House. He stated, and it could not be contradicted, that not one word of previous Notice had been given of opposition to either of the two hon. Members whose names were on the back of the Bill. And why was it rejected? Because the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Claud John Hamilton) sent out a circular to his private Friends, entreating them to come down and vote against the measure, because it was to be proposed or supported by a certain Member of that House whom he named. He asked whether such a personal allusion was either usual or allowable? Why was it made? Simply to prejudice the issue. He was painfully conscious that in any question of comparative popularity he stood no chance with the noble Lord. He (Sir Edward Watkin) had led a hard and laborious life, full of conflicts, and he might, therefore, have many enemies. The noble Lord, on the other hand, moved in high circles, had charming manners, many influential friends, and had neither lived long enough, nor, so far, done anything sufficiently great or useful, to surround him with any animosities. The noble Lord was a paid railway director. So was he. The noble Lord was also deputy Chairman of a railway and paid in that capacity, the same as he (Sir Edward Watkin) was as Chairman of a railway. He (Sir Edward Watkin) had been elected to a seat in that House four times, and that was his ninth Session, and never in all that time had he solicited by speech or writing any Member to vote for or against any Bill which he believed to be favourable to or inimical to any undertaking of which he was a director. The noble Lord the deputy Chairman of the Great Eastern Railway and his co-director the hon. Member for Essex (Colonel Makins) marshalled their forces and defeated the Bill, and he wanted to know whether the House thought that was a proper course? If so, on another occasion, it could be done on the other side; and all the old evils of General Committees which the House had rid itself of years ago by appointing Select Committees would be brought back; dishonour would light upon the House with respect to private legislation; and the confidence of the public would be shaken in the purity, and honour, and honesty of its proceedings with respect to Private Bills. Again, such proceedings seriously affected the constitutional right of every subject to petition that House and to have his petition heard. In the case he had quoted a hearing had been refused not owing to reasons, or argument or evidence, but because of secret and private canvass by hon. Members distinctly interested in the issue. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. Goldsmid

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the solicitation of Members of this House to oppose or support Private Bills on Second Reading by Members connected in any way with interests concerned in that opposition or support, has a tendency to restore the evils which this House sought to redress by the present system of Private Bill Committees chosen by a Committee of Selection."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

MR. H. HERBERT said, he had voted against the Bill because it was a most objectionable one, and denied that he had been solicited to do so. The Motion was, he considered, the result of private feeling against the noble Lord on the part of the hon. Member for Hythe. It could not be said that, because the noble Lord had written to a few Friends, he had canvassed for votes, as the words were generally understood. He was a Friend of the noble Lord, and had never heard of the Bill till he came down to the House; but this he could say, that there was one clause in the Bill which was sufficient to secure its rejection. When such a statement as they had just heard was made, he thought it right that it should be at once contradicted. It was much to be regretted that almost on every Private Bill there was canvassing for votes. The system was wrong and ought to be put a stop to; certainly when it was done as openly as it was in the Lobby of the House of Commons.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, that the Motion of the hon. Member impugned the power of the House of Commons to reject Private Bills on the second reading—a power which he contended had exercised a most salutary effect upon the purity and honesty of private legislation. If he were at liberty to go into the merits of the Bill in question, he could show that it was a much worse measure than the House thought it when they rejected it. He denied that the House had ever resigned its power of rejecting Private Bills on second reading. The majority of 65 by which the Bill was thrown out was conclusive as to its demerits. He admitted that he was deputy Chairman of the Great Eastern Railway, and that he wrote to a certain and limited number of his Friends sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, requesting their attendance on the second reading of the "Metropolitan Railway Bill, promoted by Sir Edward Watkin." He was assured by high authorities that, regard being had to the glaring defects of the Bill, the course he took was straightforward and according to precedent, and he trusted that the House would acquit him of having done anything unworthy of the position of one of its Members.

MR. WHITBREAD deprecated the course pursued by the noble Lord, and said that if it was to be resorted to in future, the time of the House, which ought to be devoted to Public Business, would be wasted and taken up by animated and personal squabbles on Private Bills. It was wrong, he thought, for any individual Member to usurp to himself the functions of a Select Committee. He hoped that the hon. Member for Hythe would be satisfied with the discussion, and not divide the House on his Resolution, because it was so wide in its terms that it would prevent any one Member from speaking to any other Member on a Bill before the House.

MR. RAIKES took a similar view, and remarked that of late years a most objectionable practice had sprung up of soliciting the assistance of personal Friends in regard to Private Bills. If the practice were continued, he was afraid that the confidence of the public in the Private Bill legislation of the House would not be maintained. He did not, however, think that the course of the noble Lord in this instance was open to any special objection. It was to be regretted that the more important Members of the House seldom took any part in reference to Private Bill legislation, so as to guide others in the course they should take. He concurred with the hon. Member for Bedford in the hope that the Motion would, after the discussion which had taken place, be withdrawn.

MR. RITCHIE thought that the rejection of the Bill upon the second reading was justified, and if no previous intimation of opposition had been given there would have been probably but very few Members present. The circular sent round had been sent more to secure an attendance than to influence the opinion of Members.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, while thinking an important Constitutional principle at stake, offered, in deference to the suggestions made, to withdraw the Motion. [Cries of "No," and "Divide!"]

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON hoped that the Motion would be permitted to be withdrawn, or a division might place them in a false position.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER concurred in the suggestion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Referees on Private Bills do consist of Twenty-one Members."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would move, as an Amendment, that the Committee should consist of 23 Members, and complained that so few Irish Members were proposed on the Committee. In the event of his Amendment being carried, he should propose two Irish Members, one from each side of the House; and if it was rejected he intended to propose an Amendment on each name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-one," in order to insert the words "Twenty-three,"—(Mr. Sullivan,)—instead thereof.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had no objection to increase the number. The Motion was drawn in the usual form, and there was no intention to cast any slight on the Irish Representatives.

Question put, "That the words 'Twenty-one' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 21: Majority 52.

Mr. Raikes

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would move the omission of the name of Mr. Spencer Walpole, and would propose to substitute in its place the name of Lord Robert Montagu.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. and gallant Member was out of Order, such a Motion not being competent without Notice. He could move the omission of any name from the list.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would amend his Motion in the manner indicated.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Spencer Walpole be a Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 11: Majority 68.

MR. WARD said, he would move the omission of the name of Mr. Dodson from the list.

MR. GOLDSMID appealed to the Irish Members not to continue dividing the House against the wishes of a large majority of hon. Members present.

MR. SULLIVAN thought it a reflection on the Irish Members that out of a total of 103 only two of their body had been chosen to sit on this important Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER pointed out the duties of the Select Committee on Referees on Private Bills. It was important to have Gentlemen of great experience of Private Business, and it was not at all a question of obtaining Gentlemen from one part of the country or the other.

MR. W. E. FORSTER supported the appointment of the Committee as proposed in the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Dodson be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 11: Majority 66.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Mowbray be one other Member of the said Committee."

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought that, if a delay were granted, some arrangement might be come to for the addition of the names of two Irish Members on the Committee, and therefore he would propose the Adjournment of the Debate with the view of seeing whether that course could be adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he hoped that course would not be persisted in, as it was necessary to appoint the Committee without any delay, as it would soon have to enter upon its duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he fully concurred in the remark of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Captain Nolan.)

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 68: Majority 51.

Mr. PARNELL said, he would move the omission of the name of Mr. Mowbray.

Question put, "That Mr. Mowbray be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 10: Majority 66.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Selater-Booth be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 9: Majority 65.

Sir Edward Colebrooke nominated one other Member of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Pemberton be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 9: Majority 65.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Whitbread be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 9: Majority 65.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Basil Woodd be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 9: Majority 65.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Sir John St. Aubyn be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 8: Majority 66.

Mr. Kavanagh and The O'Connor Don nominated other Members of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Heygate be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 7: Majority 64.

Sir Francis Goldsmid nominated one other Member of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Mills be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 3: Majority 72.

Mr. Dillwyn nominated one other Member of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Rodwell be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 3: Majority 71.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Monk be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 3: Majority 71.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Staveley Hill be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 3: Majority 72.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Muntz be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 3: Majority 72.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. John Talbot be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 3: Majority 71.

Mr. Anderson nominated one other Member of the said Committee.

Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

OYSTER FISHERIES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what are the reasons for the present scarcity of Oysters, and what has been the effect of the measures relating to Oyster Fisheries adopted by Parliament subsequently to the Report of the Royal Commission on Sea Fisheries in 1866."—(Sir Charles Legard.)

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question to add the words "and to report what further legislative measures may, in the opinion of the Committee, be desirable."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire what are the reasons for the present scarcity of Oysters, and what has been the effect of the measures relating to Oyster Fisheries adopted by Parliament subsequently to the Report of the Royal Commission on Sea Fisheries in 1866, and to report what further legislative measures may, in the opinion of the Committee, be desirable."

And, on March 9, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. EDWARD STANHOPE, MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, Viscount HOLMESDALE, Mr. HERBERT, Colonel LEARMONTH, Mr. DILLWYN, Lord RENDLESHAM, Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN, Mr. MALCOLM, Mr. MITCHELL HENRY, Mr. O'CONOR, Mr. PEMBERTON, Mr. EUSTACE SMITH, Major WALPOLE, Mr. ARTHUR VIVIAN, Mr. ASHBURY, Mr. WADDY, Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, and Sir CHARLES LEGARD:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

And, on March 16, Lord CLAUD HAMILTON and Mr. FULLER MAITLAND added.

House adjourned at a quarter after Four o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 7th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Marriages (St. James, Buxton)* (22).
Second Reading—Committee negatived—Third Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£4,080,000)*; Consolidated Fund (£4,080,000)*, and passed.
Select Committee—Ecclesiastical Offices and Fees* (3), nominated.

EXCHEQUER BONDS (£4,080,000) BILL.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of making another personal explanation. I am sorry I have to do so, but it is not my fault. Mr. Disraeli is reported in the newspapers of to-day as having stated last night in the House of Commons that the Papers respecting the purchase of the Suez Canal shares containing letters of Sir Daniel Lange to the late Government with reference to an alleged offer of the purchase of the Canal had been sent to me before publication, and that I sanctioned them. He stated afterwards that he did not wish to be understood as attaching any responsibility to me in respect of their publication. With reference to this explanation, I must say that I do not quite understand why he had alluded to the fact. He then went on to say that the Papers were submitted to me and that I raised no objection to their publication. I took the liberty of giving the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) private Notice that I should ask him whether in his opinion I incurred any responsibility with respect to the publication of these Papers?

THE EARL OF DERBY: If the noble Earl wishes to put to me the question, whether I desire to attach to any one who is not a Member of the Government any part of that responsibility which falls to the person who occupies the position I now fill, I am quite ready to give an answer in the negative to that inquiry. I do not hold the noble Earl responsible for the publication of those Papers. But when I say that, I presume that the noble Earl does not mean to deny that, although not responsible for, he was cognizant of, their publication. Following the precedent of the Department over which I preside, I had the pleasure to forward the noble Earl a Copy of the Papers which were to be submitted to Parliament, inasmuch as they related to business which passed in the Department during his tenure of office there. My noble Friend received them; and he will recollect that he had the thoughtfulness and kindness to offer me a suggestion with respect to one Paper, the publication of which he thought might be injurious to the public service. That suggestion I acted upon. Although I do not answer for the accuracy of what is reported to have been stated in "another place," if any statement was made there which might lead to the belief that the noble Earl is responsible for the publication of those Papers, I am quite willing to say that he was not. What happened was this—The noble Earl was aware of the publication, and did not object to it. While I say that, I am bound to add that I do not think my noble Friend was bound to express any opinion in the matter, one way or the other. So much for the personal question. But with reference to comments which have been made on the subject of the publication itself, it appears to me that there has been a good deal of misapprehension, and therefore I hope I may be allowed to say a word or two to clear up the matter. I believe that the popular impression out-of-doors is that we published communications which were never meant to be otherwise than confidential, and very naturally the public exclaims "What a monstrous thing to do." But, my Lords, were those communications private and confidential in the ordinary sense of the word? No. If they were of that character, they would have formed part of the private correspondence of the noble Earl who preceded me in the Foreign Office, and would have been taken away with his other private correspondence. But that was not the case. They were received at the Foreign Office as coming to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs; they were registered, and they went through the usual routine observed in the case of all letters sent to the Department. They were letters on public business addressed to the head of a public Department from a person holding an important public position. Those letters form the only reference to an important transaction which we thought it essential the public should be made aware of. They are five in all, and I may mention that two were not marked with any words indicating a private or confidential character, but let me remind your Lordships—though I scarcely need remind any one who has had any experience in public affairs—that the confidential nature of a publication is in nine cases out of ten a matter of time. If, as Foreign Secretary, I were made aware of some European event which was going to occur in three or four months, it is possible that the information would be given to me in a letter or despatch marked "confidential," or "private," or "secret." It would, of course, be necessary to regard that communication as confidential for the time; but it does not follow that when the events referred to in such communications have occurred, and when the reason for secrecy is at an end, there may be any reason whatever why they should not be made public by being laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament. I do not wish your Lordships or the public out-of-doors to be under the impression that the Papers referred to by the noble Earl were published without valid reasons. They were the only reference to what undoubtedly was a very important public transaction—namely, the offer made to our Predecessors in office for the purchase of the Suez Canal. I ask your Lordships to consider how much heavier would have been our responsibility and what would have been the nature of the inferences which would have been drawn if it could have been said that while we purported to give to Parliament the whole of the Papers having reference to the Suez Canal, we suppressed a portion, and that the most important portion of all—namely, that which contains the fact that an offer had been made to our Predecessors, which they had not thought fit to accept. I think the inference to have been drawn from that would not have been of a very agreeable character. I sum up the matter in this way—In the first place, the letters were not private letters in the ordinary sense of the word; they were communications addressed to a public Department. In the next place, they were confidential at the time they were written and received; but it was for the Department in which they were registered to exercise its own discretion as to whether in five years after the whole matter to which they referred was at an end their confidential character should be maintained. If the gentleman who was so much mixed up in the matter has been in any way injured by the appearance of these documents in print I very much regret it; but looking through them since their publication with a care which I did not give to them before they had been published, I do not see anything in them which is in the least discreditable either to the writer of those communications or to the gentleman on whose conduct they comment. I cannot see anything in them in the slightest degree injurious to the character or to the interests of Sir Daniel Lange or M. de Lesseps, and though I regret the inconvenience which may have resulted from their appearance, I must repeat that I think we should have incurred a heavier responsibility and exposed ourselves to grave censure if, instead of having published these communications we had suppressed them altogether.

EARL GRANVILLE: I regret it if I should be putting your Lordships to any inconvenience; but I do not think the practice which was established last year of not allowing a reply to a Member of your Lordships' House who has merely asked a Question, will be held to apply in the present instance; but if it should be I will put myself in Order by making a Motion. Two things in the noble Earl's reply have given me satisfaction. He for one disclaims the system on the part of a Government which, when they are called on to answer for something they have done, leads them to throw the responsibility on third parties—whether ex-Ministers or others. I am also obliged to him for saying that he did not think I was bound to make any observations on the Papers submitted to me. At the same time, it occurs to me that perhaps the noble Earl left on your Lordships' minds the impression that he thought it was a pity I did not make some observations on those Papers. I am, therefore, anxious to make one or two further observations. There is an official in the Foreign Office called a précis writer. It used to be his duty to make a précis of all Papers coming to the Foreign Office which an outgoing Secretary of State might take away with him. That practice was found to be very inconvenient; and when the Foreign Office took to printing almost all the documents, the duty fell to the lot of the précis writer. He is bound to collect all the documents which had been printed and to give them to the retiring Minister. It happened that when I was leaving the Foreign Office Mr. Harvey, the précis writer, with a friendly feeling, and no doubt acting also in the discharge of what he felt to be a duty, claimed those particular Papers for me and sent them to me. I may remark, also, that all the Papers which are printed are not printed for publication. The papers which are printed on blue paper and marked "confidential," are those which are printed for the use only of the office—such was the print which I hold in my hand, and which was forwarded to me. Mr. Harvey wrote to me and said he had made this claim on my behalf, and was told that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) said that as Mr. Harvey claimed those Papers for me he was to have them; but it was clearly to be understood that it was not Lord Derby who sent them. So far, therefore, from the noble Earl sending the Papers to me for my observations as to their publication, if what I have stated to your Lordships had any meaning at all, it must have been to remind me that I had no locus standi. I read them, certainly—not for the purpose of revising them for the Foreign Office, but to see whether they went against my own recollection, which was that no definite proposal to purchase the Suez Canal had ever been made to me. In mentioning the matter to my noble Friend Lord Hartington I alluded to the message sent with those Papers; and I then said to him—"There is something in these Papers which it strikes me ought not to be published. It does not appear to me to refer to the question of the purchase of the Canal, and I should like to mention it to the Secretary of State." It was exceedingly awkward for me to do this, and I felt it to be so. I wrote to the noble Earl, but I gave my note a particular and unusual heading. I headed it "Personal and confidential," meaning thereby to show that I wrote to him, not as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but as a personal Friend. I hope the Earl has always regarded me as a personal Friend and that he will always find me one. I think I pointed out to him that the Paper to which I referred in my letter was not one which affected, either for or against the affair of the purchase of the Canal shares. Again, with regard to the Correspondence, I remember one thing—that a letter which was not sent to me at all, but which appears in page 167 of the Correspondence, was more likely to give offence to M. de Lesseps and his colleagues than any of the other letters. I beg your Lordships to remark that the noble Earl says Her Majesty's Government would not have been justified in keeping from the public the offer made to us and declined. Now, I say that Sir Daniel Lange did not make us any offer. He gave us private information as to the probability of such an offer being made; but there was no such offer. I remember, however, that almost as soon as we heard of the purchase of the Suez Canal shares, I was told by friends

—by both Conservative and Liberal Friends—that the Government would make a great point of their having been prompt in a matter in which we had shown ourselves to be dilatory. These rumours have proved not to have been without foundation, for, if I am not misinformed by the public Press, at the beginning of the debates on the subject in “another place” the Prime Minister said to Mr. Gladstone—“It is quite clear from your speech that you would not have bought the shares.” Therefore this correspondence may be supposed to bear on the possible controversy between the present and the late Government. Well, the noble Earl wrote me a kind letter, in which he thanked me for the suggestion I had made, and said he would act upon it. But if I had suggested that it was desirable to omit certain parts of the correspondence selected for publication, would he not have said, “Why, he is afraid of this being published!” It may be said that I ought to have referred to the letters which are the subject of this discussion as being marked private and confidential; but I never anticipated that the noble Earl would say that it is a defensible thing for the Department to publish without the permission of the writer letters marked “private and confidential,” and containing, not an offer, but the mere gossip of an offer—to erase “private and confidential” and make such letters public without the permission of the writer. I really think, my Lords, that I have stated enough—perhaps too much—to show that I am utterly without responsibility in connection with the publication of these letters, and that Lord Hartington in making that statement last night was perfectly justified.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I do not want to prolong this discussion, but in respect of the message which the noble Earl says he received with the Papers, I must say there was no such message from me. There must be some misapprehension on the part of my noble Friend. I apprehend that what happened was this—Some communication passed between the gentleman referred to by the noble Earl and a permanent member of the Foreign Office Staff. I repeat that I sent no such message.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have perfect confidence in Mr. Harvey and I have perfect confidence in the Private Secretary of the noble Earl also. But I have it in writing from one of those gentlemen that the claim was admitted as Mr. Harvey had made it, but Lord Derby wished it to be clearly understood that the Papers were not sent from him to me.

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES— THE CIRCULARS—INSTRUCTIONS. —PETITION.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL: My Lords, I rise to present a Petition from the General Body of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of the Three Denominations residing in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, praying for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of the Instructions recently issued by the Lords of the Admiralty to Commanders of Ships of War. My Lords, the Petitioners are well known to your Lordships as persons of great intelligence and I may say of historical celebrity. They are not members of the National Church, but they have always exercised great influence in every question which has touched the religious feeling of the country, and their voice has been always heard when anything affecting the general sentiment of humanity has been agitating the public mind. They pray for the unconditional withdrawal of the Instructions recently issued to the commanders of ships of war; and they pray thus not on the grounds of law, but on the grounds of humanity and policy—because they regard these Instructions as at variance with the principles of the British Constitution, which are the principles of freedom, and as opposed to the dictates of humanity. My Lords, in bringing this Petition under the notice of your Lordships, I shall not ask you to enter into questions of controverted law. Policy is what I ask you to consider. My Lords, as to the policy of this country and its objects in respect of the slave trade there can be no question, and that policy was never better expressed than in the gracious Speech from the Throne at the beginning of this Session. In that gracious Speech it is stated—

“The humane and enlightened policy consistently pursued by this country in putting an end to slavery within her own dependencies, and in suppressing the slave trade throughout the world, makes it important that the action of British national ships in the territorial waters of foreign States should be in harmony with these great principles."

"I have, therefore, given directions for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into all treaty engagements and other international obligations bearing upon this subject, and all instructions from time to time issued to my naval officers, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for my ships and commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty."

Now, my Lords, the question which I submit to you is this—Are the Instructions to which the Petition refers in harmony with that statement in the Queen's Speech? That passage in the Speech from the Throne announces that a Royal Commission is about to be appointed. And what is that Royal Commission to do? Not to find for us a policy, for England in respect of slavery has no need to seek for a policy, but with the purpose of ascertaining what is the best mode of carrying our policy out. Will those Instructions conduce to that end or not? The first question that presents itself to one's mind is this:—Is it consistent, is it natural, to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into all treaty engagements and other international obligations bearing on the subject, and all Instructions from time to time issued to naval officers, and at the same moment to lay down positive Instructions on which these officers are to act? If those Instructions had been an exceptional regulation—if they had been framed to meet a particular difficulty—if at some particular place there had been some great pressure, or if there had been some urgent necessity for terrible haste—one could understand the framing of such Instructions pending the inquiry and Report of the Royal Commission; but these Instructions are general, their application is universal, and it cannot be said that the occasion which is said to have called them forth was very pressing, seeing that the note from India remained in the Foreign Office more than 12 months before the issue of the first of those Slave Trade Circulars. When you have recourse to a Royal Commission you thereby acknowledge that your mind is not made up, or that you are in search of enlightenment and instruction. Why, then issue Instructions which are not confined to ships in the Persian Gulf, but apply to all Her Majesty's ships, whether in territorial waters or on the high seas? Are these orders to be regarded as a convenience to experienced naval officers? Have your Lordships ever heard of such expressions as these from an experienced naval officer?—

"He heard with great regret that explanations or involved instructions had been drawn up, which would do away with the clear notion held by naval officers up to the time of the issuing of the recent Circulars. If it had been necessary to issue special instructions with regard to India, the Persian Gulf, and Zanzibar, they might have been of a local character, and applicable only to each particular case. He hoped that the operation of the Circular would be postponed, that the subject would be referred to a Royal Commission, and that naval officers would be allowed to act, as they had done for 37 years, without producing any international complication."

It is, in fact, "darkening counsel by words without knowledge" to issue this Circular when you are appointing a Commission to inquire what the Instructions should be. My Lords, I have not entered, and I shall not enter, into any question of law. Those Instructions have been drawn by a master hand, and I am not going to assert that any fault could be found with them as directly infringing on the principles of International Law: but, my Lords, I am bound to say that the policy embodied in those Instructions is not the policy of the country, and that it is not the policy of this country to maintain them. What is International Law? It is not, like municipal law, altered by the debates or even by the Acts of Parliament. But it is not stereotyped. It grows, occulto velut arbor ævo. It is the consensus of civilized nations, and it becomes more beneficent, as civilized nations advance in civilization: and it is our duty to be ever in the van, promoting by our example, our influence, and our authority, that advance; and had we been as free at the beginning of the century as we now are to exercise this power, International Law would have been in a more advanced position in respect of slavery than it is at this moment—far more favourable to the slave and far less fettered by technical distinctions and difficulties. But the country has done much. It paid millions to redeem the slaves in its own Colonies; it has made great efforts to suppress the slave trade; and, following its example, two powerful nations—the United States of America and the Empire of Russia—

Viscount Cardwell

have abolished slavery in their dominions; and the object of the Royal Commission must assuredly be to point out the way in which the greatest progress can be made to establish freedom throughout the world. The time is therefore one of special importance, offering peculiar opportunities for the successful promotion of our beneficent policy. But what are these Instructions? It may be said that they are only for commanders of vessels in territorial waters. But that is a mistake. They deal with the open sea—and I object to the way in which they deal with the open sea. Did any one ever before hear of any distinction between a slave and a free man on the open sea aboard a British ship? For the first time that I know of those Instructions introduce that distinction. They contain this passage—

“When any person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave seeks admission to your ship on the high seas, beyond the limit of territorial waters, and claims the protection of the British flag, you will bear in mind that, although Her Majesty’s Government are desirous by every means in their power to remove or mitigate the evils of slavery, yet Her Majesty’s ships are not intended for the reception of persons other than their officers and crew. You will satisfy yourself, therefore, before receiving the fugitive on board, that there is some sufficient reason in the particular case for thus receiving him.”

Now, with regard to territorial waters, what is the British officer told to do?—

“Within the territorial waters of a foreign State you are bound, by the comity of nations, while maintaining the proper exemption of your ship from local jurisdiction, not to allow her to become a shelter for those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place. If, therefore, while your ship is within the territorial waters of a State where slavery exists, a person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave seeks admission into your ship, you will not admit him, unless his life would be in manifest danger if he were not received on board. Should you, in order to save him from this danger, receive him, you ought not, after the danger is past, to permit him to continue on board; but you will not entertain any demand for his surrender, or enter into any examination as to his status.”

Now I say that this is not a matter of law but of policy. The assertion you make in that article of the Instructions admits that you are asserting rights of your own, in which you are perfectly independent of any obligation to any other nation: the concession that you make, therefore, is a voluntary one. It does not speak the voice of the British people, and you had no right to make it. It is at variance with the spirit of British policy, and cannot be approved by the British Parliament. The British officer is not to admit the slave on board his ship unless the life of that slave would be in manifest danger if he were not so admitted. Is that a humane policy? There may be other reasons which would be as important as the question of life. There are many other dangers which are more likely to happen to the slave than that of having his life taken by his owner. It is not, perhaps, often that a slaveowner desires to take the life of his slave; but there are things which even the slave may prefer to life itself. I read lately of a dreadful massacre in Cuba that was caused by an attack on the honour of a woman. Is it deliberately intended in a case in which a wife says—“My honour has been attacked,” and in which the husband says—“Cruel chastisement awaits me for resistance to that attack,” that the commander of a ship should say—“A short time ago I might have interfered to save you; but now I cannot receive you, because your life is not in manifest danger, and I have received new Instructions drawn up by the highest authority, by the Cabinet of the Queen, which peremptorily prohibit me?” Take the case of political offenders. Would you venture to incorporate in your regulations as to political refugees these Instructions which you have issued in the case of slaves? If Poerio had made his escape from the Neapolitan prison would you have had any British commander say to him that he would not receive him because his life was not in manifest danger? What harm would any one suffer if the prayer of this Petition were acceded to and these Instructions were withdrawn? If the country were to awake to-morrow morning and find that they had been withdrawn would any one be the worse? Would the Government be the worse? Would it be displeasing to their supporters? Mr. Pitt used to complain of Mr. Wilberforce that he would only support him when he was in the right; but he wanted his support most when he was in the wrong. The present Government have better supporters than Mr. Wilberforce. They have just given that most indisputable proof of a strong Government, a large majority composed of most reluctant supporters. He found that one of those who usually acted with them, though he could not give his personal vote, was reported to have used this language in the other House of Parliament—

“They were all of one opinion that slavery was a bad thing; but if there was a division party organization would come into play, the Liberals would go into one lobby and the Conservatives into another, and the impression would consequently get abroad that the Liberals were the friends of the slave, and the Conservatives his enemies. Now, he had a strong objection to being placed in a false position. He did not want to argue this question on petty considerations. They had had rather too much of that lately. Let them try to decide so as not to be hard on the slave nor uncivil to their neighbours. The truth was, they were all of one mind; they all wanted to do the same thing if they could only find a clever fellow to teach them how to do it. He thought the Government was in danger of finding itself in a false position. They had issued the Circular, and now they were going to appoint a Commission, the meaning of which was that they wanted more information. Well, if information was wanted, let them suspend the Circular. They issued the Circular, although they were in want of information. That was a dilemma out of which he should be glad to hear the ingenious Prime Minister extricate himself. He knew he was on dangerous ground, but he must say that there were a good many men on that side of the House who did not like that business, and who did not quite see their way to sanctioning the Circular. He did not wish to attach any blame to Her Majesty's Ministers. He believed they wanted to do what was right. But why should they not leave this matter to their Naval officers? He did not like the Circular. It had an ugly hard sound about it, and he could not see why it should not be withdrawn.”

Would the commanders of ships be the worse for the withdrawal of the Instructions? We know from their own statements that they would be in a better position. Would the Royal Commissioners be the worse for it? Certainly not, for they would pursue their inquiry in a fuller and a broader light without the darkening shadow of the Instructions. Would the British Crown be the worse for it? No. By having these Instructions withdrawn they would advance the cause of freedom, which we all have so much at heart, and clear the way for making International Law on this subject more in accordance with the doctrines which it has been our pride to see this country uphold. I believe that if the Government would accept the prayer of this Petition they would gratify their own supporters, they would facilitate the efforts of British commanders, they would elevate the honour of the British Crown and greatly advance the cause of freedom, which is dear to men of all parties in this country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I cannot express any surprise that the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) should have taken this opportunity of bringing before your Lordships a subject which has deeply entered the public mind; I should not have been surprised if it had, even at an earlier period, occupied your Lordships' attention. And I am free to admit that no body of men could with greater consistency and greater propriety present themselves as Petitioners to your Lordships' House to make their view of the subject known than those whose Petition has been presented by the noble Viscount. But, my Lords, we must bear in mind that there are more questions than one which have to be considered with reference to the prayer of this Petition. My noble Friend has touched upon those in succession, and I am going to follow the lines which he has marked out. But, my Lords, I only request one thing of your Lordships—that the different points to which he has adverted may be kept perfectly distinct. The noble Viscount raised the question first of all—“What is the need of Instructions at all?” He has raised the question also—“What is the character of the Instructions which as an act of administration ought to have been issued?” And he has raised a third and, I think, a larger question than either of the first two—“What is the policy which this country ought to pursue in a matter deeply connected with that abolition of slavery which we all desire.” I will take each of those questions in succession.

First, my noble Friend suggests—“Was there any necessity for the issue of this Circular?” My Lords, the question is very easily answered. The Indian Government—the Governor General of India and his Council—informed Her Majesty's Government of these very important facts. They told Her Majesty's Government that the necessity had arisen for distinct Instructions to be given on the subject to the commanders of Her Majesty's ships; and they told Her Majesty's Government—what was more important—that they themselves had issued Instructions which would remain in force till the final Instructions should have been issued by Her Majesty's Government. Let me remind your Lordships what our Resident in the Persian Gulf said—

"4. I would respectfully suggest that in the present state of the Slave Trade question it would be satisfactory to have some definite instructions from Government as to what class of slaves are entitled to receive protection on board British ships, as in both the cases mentioned in this letter the slaves who received protection seemed, without doubt, to come under the head of domestic slaves, and if domestic slaves are allowed to receive protection on board every English ship they come across, the owners will be great losers, and the pearl fishing will come to a standstill, as nearly all the divers belong to that class."

That was the view taken by the Resident of the Persian Gulf. But the noble Viscount asks why was it necessary to go beyond the locality—the Persian Gulf—in laying down rules? It was for this reason—that it is in that locality and along the Eastern Coast of Africa, almost in the same neighbourhood, that the whole or nearly the whole question as regards the slave trade arises. But there was this more important consideration for the Government. I will not trouble your Lordships by examining the Instructions issued by the Indian Government; but when they came to be examined by us, it was perfectly obvious that they were Instructions which could not be maintained. Under these circumstances Her Majesty's Government considered they had no option but to issue, as a matter of administration, a Circular that could be maintained. I need not say that no Department would have desired, except under the pressure of absolute necessity, to codify all the Circulars and Instructions on the subject; but the Government felt that they would be shrinking from their duty if, while being of opinion that the Indian Instructions were such as could not be maintained, they did not respond to the request of the Indian Government.

I now come to the second question—"What was the character of the Instructions which, as an act of administration, it was right for the Government to issue?" And I will ask your Lordships to keep that question entirely free from the question of policy—from the consideration of what, if our hands had been free, was the policy in this matter which we should have desired to have pursued. I conceive that the first duty incumbent on us in answering this question is thoroughly to understand the principle on which the freedom of public ships is regulated by International Law. The noble Viscount points out that the Circular to which he has referred treats not merely of the position of ships in territorial waters, but also of the position of ships on the high seas. I must say a word or two as to that part which treats of the position of ships on the high seas, because it has been greatly misapprehended. I am not sure that I caught correctly the objection that the noble Viscount took to it, but as I understood him it was that, as regards ships on the high seas, the Circular threw upon the commander the duty to discriminate as to whether the person claiming protection was a slave or not. I am surprised that there should be any question on that point. The provision is in favour of the person escaping from slavery. The object is to point out to commanders of Her Majesty's ships that it is not sufficient merely to receive the slave on board and give him the protection of the British flag for the moment, but that his duty is not discharged unless he keeps the slave on board or puts him on shore at a place where his liberty will be respected. That is the object of that portion of the Circular.

I pass from that, and come to what is a more serious question—"What is the position of public ships in the territorial waters of a foreign State?" The noble Viscount refers to the question of International Law. I will say this for International Law—there is no mystery whatever about International Law. It is simply a matter of common sense, and everyone of your Lordships is just as competent to judge of a principle of International Law as a Lawyer is. There is no magic about it; there is no technical procedure. It is simply a question to which the common sense of anybody may be applied. Now, I will state to your Lordships what I conceive to be the position of a public ship in foreign territorial waters; but I wish to say that, as far as I am concerned, I am as anxious as anyone can be to maintain the complete exemption of our national ships from foreign jurisdiction. There is no country in the world so much interested in that doctrine as Great Britain, and I am anxious to maintain it to its fullest extent. But, my Lords, another doctrine has been raised in the course of this discussion which I, at least, cannot give my assent to. This is the doctrine which has been called the doctrine of extra-territoriality; and when that doctrine comes to be interpreted it is represented to be this—that a national ship is a part of the land of England, and that wherever she goes she carries with her so much of English land, with all the consequences which may attend it. My Lords, I must beg leave to doubt the accuracy of that proposition. I believe it to be a metaphor, and I believe it to be a metaphor eminently calculated to mislead. Let me ask your Lordships to subject that doctrine—for you will find it has a very important bearing—to one or two very simple tests. It is said that an English public ship, wherever she goes, is part of the English soil. Now, remember that whatever is the position of a ship in this respect, exactly the same is the position of the Ambassador's house. The same protection which is thrown around a public ship of war is thrown around also the residence of an Ambassador in a foreign country. I should like to ask of those who maintain that a ship is part of the English soil this question—If a child of foreign parents were to be born on board an English national ship in a foreign harbour or in the house of an Ambassador, would that child be born within the allegiance of the Queen of England? I should like to ask another question. Suppose that in the Bay of Rio Janeiro, and on board one of our public ships, a marriage were to be solemnized between two Brazilians which was valid according to the Brazilian law, would it be invalid because ceremonies required by the English law were not performed? I apprehend no person can maintain any such doctrine. But I will ask another question. Suppose that in an Ambassador's house an assault were to be committed by one foreigner upon another, or a murder were to be committed by one foreigner upon another, will anyone contend that that is a subject for the jurisdiction of the Courts of England, or that because the Ambassador's house or a ship is English soil, the Courts of the country are not the proper Courts to have jurisdiction? Your Lordships will find this to be of so much importance that I will take the liberty of asking you to allow me to read one extract from one of the authorities on this subject. Mr. Dana, in a note to Wheaton's works, says—

"The subject of diplomatic immunity of person and place has been obscured by the use of the phrase 'extra-territoriality.' Treating this figure of speech as a fact, and reasoning logically from it, have led to results of an unsatisfactory and impracticable character. . . . A clear understanding of these questions requires that the phrase should be treated as a figure of speech, and not a fact from which inferences can be drawn. The true test is one lying behind and clear of that illustration. The whole subject depends upon this principle—the convenience of nations."

That I think will suffice for authority across the Atlantic. I will venture to quote from an author at home, and I am glad to use the authority of a learned friend of mine, a colleague of mine upon the Bench—one whose judgments and whose writings upon International Law I will venture to say reflect honour upon this country—I mean Sir Robert Phillimore. What does he say? He asks—

"Upon what grounds is this exemption allowed? Not upon the possession on behalf of the Sovereign in virtue of his sovereignty of a right to this exemption; such a right on his part would be incompatible with the right of the territorial Sovereign; and not as it is sometimes carelessly said, upon the ground that he and his property are to be considered as still remaining in his own territory. This is, indeed, the fiction of law expressed in the term 'ex-territoriality,' by which the nature of the immunity is illustrated; but it is illogical and inaccurate to consider it as the ground of that immunity."

It is in the knowledge of many of your Lordships that a practice prevailed in the last century, of treating an Ambassador's house as a place of refuge, as an asylum, upon the notion that it had some peculiar sanctity, as so much of the land to which the Ambassador belonged, but the practice has been long since reprobated by the common consent of all nations. I have seen this doctrine as to extra-territoriality supported upon the authority of one who is said to be a most distinguished jurist, as well as an able, practical sailor—namely, M. Ortolan. It is always an unfortunate course, to take and roll two men into one. The distinguished jurist M. Ortolan is not a sailor, and the distinguished sailor M. Ortolan is not a jurist. They are brothers. They are both very eminent in their way, but with regard to the sailor I must take the liberty of saying that, although he has written a book of extreme ability and of very great interest, there are many propositions in it which I think it would not be quite safe to rely upon, one of these being the same proposition which has been so much alluded to—that every national ship is so much of the ground of the country which she comes from. But even M. Ortolan, when he comes to consider cases which may arise on board ship, finds that his own doctrine requires to be considerably modified, and this is the view which he takes in that case. He says—

“We must also remark the striking difference which in reality exists between the territory of a State and the deck of a ship moored in the waters of a foreign Power. The confined space of the ship, the small population it carries, its limited means of providing for this population, the necessities, so multiplied and rigorous, of its discipline and service, all these prevent any comparison, as regards the introduction of a stranger, with the case of a real territory. To this consideration, if we add that when a ship of war is in the port or territorial waters of a foreign State, it is really within a district subject to the ownership or sovereignty of that State; that if, in its character of a ship of war, it then enjoys an absolute immunity, this immunity cannot be claimed as a personal right by refugees on board; that if it is true that these refugees are on board, it is true also that they are still in the port or territorial waters of those to whose coercive power they are amenable—we must conclude from all these observations, while we maintain the inviolability of a ship of war, over which the local authorities have no control, that the refugee who has taken shelter is not absolutely in the same situation as if he had taken refuge in the territory of the State to which the ship belongs.”

I trouble your Lordships with these observations because it is very much better to disembarass the case of the comments that have been made in many quarters, and which have attracted considerable attention. Now what is the real reason why you maintain that a ship of war has peculiar, exceptional privileges in the territorial waters of foreign Powers? I apprehend that reason is clearly and distinctly this—that a national ship enters the territorial waters of a foreign Power subject to two implied engagements. I say implied engagements, because they are engagements which may be modified, which may be altered, but which cannot be altered without distinct notice. One is an engagement on the part of the Power whose waters she enters that she and all those on board of her shall be free from foreign processes; and the other is an implied engagement on the part of the ship that she will neither herself violate nor aid those who desire to violate the law, whatever it may be, of the foreign State. Your Lordships will then, I think see the importance of bearing in mind these principles when we come to speak of the policy of this country. Mr. Justice Story says—

“In the case of the Exchange the grounds of the exemption of public ships were fully discussed and expounded. It was there shown that it was not founded upon any notion that a foreign Sovereign had an absolute right, in virtue of his Sovereignty, to an exemption of his property from the local jurisdiction of another Sovereign, when it came within his territory; for that would be to give him sovereign power beyond the limits of his own Empire. But it stands upon principles of public comity and convenience, and arises from the presumed consent or licence of nations, that foreign public ships coming into their ports, and demeaning themselves according to law and in a friendly manner, shall be exempt from the local jurisdiction. . . . It would indeed be strange if a licence implied by law from the general practice of nations for the purposes of peace should be construed as a licence to do wrong to the nation itself, and justify the breach of all those obligations which good faith and friendship, by the same implication, impose upon those who seek an asylum in our ports.”

My Lords, I apprehend that is a principle founded upon common sense. There is no obligation on the part of a ship of war to go into a foreign port, and there is no obligation on the part of a foreign State to admit a ship of war into its ports, except upon the terms which are implied by International Law; and until something is done to alter these terms they are conditions upon which, according to International Law, ships of war shall enter foreign ports. I should like, with your Lordships' permission, to add one further authority—which, I think, is a very important one—to those I have already mentioned. I have no doubt that your Lordships have read, as I have often read, with the greatest interest the letters upon International Law which have appeared in The Times, bearing the signature of “Historicus.” I am relieved from the trouble of surmising who is the author of those letters, because I find that in the Report of the Naturalization Commission the curtain is drawn aside, and that it is stated in the appendix that the name of “Historicus” represents Sir William Harcourt. I know of nothing connected with those letters of which Sir William Harcourt may not well be proud, and all the letters which have appeared under that name will, I believe, take their place in future treaties on International Law. I am going to take the liberty of referring to one of those letters, which certainly deals in the closest way with the question which we are now considering. What is the view which Sir William Harcourt takes as to the present state of International Law on this question?—and I beg your Lordships to observe particularly that my observations at this moment are limited to that point. As to the present practice of this country with reference to the obligations which are imposed upon ships of war in foreign ports, Sir William Harcourt says—

“It may be said this is all very well in law, but in practice are public ships to go about to foreign ports, and then, having accepted their hospitality, to render themselves public nuisances? Certainly not. No one contends that a ship of war is to hold itself out as an asylum for foreign runagates from justice, or even from slavery. A captain should not make his ship a receiving-house for fugitive slaves any more than for runaway criminals or smugglers, or stolen goods. I should imagine that a man fit to command a Queen’s ship does not need to be told this. The Admiralty Regulations already contain an injunction as to the conduct of captains in foreign ports, amply sufficient to warn them against conduct which may give umbrage to the Government or the people of the place where they anchor. If any further Instructions were required (which I greatly doubt), they should have been exactly the opposite to those given in the Circular; instead of ordering the slaves to be surrendered after they had been received, the direction should have been not to receive them, because they could not be surrendered. . . . What the captain has a right to do, and ought to do, is to give instructions to the officers of the watch and the sentry not to admit any person on board his ship whose reception he has reason to think will give offence to the authorities of the place where he is lying. This is a duty, not of law, but of courtesy. . . . No one has any right on board a Queen’s ship, whether in an English or a foreign port, without the leave of the captain. He has entire right to determine whom he will receive, or exclude, or remove. The objects for which a man-of-war exists, and the necessities of discipline, require this. He has, therefore, a right which would not exist in ordinary cases on shore to forbid access or to order the removal of strangers. The ship of war is like a fortress; it requires no Alien Act to authorize an exclusion from it.”

My Lords, I cannot pass by that letter without observing that it appears to have excited “elsewhere” a good deal of attention; and, if I remember aright, the author of it said that he regarded the letter himself with the greatest interest, because it had appeared only 24 hours before the Government withdrew the first Circular. Had that been the case, it would certainly have been a remarkable circumstance; but I must say that I think it important that, where circumstances are remarkable and may perhaps become the foundation of future history, we ought to endeavour to narrate them as accurately as we can. The memory of Sir William Harcourt is not strictly accurate in this matter. It is quite true that there was a lapse of 24 hours between the withdrawal of the first Circular and the publication of his letter; but the withdrawal of the Circular came first, and it was not until 24 hours afterwards that his letter appeared. The Cabinet met on the 4th of November and it was then determined that the Circular should be withdrawn. The notice that the Circular was withdrawn was circulated on that day, and that notice appeared in the morning papers of the 5th of November, together with the letter of Sir William Harcourt. It is none the worse letter for that; but, at all events, it was not the cause of the withdrawal of the first Circular.

But I pass from that point, and I now proceed to ask your Lordships this question—supposing that these authorities to which I have referred are accurate, and supposing that the view put forth in the letter of Sir William Harcourt is accurate, I do not ask on what we should endeavour to shape our policy in the future on this question, but I do ask, what is the limit which is to restrict the active administration of a Government that desires to act by the law as it stands at the present time? I apprehend that such a Government has one of two alternatives before it. It has the alternative, if it receives slaves on board its ships in territorial waters within the jurisdiction of slave-owning States, of being called upon to surrender them; or it has the alternative of refusing to receive slaves on board its ships under such circumstances, lest it should be called upon to surrender them. In my humble judgment Her Majesty’s Government chose the right of these alternatives, and not the wrong, when they determined that we should not receive slaves on board our ships in such circumstances, because we could not submit to surrender them. This question does not turn upon the dry subtleties of International Law. The Government, in endeavouring to ascertain what should be the nature of the Instructions it was bound to issue, had to take as its guide not merely the rules of International Law, but our own engagements with foreign countries and the practice of past years. In speaking of our engagements with foreign countries I am not referring merely to our treaty engagements; in fact, I am not referring to the treaties we have entered into at all, but to the representations and to the promises which we have held out on this subject to foreign Powers. I am going to refer your Lordships to the Instructions which have for many years been issued to the captains of Her Majesty's ships. I do not say that it may not be right in the future to limit and to qualify those Instructions, but I wish to point to them as they stand at the present and have stood during the last 30 years, during which time the noble Viscount says the conduct of this country on this question was entirely satisfactory. Those Instructions are as follows:—

"The captains of such of Her Majesty's ships as visit foreign ports or places are to take especial care to avoid all possible cause of offence or dissatisfaction to the official authorities, or to the inhabitants; and they are to cause all those under their orders to show due deference to the established rights, ceremonies, customs, and regulations of such places, and to conciliate, as far as possible, the good-will and respect of the inhabitants."

Now, my Lords, I ask your Lordships, what does that Instruction upon which out captains have hitherto been ordered to act require from them? Does it require them, when their ships are in the harbours of domestic slave-owning States, to hold out their ships as refuges open for fugitive slaves? I maintain that it is impossible that such a course of action would be sanctioned by this Instruction. But that is not the only Instruction which has been issued on this subject. Let us look at the Instruction that was issued during the Government of one who has certainly thoroughly understood the feeling of this country on the subject of slavery—I mean Lord Palmerston. This was the Instruction that was issued by his Government—

"You will endeavour to make engagements for the suppression of the slave trade with those native chiefs on the coast of Africa with whom no such engagements are subsisting."

Now, what is to be the inducement held out to these slave-holding States for entering into these engagements?—because it must be borne in mind that we are entering month after month, and year after year, into these engagements, founded on these Instructions, with the petty slave-owning States on the coast of Africa. The following is the Instruction on this point:—

"You will impress upon the natives the earnest desire of Great Britain for the improvement of their condition, and will very clearly point out to them the distinction between the export of slaves, which Great Britain is determined to put down, and the system of domestic slavery, with which she does not claim to interfere."

I say, change these Instructions for the future, if you like, but, as a matter of fair dealing, you must act up to them for the present. The noble Viscount said—"Look at your practice with regard to refugees; you have opened your ships to them, why should you not do so to the slaves? Why not put the slave at least as high as the refugee?" But the greatest and most important occasions when refugees are received on board our ships are when civil war is actually raging in their country, and then we receive them, not under the rules of International Law, but when the bonds of society are dissolved, and when the laws are silent in the midst of arms. What have been the Instructions given to commanders of Her Majesty's ships with reference to the reception of refugees on board their vessels? On the 24th of May, 1870, the Earl of Clarendon wrote to Mr. Thornton in consequence of an application which had been made to him by the Government of the United States in reference to a case of this kind, and his Instruction was one of great importance as affecting the position of British Ministers and Consuls in foreign countries relatively to the granting of asylum in consulates to political refugees. Lord Clarendon wrote as follows:—

"Sir,—I have read your despatch, No. 103, of the 14th of March last, acquainting me that Mr. Fish had requested you to invite the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the difficulties which are constantly arising in certain Spanish-American countries, owing to the prevailing custom of granting asylum to political refugees in the houses of foreign diplomatic or consular agents in those countries, and stating that, with a view of putting a termination to this custom, Mr. Fish has suggested that the Governments of three or four principal countries, such as France and Germany, Great Britain and the United States, should combine in instructing their agents to refuse to receive refugees into their houses, and that they should take steps for causing these instructions to be made public. I have, in reply, to state to you that you were correct in informing Mr. Fish that you and other representatives of Great Britain in foreign countries had been instructed that the practice of granting an asylum to political refugees was considered to be highly objectionable, inasmuch as it must have a tendency to compromise the diplomatic agents and involve them in disagreeable discussions. These instructions must be strictly adhered to, but some discretion must be left to Her Majesty's Ministers and Consuls in urgent cases, where lives may be saved, not only at the moment, but by giving time for reflection to the victorious party. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the grant of asylum to political refugees, whether in British Missions or Consulates, especially in countries where its exercise is not complained of, should be made with extreme caution, but voluntarily to abjure the practice seems to them to be neither necessary nor humane.—I am,

“CLARENDON.”

It is clear from this Instruction that at the date of Lord Clarendon's despatch there was no general or unlimited practice, as far as political refugees are concerned.

But what are the facts with regard to fugitive slaves? Before entering upon this branch of the question permit me to say that it is not my intention to make any charges against previous Governments with reference to their conduct of these questions. I shall not do this, because I believe that these Governments have acted in the way they thought best calculated to promote the repression of slavery and to improve the condition of the slave populations in various parts of the world. In the Papers which have been laid before Parliament six cases relating to this particular question are mentioned as having occurred during a period of more than 30 years; and I would particularly ask your Lordships' attention to the number of cases and the length of time over which the occurrences extend, lest, owing to the fact that so few cases are mentioned, it should be supposed that no others arose. As matter of fact, these were the only cases which reached the point of what I may call “remonstrance,” and I shall refer to them because, when a case of the kind is submitted to the authorities at home, and their opinion is pronounced, that opinion governs a large number of other cases which are not, and do not require to be, submitted to the Government for the pronouncement of opinions or decisions concerning them. I will commence with a case which occurred in 1837, when Lord Palmerston was Foreign Minister. In that year a negro slave escaped and got on board one of Her Majesty's ships (the Rodney) in Havannah. The captain of the ship restored the slave to his owner on demand made; and Lord Palmerston wrote to Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon, and also to the captain of the vessel, expressing approval of the course which had been taken. The next case occurred in 1851, when a negro escaped from Brazil and got on board one of Her Majesty's ships. An inquiry was at once set on foot in order to ascertain whether the slave had been recently imported—and this was done because, in 1845, the Brazilian Government had entered into a Treaty under which they bound themselves not to import any additional slaves. The slave in question, having been imported later than 1845, was not surrendered for the reason that, by so importing him, the Brazilian Government had broken their Treaty; but if he had been imported before that date he would have been surrendered as being a domestic slave. The next case is one which came under the notice of Lord Clarendon in 1856. Two slaves having sought refuge on board a British merchant ship at Rio de Janeiro, Lord Clarendon ordered that they should be given up, remarking that if the men had got on board one of Her Majesty's ships of war the case would have been different. The third case to which I shall call attention shows the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in more recent times. In 1869 the Government of Mozambique complained that Captain Sullivan, of Her Majesty's ship Daphne, had received two domestic slaves on board, and, as the result of an inquiry instituted by Lord Clarendon, Captain Sullivan was censured; in addition to which Instructions were issued in order to prevent the recurrence of similar events. Those Instructions were couched in the following terms:—

“Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships of war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape—that is to say, within three miles of the shore—should be returned to the owners.”

We had some conversation the other night as to whether the noble Earl who was lately Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) was acquainted with this decision; and the noble Earl stated that though he forwarded these Papers soon after his accession to office, he did not know what was contained in them—and indeed the noble Earl represented the matter as one of ordinary practice and routine. What is the inference to be drawn from this statement? If the course taken by Lord Clarendon was entirely new, is it not fair to assume that the noble Lord (Lord Hammond), whom I see seated behind the noble Earl (Earl Granville), and who was for many years permanent Under Secretary at the Foreign Office, would have informed the noble Earl, on his accession to office, as to the circumstances of the case, and would have asked him whether he endorsed the policy of Lord Clarendon? I take it that he would have done this as a matter of course if the whole transaction had not been one of routine. The next case is one concerning certain slaves who escaped from Madagascar in 1869, and got on board one of Her Majesty's ships (the Dryad). The Consul in that place, writing on the question as it arose at the time to the head of the Foreign Office, expressed himself as follows:—

The Lord Chancellor

“The point which I have had to decide involves a very important question of right—namely, Whether the commanders of British cruisers are justified in receiving on board their vessels, in Malagasy waters, slaves escaped from the shore, and in granting to such slaves the protection of the British flag; and I shall, therefore, be glad to learn that my opinion that such right extends only to slaves introduced to Madagascar from beyond the sea since the conclusion of the English Treaty, and not to domestic slaves, is approved by your Lordship and held to be sound in a legal point of view.”

I now come to the case of the Nymph, in which it was complained that two slaves swam to the ship and had been taken on board and carried off. Well, Sir Leopold Heath presented his view of that matter to Lord Clarendon, and it was a directly opposite view; so that, in fact, Lord Clarendon had two contradictory views before him. Sir Leopold Heath said that—

“Every man who put his foot upon English soil became ipso facto free, and that the deck of an English man-of-war was British territory; but that, as England waged war against the slave trade only, and not against domestic slavery, it was possible that compensation should be made to the owners of slaves escaping on board our ships and retained there.”

Now, these were two opposite opinions; and what was the decision of Lord Clarendon?—and when I say Lord Clarendon, I say so because he was at the head of the Department. But it was quite impossible that a despatch of that importance to the commanders of Government ships could be regarded as coming from him alone—it must have been approved by the First Lord of the Admiralty: and, in point of fact, we find that the Secretary to the Admiralty a day or two afterwards forwards the despatch, with the approval of the Admiralty, to its destination. It was not, therefore, a merely departmental decision of Lord Clarendon, but was the solemn decision of the Government of the day. And what does it say—

“Foreign Office, January 6, 1870.

“I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th ult., enclosing a letter from the commander of Her Majesty's Naval Forces on the East Coast of Africa relative to the complaints preferred against the commanders of Her Majesty's ships Nymph and Dryad by the Hova authorities, with regard to their proceedings in carrying off and then liberating certain domestic slaves at Majunga, who swam off to those vessels to escape from their masters, and in destroying certain slave dhows at the same port, and I am to state to you in reply, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that Lord Clarendon conceives that the commanders of Her Majesty's ships Nymph and Dryad were not justified in sailing away with the slaves in question in the manner above set forth. The status of slavery being acknowledged and lawful in Madagascar, the Commander of a British ship-of-war is not borne out in depriving the inhabitants of slaves who are rightfully their property, and the owners of such slaves are plainly entitled to compensation from us for the losses incurred at our hands by their abduction. If a British cruiser were at sea beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Madagascar, and slaves on shore were to seize a boat to escape to the British ship, the case would be different, and we might then fairly decline to surrender persons received on board under such circumstances; it is, however, impossible to approve the conduct of Her Majesty's officers in cases like the present, the facts of which simply amount to the entry into the waters of a friendly Power of a British ship, and to her depriving the subjects of that Power of their lawful property. Such a course can, moreover, have no other effect than to indispose the natives and authorities towards us, and would in all probability tend to prevent their carrying out their engagements for the suppression of the slave trade.”—(No. 21.)

Now, my Lords, these are the cases before your Lordships. You have now heard what I consider to be, in the first place, the present view of International Law; in the next place, the character of the representations and engagements we have made with foreign countries; and, in the last place, cases which have occurred in practice at the Foreign Office. And your Lordships will bear in mind that, with regard to the most prominent of those cases, every one of them has led to communications of the decisions of our Government to the foreign Power—Portugal, Spain, Madagascar, as the case might be—conveying to them representations of the principles on which this country was prepared to act. I am not now dealing with policy, but with acts of administration, and I contend that if it was necessary for the Government of the day to issue Instructions, they took a course which was most in favour of the slave. They declined to follow the practice of surrendering the slave which has hitherto been acted upon, and adopted the milder and better alternative of not receiving, except he were in danger, a slave on board, lest it might raise the difficult and invidious question of whether they were bound afterwards to surrender the slave.

But now, my Lords, I come to what in my judgment is a simpler and I also think a much more agreeable task. I come to consider the question—what is the policy which this country ought to pursue, and how she ought to pursue it. The noble Viscount did no more than justice to the Government when he quoted the passage he read from the most gracious Speech of Her Majesty. I desire, also, to advert to it as expressing the policy which on this subject Her Majesty's Government wishes to pursue. My noble Friend read the earlier part of the paragraph—

“The humane and enlightened policy consistently pursued by this country in putting an end to slavery within her own dependencies, and in suppressing the Slave Trade throughout the world, makes it important that the action of British National ships in the territorial waters of Foreign States should be in harmony with these great principles.”

That is the policy which Her Majesty's Government wish to pursue. The Speech proceeds—

“I have, therefore, given directions for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into all Treaty engagements and other International obligations bearing upon this subject, and all instructions from time to time issued to my naval officers, with a view to ascertain”—

The Lord Chancellor

not what the law is; we do not want to inquire into that; not what the practice is, for the purpose of following that practice—what we want to ascertain is—

“whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for my ships and their Commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty.”

My Lords, if Her Majesty's Government were satisfied with the state of things now existing, they would not have placed those words in the mouth of Her Majesty, and they would not have issued the Commission. If we had been satisfied with the state of things which has hitherto prevailed, we had only to follow that state of things. But we were not satisfied with and we desired to alter that state of things, and, further, we desired to know how best and how safest that alteration could be made. But it is not for a Government, and it is not for a Department of a Government, on a great question of this kind, connected with and involving International Law—our relations with other countries—it may be involving the existence even of municipal law—it is not for a Government, or a Department of a Government, of itself to change its policy in a matter of this kind.

My Lords, the noble Viscount referred to the history of dealings with slavery in this country, and he said with great truth that the practice and the law on this subject were not at any one moment to be stereotyped. I gladly repeat those words. My Lords, the history of the progress of this country in its dealings with slavery is about one of the most instructive and interesting histories that any person can peruse, and I ask leave to say that the progress of our action with regard to slavery is one of the highest glories of Christianity and of that civilization of which Christianity was the harbinger and the pioneer. Let me remind you of what it was. It is not much more than 100 years ago that one of the great public writers of Europe, to whose works at this day we still refer, announced it as his opinion as a matter of International Law that, however much the practice had fallen into desuetude, it was the absolute right of those who conquered in war to reduce the people whom they conquered into a state of slavery. About the same time—within a few years of it—we find one who filled with great lustre the seat I now un-worthily occupy joining with another counsel nearly equally eminent, and pronouncing it as his and their opinion that if a slave came from Jamaica and settled in London, it was undoubted law that he might be kept in confinement and sent again to Jamaica. My Lords, what was the law laid down in Somerset's case? If your Lordships read the case you will find page after page of the most grave and solemn argument in support of slavery, and grave doubts expressed as to whether the decision which might be ultimately arrived at in the other view could be sustained. But the case was brought to trial under the auspices of Granville Sharp, and the negro was ordered to be set free. What have we next? The bombardment of Algiers, in 1816. That put an end to a system of slavery certainly as disgraceful as the slavery of the negro. And what next? That long chapter of history with regard to the slave trade, ranging from 1807 to 1842, gradually bit by bit developing itself and making progress; first rising into illegality, then swelling into piracy, then advancing into that which had been so long and strenuously denied—the right of search. What have we next? The abolition of slavery in our own colonies in 1833. What have you as the latest and greatest of all? In 1865 the termination of slavery in the United States. I am quite willing to believe, and I hail with pleasure the idea, that we have reached a new point of departure—perhaps the last in this great question. I believe that the principle which has been developing itself through all the years I have mentioned has not ceased developing itself yet; and it has been subjected lately to greater and perhaps final trials. My Lords, I own that, speaking for myself, I should be extremely glad if, preserving all the doctrines of International Law, we could reduce the question to this point—that with regard to every British ship before it is sent to foreign waters where slavery is permitted, we should be understood to hold this language—"You allow domestic slavery. We are not going to make war against it, nor shall we attempt to terminate it by force until the time comes when you relinquish it. We are not going to seduce or invite your slaves to leave their masters and come on board our ships; but we give you notice that, if one of your slaves comes to our ship, you are not to be deceived or disappointed, for, if he claims the protection of the British flag, that protection he shall have." That would be a frank and fair statement of what we intend to do. I have been much amused lately in reading a collection of papers which is to be found in your Lordships' library, but which is not of much practical importance now—I mean the Treaties we have made in the last century with Tunis, Tripoli, and others of what are called barbarous States. We had then an object to obtain and we set about it in a business-like manner. In every one of these Treaties there is a uniform clause describing the course to be pursued with regard to escaped captives—

"When any of His Majesty's ships of war shall appear before Tripoli, upon notice thereof given to the English Consul, or by the commander of the said ships to the chief governors of Tripoli, public proclamation shall be immediately made to secure the captives; and if after that any captives whatsoever make their escape on board any of the said ships of war, they shall not be required back again, nor shall the said consul or commander, or any other his said Majesty's subjects be obliged to pay anything for the said captives."

That was a very fair game in its way and this clause showed how it was to be played. Each State stood on its rights. We gave them notice that, when our ships arrived in their territorial waters, they must look after their slaves, but, if any slaves got away, there was a fair and frank understanding that the owners must not expect to have them back again. I do not desire to see anything so rough renewed now, but some understanding of this kind might be come to with a State in which slavery is permitted. I beg your Lordships, moreover, to remember how small a question this is every day becoming. What portion of Europe and of America is interested in it? Spain has Cuba. In the domains of Portugal slavery is professedly at an end. In Brazil slavery is dying out, and must come to an end in a short time. There remain therefore the comparatively small territories of Cuba, Zanzibar, Egypt to a certain extent, and the smaller States on the East Coast of Africa. It is for this purpose that the Government have recommended a Royal Commission, and I beg your Lordships to bear in mind the ends which have been answered in former cases by the adoption of the same course. Certainly the two greatest questions involving International Law which have arisen in my time have been the Neutrality Laws and the Naturalization Laws. What did we do in regard to the former? We acted on the existing Neutrality Laws during the American War, and we thought we had complied with them; but the country was of opinion that circumstances had altered so much that the principles of International Law required to be re-considered and put in harmony with the present day; and a Commission was appointed. They considered the question and made a Report, and at the breaking out of the Franco-German War your Lordships were enabled to pass a statute, which would have been impossible if the Act had not been preceded by a Commission. With respect to the Naturalization Laws, exactly the same state of things existed. There was no doubt as to the law, or of our international obligations, but the country desired to see the question placed on a wider and broader basis. The late Lord Clarendon was appointed Chairman of the Naturalization Commission. The noble Viscount who commenced this debate (Viscount Cardwell) was also, I think, a Member. That Commission also made a Report which enabled alterations to be made in the law, and an Act to be passed to give effect to these variations.

The noble Viscount said that this was not a matter involving Party considerations, and I rejoice to think that slavery is no Party question. We have questions on which we disagree, but I thank God that upon this question there is no disagreement. I am ashamed to speak even for a moment as if slavery could be a question on which Her Majesty's Government could entertain any doubt. I have, however, heard it stated—not in this House, but "elsewhere"—probably in the heat of controversy, that there has been a lack of earnestness and energy on the part of the Government in dealing with this question of slavery. My Lords, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs sits in this House not only inheriting the name and title, but cherishing the memory, of that great Minister who was responsible for that statute, which I take leave to say might be printed in letters of gold—that which emancipated the negroes in our West Indian possessions.

The Lord Chancellor

Is it likely that he would desire to turn his back on the policy of this country upon the question of slavery? What has been done during the time when my noble Friend has been responsible for the conduct of affairs at the Foreign Office? He has made a Treaty with Zanzibar, supplementing the former Treaty, and removing the grave difficulties which had occurred in the construction of the former Treaty. My noble Friend has exerted himself to get the slave-market at Djeddah closed; and, if we may accept the telegraphic news, the state of domestic slavery is abolished in Zanzibar for 3,000 miles along the coast of the Seyyid's Dominions. Well, the Secretary of State for India—is he likely to alter the policy of this country in regard to slavery? He is now asking Parliament for greater powers for the suppression of the Slave Trade in those countries under the jurisdiction of the Viceroy of India. I then come to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. He at a time when it was a subject of much criticism that action should be taken—when the embers of a war were still smouldering—adopted the strong and noble course of putting an end to coercive slavery along the Gold Coast. These are the three Ministers responsible for the principal questions which arise regarding slavery. And I would say, even with regard to the Admiralty, has it shown no anxiety on this subject? If I am not misinformed, the force stationed upon the Gold Coast of Africa in 1875 was nearly doubled in point of men and guns compared with what it was in 1874. My Lords, I am ashamed to speak of these things as if there was any merit on the part of the Government in taking these measures. We have done nothing that would not have been done by any other Government; but I have referred to the matter to show that there has not been any supineness on the part of Her Majesty's Government in this matter. The Petition presented by the noble Viscount asks for the withdrawal of the last Slave Circular. That, however, would leave in force various former Circulars and precedents infinitely more obnoxious than anything contained in that Circular. Her Majesty's Government have not concealed—they do not desire to conceal—the policy which it is their object to follow, and to that object they intend to adhere. We believe it is one which will be justified by the Report we may look for from the Royal Commission; and I trust we are now about to take a step, and that not a small one nor an unimportant one, towards the time when we may anticipate, that it may be the destiny of this country to consummate, as it was her privilege to commence, the overthrow of that nefarious system which has been at once the curse and the disgrace of humanity.

LORD SELBORNE: My Lords, I think your Lordships will have heard with great satisfaction much of the latter part of my noble and learned Friend's speech; because in the latter part of that speech he has unequivocally declared the adherence of Her Majesty's Government to the policy which we on this side have at heart. I must, however, own that I think my noble and learned Friend's conclusions, agreeing as he does in that policy, are not those which might have been expected either from the course which Her Majesty's Government has actually taken, or from the general tenour of his own arguments. I confess there were some points in that argument the coherence of which was not to my mind extremely manifest—but, if I rightly understood him, he contended you cannot, in the present state of international obligations, get nearer to that policy in favour of the slave which Her Majesty's Government have at heart than you have got by the second Circular, and that in this state of international obligations you would do harm rather than good to the slave, if you were to comply with the prayer of the present Petition; the effect of which—as he assumed—must be, to bring back into operation other orders, more unfavourable to the slave than that Circular. I need not tell your Lordships that my noble and learned Friend behind me (Viscount Cardwell) did not mean, and the Petitioners did not mean, that you should withdraw this Circular, and leave other things of the same character in force. No such consequence need in any way follow. What we think, and what we mean, is, that both this Circular, which we regard as improperly and unnecessarily adverse to liberty, and everything else of the same character which may have preceded it, should be withdrawn. I should have supposed, from my noble and learned Friend's general argument, that he was looking to the Commission which has been appointed, to devise some means of relaxing those international obligations which he considers at present to fetter our hands and retard our progress—some means of enabling us to do that which shall result in the conclusion that no commander of a British ship of war in a foreign port or elsewhere is to deliver up or remove from his deck on the ground of slavery a slave who has once sought refuge there. But I said just now there were some things in the speech of my noble and learned Friend the coherence of which I did not distinctly understand, and on this critical and cardinal point I confess I was unable to follow him. He ended by suggesting a very plain, simple, and obvious way of getting rid of those supposed international obligations which, according to him, create our present difficulty—a way which we did not need a Royal Commission to point out, for the road is so plain and open that he who reads may run upon it—that is, to give general public notice which all the world may understand that for the time to come, at all events, whatever may have been the understanding in times past, British ships do not desire to enter foreign waters, and will not enter them, fettered by any obligation to deliver up a fugitive slave. But why should we have a Commission to point out how we are to issue such notice? If the giving of such a notice would suffice to get rid of the difficulty, instead of issuing the first Circular or the second, or the Calcutta Instructions, or any other, the plain and obvious thing to do was to make it as clear as day before all the nations of the world that those were the terms on which for the future we would enter foreign territorial waters. If this was the right thing to do, why was it not done? And why have we now got, instead of it, this Second Circular, and this Commission? The speech of my noble and learned Friend has confirmed me in the opinion which from the first I had entertained—that there is really no question of International Law in this matter at all. It is a question of public policy—of what is due to the honour and dignity of this country, and to those great interests of the world which our policy in this matter alone has in view. I observed that the noble and learned

Lord, in endeavouring to show why it was necessary to issue some such Circular—answering on that point feebly and ineffectually the noble Viscount behind me (Viscount Cardwell)—adopted a somewhat different mode of expression from that which is reported to have been used by the head of the Government in “another place.” I could not help taking note of the remarkable words with which the Prime Minister is reported to have begun his speech. They were—

“From an abstract point of view nothing can be more disagreeable, and certainly nothing more difficult, than to codify International Law respecting fugitive slaves in territorial waters.”

Until I read those words I was not aware there was any such thing as International Law respecting fugitive slaves in territorial waters to codify. My noble and learned Friend has expressed himself in a somewhat different manner. He thought that we ought to codify the rules and traditions which had prevailed in that Department. At all events, such rules and traditions are not part of International Law. Whether they are, or are not, of such an inconsistent and contradictory character as my noble and learned Friend has represented, I cannot conceive anything to which the term and the idea of codification can be more inapplicable. While, however, I am unable to admit, that on this particular subject of fugitive slaves there is any International Law at all, I agree so far with my noble and learned Friend, that I also think it is a matter of plain common sense how the principles of what is called International Law should be applied to that subject. I will read a few sentences from one of the best works of an eminent author (Mr. Justice Story), quoted by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack in which he states the meaning of the doctrine that the comity of nations and of International Law requires one nation to recognize, and in some cases, and under some limitations, to give effect to the laws of another. The passages will be found in Sections 35 to 38 of the work on the Conflict of Laws. He says—

“Section 35.—The true foundation, on which the administration of International Law must rest, is that the rules which are to govern are those which arise from mutual interest and utility; from a sense of the inconveniences which would result from a contrary doctrine; and from a sort of moral necessity to do justice, in order that justice may be done to us in return.”

“Section 36.—But of the nature and extent and utility of this recognition of foreign laws, respecting the state and condition of persons, every nation must judge for itself. It is, therefore, in the strictest sense a matter of the comity of nations, and not of any absolute paramount obligation, superseding all discretion on the subject.”

He adds, what seems to me to be very pertinent—

“Section 37.—Vattel has with great propriety said, ‘That it belongs exclusively to each nation to form its own judgment of what its conscience prescribes to it, of what it can or cannot do, of what it is proper or improper for it to do. And, of course, it rests solely with it to examine and determine whether it can perform any office for another nation without neglecting what it owes to itself.’”

And he goes on to say—

“Section 38.—There is, then, not only no impropriety in the use of the phrase, ‘comity of nations,’ but it is the most appropriate phrase to express the true foundation and extent of the obligations of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. It is derived altogether from the voluntary consent of the latter; and is inadmissible when it is contrary to its known policy or prejudicial to its interests.”

Now I ask you to apply these tests here. What says the conscience of this country as to the delivering up of fugitive slaves who have taken refuge on board Her Majesty's ships of war? Is it a thing which this country, foremost in the liberation and emancipation of slaves, can do? Is it a thing this country can do consistently with what it owes to itself? Is it a thing which is admissible as consistent with the known policy of England? No one of these questions can be answered in the affirmative. I, therefore, maintain that there is no ground whatever upon which any foreign nation independently of the terms of any particular Treaties—which might, of course, make all the difference—can call upon this country to deliver up a fugitive slave on board a British ship. With regard to the doctrine of ex-territoriality, my noble and learned Friend will excuse me saying that all his illustrations were superfluous. We have nothing to do with the recognition of marriages solemnized in territorial waters or with the question of the personal status even of the fugitive slave when within foreign territorial waters on board a British man-of-war as it would be regarded by an external law. On that subject there has been supposed to be some discrepancy between the language held by Mr. Justice Holroyd and Mr. Justice Best; but, without going into it, I will assume, that by the doctrine of extritoriality the privilege of a ship is established for the ship, for those who belong to it, and for the nation to which she belongs, and that it is neutral and colourless with regard to any question of status affecting other persons. If so, that question of status may properly be left to be dealt with by those laws which are or may be concerned with it: but there is no International Law—Treaties apart—which can compel the commander of a British ship of war to recognize, in any case whatever, the status of slavery; and the principles and policy of the laws of Great Britain, which on the deck of his ship he is bound to observe and to respect, forbid him to do so. As long as a British ship of war is in territorial waters she is inviolable—she is exempt from the foreign local jurisdiction. No foreign foot can be set on board of her to interfere with any one who is there; if any one is there, who should not be there, it is a subject of remonstrance between Government and Government; and if any foreign Government which feels itself aggrieved has not received satisfaction, the remedy is to give notice, if it should think fit, that British ships shall not be admitted for the future to its waters. When a man has once been received under the protection of the British flag, some reason must be shown why, in the particular case, that protection should be withdrawn. Is there any reason whatever, founded on international obligations, why the captain of a British ship, who cannot be compelled to do so by any foreign interference, should voluntarily, and by the direction of his own Government, recognize any man as a slave on board a British ship of war? I say, my Lords, there is not; and, further, I do not see how it could be done. In the case of "Forbes v. Cochrane," to which I have referred, another learned Judge, Mr. Justice Bailey, pointed out the practical impediments to any inquiry into the status of slavery by the captain of a man-of-war. It is impossible that he could make any just or useful inquiry—it would be to impose impossible conditions. There was more wisdom, and a much sounder view, too, of what is reasonable as between nations, in the old Treaties with the Barbary States, to which my noble and learned Friend himself referred: and it may not be out of place to observe that those foreign countries, with which we have chiefly to deal in this matter, are under Governments more like the Barbary States than the Governments of civilized Europe. When a British ship of war first entered any territorial waters of those States, a certain notice was to be given; and it was then the business of the masters of Christian slaves to prevent, if they could, those slaves from getting on board the ship. If once they did get on board, they were not afterwards to be given up, nor was any compensation to be made for them. I assume that no improper means are used to induce slaves to come on board; and, assuming this, it is not more reasonable, on principles of International Law, to regard the commander of a foreign ship as a wrong-doer for not giving them back, than it would be for him to make the laxity of the local police, which enabled them, though uninvited, to get there, a ground of international complaint. But it is superfluous to dwell longer on this point, because the second Circular, which we are discussing, in the strangest way begins with defining the case with which it deals as that of a person who, when he comes on board, professes or appears to be a slave, and ends by saying that, if a demand is made for his surrender he is not to be surrendered, and that no inquiry is to be made into the fact of his slavery. Therefore, the Circular distinctly admits that the captain of a British ship is not called upon to inform himself by inquiry or otherwise whether the man be a slave or not; and the notion of the existence of any obligation either to make that inquiry or to surrender him on demand is absolutely renounced by the Circular itself. If this were the whole effect of the Circular, my noble and learned Friend's argument, that it is a Circular in favour of liberty, might, of course, have some reason in it. But, notwithstanding all this, it says—and this is the sting of the whole—that, although you are not to entertain any demand for the surrender or enter into any examination into the status of the slave, yet with regard to this particular class of person—a person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave—you are not in the first place to admit him on board unless his life be in danger; and then, secondly, if, in order to save him from that danger, you have received him, you ought not, after that danger is past, to permit him to continue on board. He is not to be surrendered upon demand; but—for this is what it really comes to—he is to be surrendered without demand. This is no forced construction: it is the thing really meant, as is proved both by a comparison between this and the preceding paragraph, which relates to a slave received on board on the high seas, and by the line of argument used by my noble and learned Friend himself in its defence. I have not thought it necessary to dwell upon the paragraph relating to the reception of fugitive slaves on board British ships on the high seas, because, however little such an explanation may seem to be in accordance with the impression which has been made upon most people by the language used, my noble and learned Friend has assured us, that the directions contained in that paragraph are intended to encourage the commanders of British ships of war to receive fugitive slaves on board their ships more readily than they would receive other strangers. But of this, at all events, there can be no doubt—that, under the second paragraph, a real protection is to be given to the fugitive slave, once received under those circumstances. These are the words: “In any case in which, for reasons which you deem adequate, you have received a fugitive slave into your ship, and taken him under the protection of the British flag upon the high seas beyond the limit of territorial waters, you should retain him in your ship, if he desires to remain, until you have landed him in some country or transferred him to some other ship where his liberty will be recognized and respected. But within the territorial waters of a foreign State you are bound by the comity of nations, while maintaining the proper exemption of your ship from local jurisdiction, not to allow her to become a shelter for those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place.” The conclusion, therefore, that a man, into whose status of slavery you are not to inquire, is not to be permitted to continue on board, if he “professes” or “appears” to be a slave, is based upon upon the argument that there is a general obligation on the part of foreign public ships, when within the territorial waters of any State, not to give “shelter to those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place.” You have received this man on board for what the Circular assumes to be some sufficient reasons: you have neither invited nor encouraged any violation of the law of the place: the local law, supposed to be violated, is the law of slavery, depending on the man’s status as a slave:—if he is not a slave, he cannot be chargeable, on that ground, with any violation of the law of the place; you are not to inquire whether he is a slave or not: and yet you are to compel him to leave the ship, lest you should give shelter to one who is violating the law of the place. Can anything be more contradictory? That order now stands, in the general code of Admiralty instructions, side by side with the other order concerning political refugees, referred to by the noble Viscount behind me (Viscount Cardwell), which is numbered 381 in the addenda to the general Admiralty instructions, published in 1858. I will take the liberty of reading it:—

“Her Majesty’s ships, while lying in the ports of a foreign country, are not to receive on board persons (although they may be British subjects) seeking refuge for the purpose of evading the laws of the foreign country to which they may have become amenable. During political disturbances or popular tumults refuge may be afforded to persons flying from imminent personal danger. In such cases care must be taken that refugees do not carry on from Her Majesty’s ships correspondence with their partisans, and the earliest opportunity must be taken to transfer them to some place of safety.”

Political refugees may be taken on board, and the earliest opportunity must be taken to transfer them to some place of safety. A political refugee may be a person of a much more dangerous character than a poor slave; he may be the means of perpetuating a long and serious disturbance of the peace of his country; but the dictates of humanity and the general comity of nations are held to justify receiving him and giving him shelter, even in the territorial waters of the country whose laws he is violating and from whose jurisdiction he is seeking to escape; and in continuing that protection when once it has been accorded until he has been transferred to a place of safety. But why are not these principles which are good for one case not also good for the other? Why is the political refugee to be transferred to a place of safety while the fugitive slave is compelled to go on shore, where he will fall immediately into the hands of his master. I assume that our captains do not go into foreign waters for the purpose of inviting breaches of foreign law, or for the purpose of liberating domestic slaves; I assume that slaves come on board in such exceptional circumstances as are consistent with an adherence to the general Instructions—and if they do it would be wrong to give them up.

The order as to political refugees shows, as clearly as anything can, that proper respect may be shown by the commander of a British ship to the laws of the country in whose waters he is lying, without obliging him in all cases to make himself an executioner of those laws, or even to refuse shelter to fugitives, who maybe are in danger from them. My noble and learned Friend referred to the general Admiralty Instructions, which enjoin upon the captains of Her Majesty's ships, generally, in foreign parts and places, the duty of showing a conciliatory line of conduct towards the authorities and inhabitants, and of showing deference to their established rights, ceremonies, customs, and regulations. He has also referred to the various instructions issued for the guidance of naval officers engaged in the suppression of the Slave Trade, in which they are told to observe and to point out the distinction between the Slave Trade, which Great Britain is determined to put down, and the system of domestic slavery, with which she does not claim to interfere. I could not help thinking, that, in referring to those instructions, my noble and learned Friend was touching upon ground dangerous to his own argument, and properly belonging to his opponents. It is perfectly true, that the general obligations of British commanders are such as are pointed out in those general Instructions; it is also true that they are sufficiently pointed out there. Nobody desires that these Instructions should be withdrawn; and I do not understand my noble and learned Friend to say that they are not sufficient for their purpose. We on this side say that they are sufficient for that purpose: and we deny that they furnish any warrant whatever for the present circular; which, if the ground taken up by it had been really covered by them, would, of course, never have been issued.

My Lords, I come to another branch of the subject on which I differ greatly from my noble and learned Friend. I take issue with him on a matter of fact. I deny as a matter of fact that we have down to this time entered into foreign territorial waters upon a general and public understanding that we would give up fugitive slaves. My noble and learned Friend contends that there have been orders issued which affirm in some way the doctrine that fugitive slaves are to be delivered up; and then he says that some of these orders were communicated to foreign Governments and that they are entitled to suppose we enter their waters on those terms. I deny it. I say the generally understood rule has been directly the contrary, and is that for which we now contend. And I think I have good reason for saying so. What say all our naval commanders? If all foreign governments understood these people were to be given up, how did it happen in 1869 that Sir Leopold Heath understood the direct contrary? When the Law Officers of the Bombay Government were consulted by the Resident in the Persian Gulf they understood the rule to be exactly the contrary. How happens it that a gallant and distinguished Officer, speaking the other night in "another place," had never known or heard of any rule except the direct contrary? But my noble and learned Friend has referred to several instances which he considers to establish his case. I will take those instances in their order. First as to the case of the negro stowaway which happened at Havannah in 1837, Lord Palmerston gave instructions that he should be delivered up because Lord Palmerston was informed that he came on board under suspicious circumstances. Lord Palmerston dealt with that particular case upon its particular circumstances; and I venture to say that no Government would deal with such a case in any other way. As to the warning which Lord Clarendon gave to a captain at Rio that he was not to take on board those who by the law of Brazil were recognized as slaves, Lord Clarendon at the same time said it should be borne in mind that if a slave were to take refuge on board a British ship it would be the duty of the captain to refuse to surrender the slave. I think an ingenious suggestion was made in a very clever speech "elsewhere," that this was in consequence of the Aberdeen Act. I knew we should not hear that from my noble and learned Friend, because that Act has nothing to do with slaves coming on board. It is quite clear that whether Lord Clarendon changed his mind or not Lord Clarendon knew no rule but this—that a slave taking refuge on board of a British ship of war was not to be surrendered. I do not think your Lordships will find in these Papers any sufficient ground for believing that Lord Clarendon ever altered his mind upon the general principles. As to the case at Mozambique in 1869, I must say I felt a little surprised at the manner in which the facts of that case seemed to be used by my noble and learned Friend. I mean the case of the ship Daphne and Captain Sullivan. As I read the Papers it was not the case of a slave at all. The circumstances are remarkable. For about two years before 1869 the Government of Portugal had been deliberating upon the policy of emancipating the slaves in all their colonies. Mozambique was one of those colonies. In a letter addressed by Commander Sullivan to Commodore Sir Leopold Heath on this subject in October, 1869, he says—

"You will observe that he states that the Order abolishing slavery was published only two days before our arrival, though the abolition was decreed by the Portuguese Government in February last, and you will observe that, while the Governor in his letter calls them 'free negroes,' in which case they would be perfectly justified in coming on board, yet he adds that some of them belonged to the inhabitants and to some Baneans (who are and who always claim the right to be considered British subjects), and that these persons request that the negroes should be returned to them."

The men who came on board the Daphne, therefore, were not slaves at all; and, moreover, they were claimed, not as slaves, but as free men who, in contravention of the laws of their country, had attempted to leave without having passports. From first to last the status of slavery was not imputed to them, although Captain Sullivan thought that they had been treated as slaves. Therefore, in that case a very different question was raised, and Lord Clarendon, in expressing his disapproval of the conduct of Captain Sullivan in carrying off the men, must not be understood to

Lord Selborne

to have intended to make a declaration that all fugitive slaves ought to be surrendered back into slavery. It appears from the communication from the Secretary of the Admiralty to Mr. Hammond, dated April 12, 1870, that it was proposed to put Captain Sullivan on his trial by court martial for carrying off Portuguese subjects from Mozambique without passports—

"contrary to the law of the place, and in defiance of the requisition made upon him by the Government (such conduct being contrary to the Queen's Regulations), and to add charges for detaining the negroes against their will and permitting them to be ill-treated."

Turning now to the case of the Dryad and Nymph in Madagascar, I confess that if one looked only at the language of Lord Clarendon's letter, one might perhaps have fallen into the not unnatural mistake of supposing that he approved fugitive slaves who had sought refuge on board our national ships being returned to their lawful owners. No doubt in reference to this case Lord Clarendon did see something that appears inconsistent with the general rule on the subject which he laid down in 1856, and he used language harsh and grating to our ears when he spoke of slaves as property which should be returned to their lawful owners. He was, however, then disapproving what had been done because it was contrary to the express stipulations of a Treaty which we had just before entered into with the Queen of Madagascar, Article 9 of which was to the following effect:—

"Her Majesty the Queen of Madagascar engages to permit the ships of War of Her Britannic Majesty freely to enter into the military ports, rivers, and creeks situated within her dominions, and to allow such ships to provide themselves, at a fair and moderate price, with such supplies, stores, and provisions as they may from time to time stand in need of. No subject of the Queen of Madagascar shall be permitted to embark on board any British ship, except such as shall have received a passport from the Malagasy authorities. The rights of sovereignty shall, in all cases, be respected in the domains of the one Sovereign by the subjects of the other."

Article 16 gave British ships of war the right at all times to enter the ports, rivers, and creeks within the dominion of the Queen of Madagascar, in order to capture all vessels engaged in piracy. By Article 17—

"No persons from beyond sea shall be landed, purchased, or sold as slaves in any part of Madagascar, and Her Majesty the Queen of Madagascar consents that British cruisers shall have the right of searching any Malagasy or Arab vessel suspected of being engaged in the slave trade, whether under sail or at anchor in the waters of Madagascar . . . and, if any such vessels shall prove to be engaged in the slave trade, they may be dealt with as pirates."

What had been done in this case as alleged by the Madagascar authorities was not that fugitive slaves had been taken away, but that the act done was contrary to the Treaty obligation not to take away Madagascar subjects without passports. In the despatch from Commander Colomb to Commodore Sir Leopold Heath, dated the 1st of October, 1869, the former states that—

"Several runaway slaves having escaped to the ship from the town of Majunga and claimed my protection, I temporarily granted it, and the Governor then remonstrating in very proper terms, referring me to a stipulation of the Treaty of 1865, whereby no 'subject of the Queen of Madagascar was to be permitted to come on board a British ship without a passport,' I said I could not consider a slave to be a 'subject' in the terms of the Treaty, and that a British man-of-war was so far English soil that a slave reaching that asylum should be freed. The Governor replied that perhaps I was right, but requested an acknowledgment from me, which I gave him, observing that I should not finally deal with the escaped slaves until I had the opinion of the British Consul at Tamatave."

The complaint in that case therefore was founded on the fact that there had been a violation of express Treaty stipulations of great importance, which had been entered into with the view of obtaining the assistance of the Sovereign of Madagascar in putting down the slave trade in her territorial waters; and therefore Lord Clarendon, although I admit he expressed himself in harsh language which sounds painfully upon our ears, laid down no universal and general principle such as that which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack attributed to him, and said were afterwards embodied in the Instructions of 1871.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: What I said was that those Instructions were issued by the Commodore of the East India station in 1871, but that they must have been issued with the cognizance of the Foreign Office.

LORD SELBORNE: If the noble and learned Lord means that the origin of these Instructions issued to the East India station probably was the language in Lord Clarendon's letter, I shall not care to controvert his position; but what I do assert is that Lord Clarendon himself never issued those Instructions nor contemplated their being drawn up; nor do I believe that there is any ground for the supposition, that they were issued with the cognizance of any Minister who ever presided at the Foreign Office. And, of course, those who disapprove of the present Circular must disapprove of those Instructions also. My Lords, I have now given to your Lordships the reasons which make me think that the reply of the noble and learned Lord to the question why, Her Majesty's Government should have thought it necessary to issue these Circulars dealing with this subject generally instead of waiting to deal with each case separately as it arose, was entirely unsatisfactory. Such a thing was never before thought necessary, and was never before attempted, unless the Instructions of the Commodore on the East India Station in 1871 can be considered to be an exception; and that, if I am right, was the act of a naval commander, and not of the Queen's Government, and it had, after all, only a local operation. For my own part, I must say that I cannot conceive a more unwise thing than to attempt to lay down a general rule of this kind. It is quite clear that, if Treaty engagements are violated, you have a rule to act upon, different from that which may be applicable when there is no Treaty. Every case ought to be dealt with according to its own circumstances; and experience has not hitherto furnished any ground for believing that it will be difficult to deal with each individual case as it arises. What has happened in this case shows the difficulties into which you get, when you attempt to establish any universal rule. It is said that it was necessary to do something, because of the questions which had arisen in the Persian Gulf, and because the Indian Government had laid down, subject to the approval or disapproval of Her Majesty's Government, certain rules, unfavourable to liberty, of which Her Majesty's Government did not approve. As far, however, as I can form an opinion, the rules laid down by the Indian Government were in no degree more unfavourable to liberty than the first Circular, which repeated their most questionable provisions; and, if it is right now either to appoint a Royal Commission, or to take the course recommended in the speech of my noble and learned Friend, I cannot understand why, when that Circular was withdrawn, the second should have been issued. Why would it not have been sufficient for Her Majesty's Government to disallow the Calcutta Instructions, and to impress upon the Governor General at Calcutta the importance of not allowing Her Majesty's ships in the Persian Gulf to interfere unnecessarily with the pearl fisheries, by remaining so near the shore that slaves could swim out to and seek refuge on board of their vessels, in a way calculated substantially to embarrass that trade? I have from the beginning had much difficulty in understanding what the Royal Commission which has been appointed had to do; and I must say that my difficulty has been increased by the speech which has been addressed to your Lordships by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. I feel sure that the labours of the Commission will not be facilitated by the fact that they have before them any foregone conclusion, described as necessarily resulting from the present state of International Law and obligations. I do not see how it can be for the advantage of the Government, either to be responsible, while the Commission is sitting, for a Circular, the principle of which they do not themselves wish to see maintained, or to have that principle, while it is still embodied in a document to which they have given their authority, set aside, and condemned. On the whole, I cannot but think that it would have been for the credit of the Government and the honour of the country to have withdrawn a document which cannot be maintained.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I should have been well content to leave this case, as far as the Government is concerned, in the hands of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, who has covered the whole ground of the argument, but for the fact that the Department with which I am connected has had most to do with the question, and I might, by remaining silent, cause it to be supposed that I wished to escape my share of whatever responsibility belongs to this business. As far as I can gather, the whole of this controversy has turned upon two questions of very unequal degrees of importance. The first question is, whether any Circular or general Instructions—by whatever name you may choose to call it—ought to have been issued; and the second question is, assuming that the issuing of the Circular was right, whether we have or have not laid down accurately and fairly in the Circular those recognized doctrines of International Law by which the persons to whom it is addressed ought to be guided. With regard to the first question, you require little argument to enable you to form your opinion. It has been shown in these Papers—and, indeed, it was evident from the first to every one who knows the ordinary course of Public Business—that Instructions in this matter were not volunteered. They were called for. Particular cases had arisen, and others might arise, on which it was necessary that naval officers should decide one way or another. I have never been able even to understand what is meant by saying—though I have seen it pretty often said in the Press, and sometimes in speeches—"It is a mistake to lay down any general rule; the officers of the Navy might have been trusted to exercise a wise discretion." I am as willing as any one to trust the officers of the Navy, and I quite admit that questions will often arise in which an officer must use his own discretion. But is it fair to them, is it a reasonable thing, for Her Majesty's Government, with legal assistance at hand, and with all the traditions and records of the Foreign Office and the Admiralty available, to say—"These are nasty questions; if we decide them one way, we run our heads against International Law; if we decide them the other, we run the risk of a popular cry against us; therefore we will not decide them at all—we will simply tell each officer to do the best he can, and in that way we reserve for ourselves the option of disavowing him if he does anything which has an unpleasant look about it?" I say that any Government that should reason in that way would incur ten-fold more censure than would fall upon it for any exercise of its own judgment, however mistaken. I say that that course would have been a cowardly, an unworthy, a mean evasion of our duties and responsibilities; that it was and is our duty to lay down some fixed rule by which our officers might be guided in their conduct, and that even the worst rule, if once known and settled, is better by far than the absence of any. Misera servitus ubi jus aut vagum aut incognitum. Every person, British or foreigner, slave or slaveowner, has a right to know, in given cases, what view British officers will be bound by their orders to take of his rights and his claims. I will dwell no more on that point; there is the less need, because, in fact, the practice of issuing Instructions on this and similar subjects is not new; it has been acted upon by former Governments and former Boards of Admiralty, and what is complained of in our conduct is, not that we created in that respect a new precedent, but that we followed precedents which already existed. But, my Lords, I am, in fact, understating the case, when I speak of the inconvenience of leaving officers without Instructions. The inconvenience would have been of a more serious kind; because our officers would have been left, if I rightly understand the position of affairs, to act under Instructions which were different, and materially contradictory, in different parts of the world. The naval officers on the East India Station would have been guided by the Instructions issued under Lord Clarendon's directions in 1870, to the effect that slaves coming on board ships of war within three miles of the shore—that is, within territorial limits—should be returned to their owners. But in the Persian Gulf a different set of Instructions prevailed. The very same question had been raised by the British Resident there in 1871, and the Government of Bombay had decided in an exactly opposite sense. I need not quote their words; they are to the effect that British commanders would incur serious legal responsibilities if they attempted to coerce a slave under similar circumstances to return to his master. That is not all. In 1873 a case of the kind arose. The Political Resident at Bushire wrote to the Government of India, pointing out the inconveniences that would arise if this Bombay decision were upheld; and thereupon the Government of India reverses the decision of the Bombay authorities, and gives as its opinion—no doubt a provisional opinion only and pending a reference home—that the privileges accorded to vessels of war in foreign territorial waters do not operate to set aside the law of the country, and that slaves ought, therefore, to be given up when demanded. Under the circumstances which we are considering, that is the state of things we find—one view taken by the Admiralty at home, another by the Bombay authorities; the Indian Government inclined to agree with the home authorities, but not quite able to decide. My Lords, will it be argued that it was not our business—that it was superfluous and uncalled for on our part—to try and get rid of this chaos of contradiction and confusion, and to tell those under our orders plainly what they were to do and what they were not. I understood the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) to say that if the Instructions contained in the Circular had been local in their application, he should have objected to them less than he now does. I do not myself see why in a matter of this kind the same Instructions should not apply all the world over; but I will not discuss that point, for the reason that in the present case the application of the rules contained in the Circular will practically be of a local character. Slavery is dying in Cuba and Brazil: the slave trade on the West African Coast is suppressed: it is only on the Eastern Coast of Africa, and in connection with a few Mahomedan States that difficulties are likely to arise, and even there these Instructions will not, I hope, be necessary for any great length of time. The noble Viscount also said that as matters had gone on so well without any general Instructions, he did not see why any such Instructions should now be issued. I demur to that proposition. If the proposition contended for means that we have not got into any war or any diplomatic complication with respect to these matters, no doubt that cannot be disputed; but I think I can show that our action has not been uniform or consistent in past years, and that therefore it is not unreasonable that we should desire to establish some settled and uniform principle of action. I do not think it follows that because in past years matters of this kind have been settled, or have been allowed to settle themselves, with very little difficulty, and that little was heard of them at the time—it does not follow, I say, that such would be the case now. Many years ago, before the telegraph was established, these questions were locally disposed of by local authorities. Nothing was heard of them by the public at home, and they gave rise to no discussion or controversy. I need not point out how entirely different a state of things we have to deal with now.

But there is a wider question—namely, whether this much-criticized document of ours is in accord with what the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) will not allow me to call International Law, but international obligation. The noble Viscount said that the question was one of policy, not of law; and if I rightly understood the noble and learned Lord, he went further and contended that it was a matter with which International Law had little or nothing to do.

LORD SELBORNE: I said that in dealing with the question of slaves who had got on board one of Her Majesty's ships, I did not admit the existence of International Law.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Well, the noble and learned Lord carries the doctrine much further than I have heard it carried before. There is, no doubt, a sense in which the words quoted by the noble and learned Lord from Vattel are true and intelligible; but I must say I think that that is a doctrine which will not bear straining or carrying too far. The authorities of various nations are extremely apt to differ when the question is what they are expected to do towards each other, and what other nations are bound to do towards them. We have had abundant proof within the last few years that the very widest differences may exist on such matters between even the most civilized nations on the earth. I think, therefore, that the doctrine contended for by the noble and learned Lord, although it is not one which I can absolutely deny or disclaim, is one which ought to be taken with great caution. I do not think it necessary, my Lords, to contend seriously against the doctrine which I have heard elsewhere, but which has been only touched upon in the course of this debate—namely, that international rules need not be applied with any strictness to slave-owning Powers because they are weak and imperfectly civilized. To accept that doctrine is to sanction the substitution of brute force for law—to affirm a principle which would strike at the root of all International Law—the principle that there is one rule for strong nations and another for weak ones. We have never admitted or acted upon any theory of that kind. We are bound to deal with Brazil, with Persia, with Zanzibar, with Spain in Cuban waters, precisely as we should have dealt with the United States before the late Civil War swept away slavery. Accept any other view and in your zeal against slavery you recognize and sanction that very doctrine of simple force, as opposed to justice, on which slavery rests. The question, then, as I understand, which lies at the bottom of the matter, is how far the laws of a foreign State are to be considered as valid on board of a national vessel of some other country within the waters of that State. It is, I believe, always maintained that a vessel under such circumstances is free from the jurisdiction of a foreign Power. But that is a matter of usage and of concession. Chief Justice Marshall, in the celebrated judgment on the case (referred to by my noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack) of the Exchange, which is regarded as the leading authority on this subject, says—

“All exceptions to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They could flow from no other legitimate source.”

And he goes on to say—

“This consent might in some instances be tested by common usage, and by common opinion growing out of that usage.”

And no doubt the universal usage of nations sanctions the exemption of a national vessel from foreign jurisdiction. But it is clear from the very nature of the case that there must be limits to the extent of this immunity, and those limits are laid down in the judgment to which I have referred. Mr. Justice Story, describing it, says—

“In the case of the Exchange the grounds of the exemption of public ships were fully discussed and expounded. It was there shown that it was not founded upon any notion that a foreign Sovereign had an absolute right, in virtue of his sovereignty, to an exemption of his property from the local jurisdiction of another Sovereign, when it came within his territory, for that would be to give him sovereign power beyond the limits of his own empire. But it stands upon principles of public comity and convenience, and arises from the presumed consent or licence of nations, that foreign public ships coming into their ports and demeaning themselves according to law and in a friendly manner shall be exempt from the local jurisdiction; but, as such consent and licence is implied only from the general usage of nations, it may be withdrawn upon notice at any time without just offence; and if afterwards such public ships come into our ports, they are amenable to our laws in the same manner as other vessels. . . . It may, therefore, be justly laid down as a general proposition, that all persons and property within the territorial jurisdiction of a Sovereign are amenable to the jurisdiction of himself or his Courts, and that the exceptions to this rule are such only as by common usage and public policy have been allowed, in order to preserve the peace and harmony of nations and to regulate their intercourse in a manner best suited to their dignity and rights. It would indeed be strange if a licence implied by law from the general practice of nations for the purposes of peace should be construed as a licence to do wrong to the nation itself, and justify the breach of all those obligations which good faith and friendship by the same implication impose upon those who seek an asylum in our ports. To violate that which, rightly or wrongly, is the law of the land, is obviously to do wrong to the nation itself."

In face of that judgment, and of the many authorities on the same side, it seems impossible to maintain the doctrine of absolute ex-territoriality except as a legal fiction.

But, my Lords, there is a case more directly in point as regards the matter now under consideration and which has been often referred to of late. I mean the case of "Forbes v. Cochrane." In that case a suit was brought against the commander of a British man-of-war for taking away certain slaves who had escaped on board his vessel from Florida, then a Spanish colony. The vessel was at the time stationed off Cumberland Island, then in the occupation of Great Britain, and was therefore legally in British waters. The action failed; but Chief Justice Best, both during the argument and in his judgment, laid it down that if the vessel had been in the waters of Florida "all the laws of Florida would attach to both the ship and the slave." You cannot, my Lords, have a clearer or stronger statement from an English Judge than this—that in his view a slave was not legally entitled to freedom by coming on board a British man-of-war, if that vessel were at the time in territorial waters. Has that judicial opinion ever been judicially reversed? I believe it has not: and what makes it stronger is that in delivering it the Chief Justice asserted strenuously the right of the slave to freedom because the case had occurred elsewhere than in territorial waters. I will not say that is the precise distinction which we have drawn, because in the Circular now under discussion we have not gone so far as Chief Justice Best. Now, my Lords, what are the later precedents bearing on this question? There is the case of the negro who escaped to Her Majesty's ship Romney in 1837. He was given back to the local authorities, and Lord Palmerston approved the conduct of the officer who so gave him back. In 1851 a negro made his way on board the Conflict, off the Brazilian coast. The Admiral disapproved his having been received. No further action was taken, the man never being claimed. In 1856 the British Chargé d'Affaires at Rio issued a circular to warn masters of merchant vessels not to receive fugitive slaves. He was approved by Lord Clarendon; but with the reservation, of which I give you the full benefit, that it would not be the duty of the captain of a man-of-war to surrender a fugitive. I do not want to give less than its due weight to that precedent; but it ought to be remembered that at this time the Aberdeen Act was in force, and, rightly or wrongly, we were dealing in an exceptional manner with Brazil, condemning Brazilian vessels in our own Courts, and refusing to deliver over to Brazilian authorities negroes captured by British cruisers. It is worth notice in this connection that no previous case has been found of a man-of-war having refused to surrender a slave escaped from the shore. The point seems never to have been practically raised with Brazil. There are, however, cases of demands made by the Brazilian Government for the surrender of slaves found on board vessels captured by British cruisers. In the first of these cases—which occurred in 1841—the men had formed part of the crew of the vessel, and, when the claim was made, they were on board the British ship Crescent, a Queen's ship stationed in the harbour of Rio de Janeiro. The Queen's Advocate was consulted, and the Brazilian Government were informed that though Her Majesty's Government declined to send these men back to their masters, they were ready to pay compensation for them. In 1843 a similar claim was made for the surrender of two other men, seized in the same way, and sent on board the same ship Crescent. Lord Aberdeen refused to give them up, on the advice of the Queen's Advocate, contending that the jurisdiction of Brazil did not extend to the vessel in which these men were placed. But what was the end? The Brazilian Government renewed the demand; the matter was again considered; it was held that the objection could not be maintained, and compensation was accordingly paid. That was done by Lord Aberdeen, the author of the Aberdeen Act, and the concession was made to that very State with which he dealt in so decided, not to say so high-handed, a manner. There is no other case of importance until we come to the recent one, which gave rise to Lord Clarendon's Instruction in 1870. It will be found in the letter written by direction of Lord Clarendon, and sent by the Admiralty to Commander Sir Leopold Heath, and related to the proceedings of the Nymph and Dryad in carrying off and then liberating certain domestic slaves who swam off to those vessels to escape from their masters. Lord Clarendon stated that the commanders of those ships were not justified in sailing away with the slaves in question, and he added—

"The status of slavery being acknowledged and lawful in Madagascar, the commander of a British ship of war is not borne out in depriving the inhabitants of slaves who are rightfully their property, and the owners of such slaves are plainly entitled to compensation from us for the losses incurred at our hands by their abduction."

If that principle were applicable to Madagascar, it would equally apply to any other country similarly circumstanced. Nothing can be more decided than the Instruction of 1871 issued by the officer in command of the East India Station—

"Art. 147. Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships of war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape—that is to say, within three miles of the shore—should be returned to the owners; but when it appears that slaves coming on board Her Majesty's ships have been recently imported in violation of treaties, the commanders of Her Majesty's ships should communicate the facts to the Consul, with a view to proper inquiry being made, rather than carry off the slaves on their own responsibility."

Now, I do not want to get into any miserable personal argument about who is responsible for this, that, or the other; but this Order came home to the Admiralty, it must have passed under the eyes of the First Lord, and we have, therefore, one Department at least of the late Government pledged to the doctrine which it lays down; while the Foreign Office was pledged, if not to that Order, at least to the Instruction of Lord Clarendon, milder in terms, but of which the general principle was the same. This is briefly the history of this question. Two things seem clear from it—that the claim to retain fugitive slaves escaping on board vessels in territorial waters is one which has on some occasions been asserted, in others repudiated, and never persistently maintained; the other—as has appeared, indeed, in recent discussions—that the true legal doctrine on the subject is involved in considerable uncertainty—that it has never been laid down in an authoritative and accurate manner. And from both these facts I draw the same conclusion—that it was our duty to lay down for the present the law, such as on the best advice we conceive it to be; and that with reference to the possibility of amending it, if necessary, by common consent, we could not do better than call in the advice of qualified and impartial persons as we have done in the Commission lately issued.

My Lords, there is one circumstance which I ought to mention, as it increases the necessity for dealing cautiously with the wishes and interests of foreign countries as connected with this matter. We must not forget that, in the majority of cases where questions connected with the escape of fugitive slaves are likely to arise, our ships of war are in the territorial waters of other States by special permission and for the performance of a special duty. They are there to check the slave trade. They can only do that in the waters of other States by special authorization from those States. The State that has the right to grant that permission has the right also to withhold it; the one implies the other. But if our ships were used as places of refuge for every domestic slave who wished to escape to them, it is certain that they could not remain in territorial waters with the consent of the local authorities. One of two things would happen. Either they must be kept there by force—which is a high-handed way of doing things, and not likely to answer in the long run—or they must be withdrawn—and then you are immensely weakening your own power of putting down slave trade on those coasts. On the question of policy it is hardly necessary to say that the British Government has always drawn the widest distinction between the slave trade and domestic slavery. The policy of that course is obvious. Domestic slavery is an institution which it belongs to the Government of each country to deal with as it thinks best. It is a question of internal legislation. If it is to disappear from the world, as I believe it will, that result will be brought about, not so much by diplomacy, not so much by philanthropic efforts, not so much even by newspaper articles; it will cease of itself through the general elevation of the people in every country which reaches a certain point of civilization—because the existence of slavery is found inconsistent with the social and economical requirements of the people. A nation that requires skilled labour cannot get it from a slave population. A nation that has reached a certain stage of refinement cannot endure the sight of harshness and coercion, and so the free labourer is substituted for the slave. We should do no good if we attempted to accomplish by force from without what can only be effectually done by a people for itself. That principle has been clearly understood and acted upon by former Governments in 1865 and 1869. As regards the slave trade, the case is different. That cannot be carried on without involving a condition of war and plunder over a widespread area which makes good government and legitimate trade impossible. It is carried on, moreover, on the high seas, where we have the power to check it effectually, without interfering with the internal administration of any country. We have always, therefore, assumed a right to deal with it, and I will add, that it has never been more effectually dealt with than at the present time. On the West Coast of Africa it has ceased to exist; on the East Coast it is greatly lessened. We are at this moment negotiating a Convention with Egypt under which we hope to be able to deal with it effectually in the Red Sea. We have not altered the policy of England. It does not date from yesterday; it will not end to-morrow. We believe we have laid down the law as it stands. We are willing to consider how it may be altered for the better; but we decline to do that in an arbitrary manner; or however good the motive might be, to create a precedent which might lessen respect for the settled principles of International Law.

LORD COLERIDGE: At this time of night, my Lords, if I followed my own inclination, I should not address your Lordships; and one reason which would induce me to be silent is the real disinclination I feel to criticize any legal document for which my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack is substantially responsible; for, knowing the authority with which he speaks, I feel distrust when I find myself arriving at conclusions very different from his on a matter which appears to me abundantly clear. It is, however, my duty to state shortly and clearly what I conceive to be the law of England on this matter—law now at least 200 years old, and laid down in clear and most unflinching terms by repeated decisions—and how far it has been permitted to International Law to interfere with, qualify, or in any manner supersede the Law of England. I entirely assent to what was said by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that International Law, strictly and rightly considered, and used in the only way it can be, as a basis of argument, is not a law at all, but merely a collection of the usages of civilized nations whereby they have regulated their intercourse, friendly or unfriendly—in some instances, no doubt, settled and defined enough to be made subject-matter of statement, but in a great majority of instances—perhaps the majority—utterly unsettled and indefinite, and still remaining matter of fierce and angry discussion. It is only common sense to admit that in dealing with foreign nations you must take account of their laws as well as your own; but where principles differ, England has always determinedly maintained her own principles, and the comity of nations does not call upon England to do otherwise. England has uniformly refused to lend her aid to enforce foreign laws which were opposed to the principles of her own; and Lord Wynford has laid down that "Comitas inter communitates cannot prevail in any case where it violates the law of our own country, the law of nature, and the law of God." Happily, although villainage prevailed in England, there was never such thing as slavery, and consequently precedents do not go back more than two centuries; but early in last century, when actions were brought to recover slaves or the value of them, or to enforce contracts for the sale and purchase of slaves which had been made in other countries, it was repeatedly laid down by Lord Holt that—

“The common law takes no notice of negroes being different from other men. By the common law no man can have a property in another. . . . There is no such thing as a slave by the law of England. As soon as a negro comes into England he becomes free. One may be a villain in England, but not a slave.”

These cases were followed by the famous case of the negro James Somerset, which was ably argued, and in which Lord Mansfield gave judgment with the greatest reluctance, after vainly recommending a compromise or application to Parliament to alter the law. In 1778 the Court of Session, in the case of a negro named Knight, followed the judgment of Lord Mansfield. Fifty years ago, in the case of “Forbes v. Cochrane,” which has already been alluded to, the law as formerly laid down was confirmed in the strongest language. It may, perhaps, be said—though I do not think with truth—that Mr. Justice Best was a politician as well as a lawyer, and that that circumstance affected his judgment; therefore I desire to draw attention to what was said by Mr. Justice Holroyd, who was an original thinker and powerful reasoner. The case of “Forbes v. Cochrane” was decided in 1834, but the subject-matter arose in 1814. This country was then at war with the United States, but was at peace with Spain. In 1814 Florida belonged to Spain, and was a slave country. The British Government had instructed their commanders to issue into slave states circulars inviting slaves to escape from their masters and join the British flag. These circulars, though not intended, got into Florida, and the consequence was that a number of slaves escaped from their masters in Florida and took refuge on board a British ship which was anchored in Georgian waters. We were at war with the United States, and the British forces had taken possession of Cumberland Island, close to the shore of Georgia. Under these circumstances, the slaves escaped to a ship forming part of Sir George Cockburn’s squadron, and he refused to give them up. These were the facts of the case. There was no technical point in it; the Judges delivered judgment on the broadest and clearest grounds; and there are one or two of the more striking passages to which I would desire to call your Lordships’ attention. Mr. Justice Holroyd said—

Lord Coleridge

“According to the principles of English law, the plaintiff’s right to these persons cannot be considered as warranted by the general law of nature, nor can he maintain an action under that general law. . . . According to the principles of English law, the right to slaves even in a country where such rights are recognized by law must be considered as founded, not upon the law of nature, but upon the particular law of that country. The law of slavery is a law in invitum, and where a party gets out of the territory where it prevails and out of the power of his master, and gets under the protection of another Power, without any wrongful act done by the party giving that protection, the right of the master, which is founded on the municipal law of the particular place only, does not continue, and there is no right of action against a party who merely receives the slave in that country without doing any wrongful act. . . . In this case, indeed, the fugitives did not escape to any island belonging to England, but they went on board an English ship (which for this purpose may be considered a floating island), and in that ship they became subject to the English laws alone. They then stood in the same situation in this respect as if they had come to an island colonized by the English. It was not a wrongful act in the defendants to receive them; quite the contrary. The moment they got on board the English ship there was an end of any right which the plaintiff had by the Spanish laws acquired over them as slaves. They had got beyond the control of their master and beyond the territory where the law recognizing them as slaves prevailed. They were under the protection of another Power. . . . When they got out of the territory where they became slaves to the plaintiff, and out of his power and control, they were by the general law of nature made free, unless they were slaves by the particular law of the place where the defendant received them. They were not slaves by the law which prevailed on board the British ship of war.”

Quite as powerful passages, more rhetorically expressed, might be cited from the judgment of Mr. Justice Best; but it is quite true that in his judgment occurred that passage which the noble Earl opposite has referred to, and on which much stress is laid. The passage is this—it was contained in a parenthesis—

“The moment they put their foot on board a British man-of-war not lying within the waters of Florida, where undoubtedly the laws of that country would prevail, those persons who formerly were slaves were free.”

That passage was quite rightly cited by the noble Earl. But I venture to think a great deal too much stress has been laid on that parenthesis, and if the case be looked into it will appear from the whole tenour of the argument that the question of what is called the ex-territoriality of the ship was not present to the mind of the learned Judge. With regard to that point, I should prefer to say that a public ship is exempt from the jurisdiction of the territory within which she claims to have the rights of hospitality exercised towards her; and that right was vindicated in the strongest way by Chief Justice Marshall in the case which has been referred to. If a ship is exempt from the jurisdiction of the territory into which she has come, I venture to think not only would the captain be justified in not surrendering a fugitive slave on board of her, but he would be utterly unjustified if he did surrender the slave; and the declaration by English Judges in the Courts on questions of this sort has this great value—that it is notice to all the world of what we have always asserted, and upon what terms we claim the right to the hospitality of friendly States who tolerate slavery if we enter their waters. If they object, it is for them to say they will not receive the ships of this country into their territorial waters until the claim they object to is either modified or withdrawn. When we come to this point we leave the domain of exactly scientific law and enter upon the general usage sanctioned by international comity. But international comity has its distinct and definite rules, and one of the rules of international comity, which as far as this country is concerned has, I apprehend, always been laid down in our Courts, and has always been maintained by our statesmen, is this—that we are not to be called upon, and if we are called upon we shall refuse, to lend our aid in any manner either to sanction or to enforce the detestable institution of slavery. A curious unanimity prevailed among the noble and learned Lords who sat in this House when the case of the Creole was dealt with in 1842. The Creole was a ship with a cargo of slaves. She was carrying those slaves from one of the Slave States to another of the Slave States in the United States of America. In the course of the voyage the slaves rose to liberate themselves. They put to death a man who resisted them; they possessed themselves of the ship, and they forced the captain and crew to navigate the ship into a British port. This country persistently refused to give up any of those slaves, even those who had been concerned in homicide. I do not lay much stress upon that for this reason—it is probably or certainly to be explained on the ground that we had no Extradition Treaty between this country and America, and, therefore, whatever crime had been committed, they could not, according to the existing law, have been given up. But I find on a careful perusal of that most instructive debate that all the Law Lords in this House—Lord Brougham, Lord Denman, as might be expected, Lord Campbell, and Lord Lyndhurst—expressly declined to admit that the slaves had done anything wrong in repossessing themselves by force of that which all the learned Lords said was their natural position—namely, their liberty, of which they had been deprived, as the noble and learned Lords said, by a violation of the law of God.—[3 Hansard, lx. 313.] I wonder what any of those noble, learned, and illustrious persons would have said if they had heard a great and distinguished lawyer coupling escape from slavery and murder together, and saying that a person who escaped from slavery and a person who committed murder were equally breakers of law. I wonder what those great persons would have said if they had heard a still more distinguished man treating the laws of slavery—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Are you referring to me?

LORD COLERIDGE: Certainly not. I wonder what those noble and learned Lords would have said if they had heard a still more eminent man treating the laws of slavery and the laws of quarantine, forsooth! as equally binding upon foreign nations. If there is such an eminent lawyer, and if there is such a still more eminent person, all I can say is they may be thankful that Lord Brougham and his contemporaries slumber in the dust. One of the great objections to this Circular is the very existence of the Circular itself. What necessity was there for interfering with the existing state of things? What was the necessity for somewhat ostentatiously, as I cannot help thinking this Circular does, recognizing slavery? It recognizes the institution of slavery, because it talks of fugitive slaves as persons who have broken the law. Surely the subject of not allowing a fugitive slave to remain on board when danger to life was over might have been left to the discretion of our officers and the wisdom of our statesmen. I form no opinion whether, in the case we have heard so much about, Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston did or did not come to a right determination; but I should have thought that in 99 cases out of 100—and probably the proportion might be much larger—they did right. It would be ridiculous to suppose that my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack or the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) is in favour of slavery; but by this Circular they have hampered their own discretion and the discretion of the public officers of this country. It would be utter waste of time for me to attempt to go through the Slave Trade Acts of 1873. The answer to the point that has been raised respecting them is to be found in their description. They are Slave Trade Acts, and have nothing to do with domestic slaves who have escaped from slavery and have got on board English ships of war in the territorial waters of friendly slave-holding States; and I think that any person who has read them, and who really understands them, and who introduced them into this discussion, must have done so with the object of distracting our attention from the real point at issue. Most certainly I never understood it to be part of the law of England, or part of the International Law by which we are bound, that this country is compelled to support actively the institution of slavery. I hope that in dealing with this subject your Lordships will raise it above all Party considerations—and I am sure that it has not been discussed to-night as a Party question. Your Lordships, on both sides of the House, are capable of feeling how deeply the honour of the country is concerned in this matter. Could I for a moment free myself from the restraints of judicial office—could I revive for a moment the dying embers of Party feeling—I protest that nothing as a Party man could more delight me than to see this question voted upon by your Lordships in a Party spirit—so that the spectacle might be presented to the country of all the noble Lords on that side of the House voting in favour of maintaining this Circular, and all the noble Lords on this side protesting against it.

Lord Coleridge

But, my Lords, I wish for nothing of the kind. I wish your Lordships to view this question from your high position as one on which liberty and freedom as opposed to tyranny and oppression depend, and as one in which the honour of the British Flag and of the British people who have made so many noble sacrifices on behalf of liberty is deeply concerned.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE denied that International Law had nothing to do with this question—on the contrary, he thought that International Law had everything to do with it. If we could get all other nations to agree to abolish slavery altogether, well and good; but unless we could do that, it would be absurd to attempt to put it down by force. If the captain of a man-of-war were to avow his intention to break the municipal law of the country, he would not be allowed to take his ship into its ports. We expressed a great horror of slavery in this country, but he should like to know from what part of the world the goods known as “slave goods,” which were exclusively used for the purpose of purchasing slaves, came from? Why, they came from Manchester, Birmingham, and Sheffield—and it was not difficult to guess into whose pockets the price of the slaves went. He was of opinion that the Government had acted properly in transferring the onus of deciding this question of the treatment of fugitive slaves from the shoulders of naval officers to their own.

LORD HATHERLEY desired to add his protest to the continuance in force of the Circular which had formed the subject of this debate. He had heard no answer given to that question, first put by the noble Viscount who presented the Petition—Why, if they were to have a Commission to consider what appeared to the Government such a difficult question, but to himself and his friends such a simple one, should it be necessary, and so hastily, to publish this Circular? He contended that, as each question arose, whether in regard to slaves in the Gulf of Persia or on the coast of Africa, it could have been dealt with without issuing general Instructions to all our officers in all parts of the world. It was well known that, by the comity of nations, as regarded vessels of war, any officer whose acts were complained of must be dealt with by the nation to which the ship belonged; and it was also well known to foreign nations that the mind, and heart, and conscience of the British nation had long ago settled that slavery should not exist. He could see no reason for keeping the Circular in force pending the inquiry of a Commission which had been appointed for the purpose of codifying the law relating to negro slavery; nor could he perceive how the existence of slavery was likely to be shortened by the operation of a Circular which forbade officers of British ships taking slaves on board unless they were in peril of their lives, and then instructed them to put such slaves ashore, but did not inform them as to where the debarkation was to be accomplished. He submitted, then, that this Circular should be at once withdrawn by the Government—a Government so strong that it could afford to withdraw it—and by so doing that they would be entitled to the thanks and gratitude of the whole nation.

Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 7th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Railway
Passenger Duty, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) *.

Second Reading—Partition Act (1868) Amendment * [73].

Committee—Municipal Officers Superannuation * [2].

Committee—Report—Epping Forest (re-comm.) * [66].

ARMY—SEA-PORTS DEFENCES—THE FIRTH OF FORTH.—QUESTION.

MR. COWAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to carry out the proposal of the late Mr. Secretary Herbert, to erect a battery on Inchkeith for the protection of the Firth of Forth, or if Government has any other measures under consideration to defend the Firth and its ports, which have now no available means of defence?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he would refer the hon. Gentleman to the Estimates for the current year, which contained no provision for an armament of Inchkeith. It was true that in 1859 the Government contemplated arming Inchkeith; but after obtaining tenders the matter appeared to have slept until the year 1865 or 1866, and was only now again renewed. Other projects had been put forward for the protection of the Firth of Forth by the arming of Inchkeith; but other ports in the Kingdom were asking for armament, as the hon. Gentleman must be aware. It was so large a question that he (Mr. Hardy) was unable to give any further information on the subject.

MR. COWAN gave Notice that he would on an early day call attention to the subject.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—BOARD OF TRADE SURVEYS—THE "MOUNT ROYAL."—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence reported to have been given by the Board of Trade Surveyor, Greenock, in the course of the Board of Trade inquiry into the wreck of the "Mount Royal," to the effect that when making his inspection of the interior of that vessel's hull previous to her sailing he had not a lantern but merely a few wax matches; that he did not touch any of the bolts, and could not do so without an order from the Board of Trade; that he did not look at any of the sails, having no power to order them to be lowered; that he did not order the carpenter to caulk the waterways, having no power to give orders of that kind; and that he did not point out anything to the captain, nor ask him to do anything, having no power to ask him to do anything; and, whether the survey was thus conducted: and, if so, whether the Board of Trade intend continuing the surveyor in his appointment.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: One of the Board of Trade surveyors, Mr. Mills, and a very good one, sent information to the Board of Trade that the Mount Royal was going to sea apparently with a defective yard. This did not seem a sufficient ground for sending a provisional order for detaining her for survey, but the defective yard was replaced; but Mr. Mills afterwards going on board to inspect lights and crew space, which was his duty under the Act of 1862, observed during his inspection further defects. He had not been authorized to make a survey, therefore all he says of defective power was necessarily the case. He had to strike a light for the same reason, not having a lantern with him, as he would on a survey. I see nothing to animadvert upon. It would not do for a surveyor to take upon himself to survey without authority, and no ground had been shown for giving such authority in this case, though further defects were seen too late. Under any system a defective ship may sometimes escape detection.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—ART LIBRARY.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that the Library accommodation at South Kensington is now totally insufficient for the large number of art readers who resort to it; and whether Government propose, during the present year, to build a new Library, which will also provide for the Dyce and Forster Libraries recently left to the Nation?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, he had reason to believe the library accommodation was insufficient; and he regretted to say that he had not been able to insert in the Estimates any sum for providing for the deficiency.

ARMY—ARTILLERY OFFICERS (INDIA). QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS, asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will explain why the additional Papers connected with the Memorials of Artillery Officers, ordered on the 16th of July 1875, have not yet been presented to the House, and if he can state when they will be presented?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, the Papers referred to by the hon. Gentleman were on the Table of the House, and would shortly be in the hands of Members. The delay was occasioned by the fact that the Papers moved for were scattered in different parts of India, and some delay was necessarily occasioned in collecting the Papers.

PREVENTION OF FLOODS IN THE THAMES — LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the honourable and gallant Member for Truro, When it is proposed to bring in a Bill for the Prevention of Floods in the River Thames, for which Notices were published by the Metropolitan Board of Works in November last?

SIR JAMES HOGG: I regret that I am unable to state when the Bill on this subject will be brought in. A draft Bill has been prepared, but the subject involves many important questions, and the Metropolitan Board of Works is desirous that the Bill should be fully considered before it is submitted to the House.

INLAND REVENUE—GROCERS' WINE AND SPIRIT LICENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. BOLCKOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the great increase of wine and spirit licences to grocers and other shopkeepers; and, whether he intends to propose some alteration in the Licensing Laws, giving to magistrates power to refuse applications as in the case of public houses and beer houses?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the attention of the Government had been called to the subject by the proceedings at the various quarter sessions in the country, and all he could say at present was that the matter deserved serious consideration, and was at the present moment receiving it.

THE ROYAL TITLES BILL. QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is now prepared to state what is the addition to the Royal Titles which Her Majesty's Ministers will advise in the event of the passing of the Royal Titles Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that I am not now prepared to state what is the addition to the Royal Titles which Her Majesty's Ministers will advise in the event of the passing of the Royal Titles Bill.

Sir Charles Adderley

MR. SAMUELSON: After the Answer which I have just received from the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that on the Motion for the second reading of the Royal Titles Bill I will move—

“That this House should not be asked to read this Bill a second time until the addition proposed to be made to the Royal Titles shall have been stated by Her Majesty's Ministers, and until full opportunity shall have been given for the consideration of such addition.”

CUSTOMS—THE WINE DUTIES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed “to inquire into the present system of levying the Customs Duties on Wines” said, the subject was an important one in connection with the Revenue of the country, because it was alleged by some high authorities that to alter the present system, by which a duty of 1*s.* per gallon was taken on wines under 26 degrees of alcoholic strength, and of 2*s.* 6*d.* on wines above that degree of strength, must necessarily imperil the integrity of the Revenue derived from the spirit duties. It was the opinion of those, however, who were best acquainted with the subject that the present system of levying duties upon the wines imported into this country ought to be placed upon a clear, a simple, and a fair basis. He had the conviction that a change was possible without interfering with the integrity of the Revenue, and he wished to see such a system adopted as would realize the mode suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer—a system which would combine the greatest simplicity of operation with the greatest security to the Exchequer. Various Papers presented to Parliament in 1869 showed how the controversy on this question had been carried on among the three Departments of the Customs, Inland Revenue, and Board of Trade on the occasion of negotiations with Portugal. In 1866 the Government asked the opinion of the Board of Trade with regard to the lowering of the 2*s.* 6*d.* duty and other alterations which were then mooted; and the Board of Trade, after a close examination of the question, arrived at the conclusion that a reduction from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per gallon of duties on wines between 26 and 40 degrees strength would be feasible. The proposals were next submitted to the Departments of the Customs and Inland Revenue. The Customs never grappled with the arguments which had been advanced on the subject, contenting themselves with saying that to admit wines at lower rates would unsettle a system arranged after very mature consideration. The Inland Revenue maintained that the effect of reducing the duties on strong wines, as proposed by the Board of Trade, would be to hold out a great temptation to the introduction of factitious wines, which it said were, in fact, merely spirit-mixtures, such as so-called Hamburg cherries. By that admission, in his opinion, the Inland Revenue conceded everything he contended for. If these Hamburg cherries were merely spirit-mixtures, he saw no reason why they should be introduced as wines; and if it was possible for the machinery of the Customs to stop sweetened brandies, as had happened of late repeatedly, it would, in his opinion, be equally easy for the same machinery, perhaps with some slight alteration in it, to put a stop to the introduction as wines of spirit-mixtures generally, and consequently of Hamburg cherries. The Board of Inland Revenue referred to the difficulty of preventing frauds, which they feared might arise if certain modifications were made. But he wanted to know whether fraud was prevented under the present system? He had been told that among traders of lax principles the practice was not unknown of mixing wines made at 1*s.* with wines of 42 degrees strength at 2*s.* 6*d.* a gallon, so that liquor which had paid really but 1*s.* 9*d.* duty per gallon was sold at rates as if it had paid on entry 2*s.* 6*d.* duty. The Government at that time, notwithstanding the views of the Customs and Inland Revenue decided that the standard at which the duty had been previously fixed was not one essential and vital to maintain for the security of the Revenue. In presence of adverse opinions by those Boards, the Government of the day had come to the conclusion to propose a certain reduction in the duties, and thereby admitted that the existing rates were not essential for the integrity of our fiscal systems. The reduction offered was not considered to have been sufficient, whereupon further inquiry was then instituted, particularly by the Board of Trade, whether a greater reduction might not be made. The matter was subsequently dropped, and he thought it one which a Special Committee might well investigate. The question turned practically on the point whether compound or factitious wines, spirit-mixtures, or Hamburg sherries could be introduced into this country at a price which would render illicit distillation formidable. The Board of Trade distinctly maintained the contrary with much detail of calculation. In reply, the Inland Revenue had pointed to results from experiments made on genuine Portuguese wines at £23 a butt; but such results were necessarily fallacious, and could not invalidate those arrived at by experiments on the only material that could be used for illicit purposes—factitious wines and spirit-mixtures like Hamburg sherries. The Board of Trade came to the conclusion that if the duties were reduced to 1s. 6d. all round on wine up to 40 degrees strength the maximum loss to the Revenue would be only £120,000 in excess of the loss which the Government was prepared for in its previous offer of reduction, and this calculation was never seriously challenged by the Inland Revenue. That brought the history of the question down to October, 1866. Considerable controversy existed with reference to many ancillary points. It was known that semi-musts and wines in an incomplete state of fermentation had not developed their full strength, yet the official inquiries instituted by Mr. Bernard on Portuguese wines had been made mainly on semi-musts, which could not be taken as fair samples of the strength of fully-developed wines. From that fact alone the House could draw its conclusions with regard to the practical value of the tests in use on the ground of such experiments. Lately, 200 samples of perfectly natural wines from Melbourne on being tested by the Customs officials yielded the following results:—Out of the 200, 121 were found to be from 27 to 32 degrees of alcoholic strength, and four more from 32 to 34 degrees. There could not be a more opportune moment than the present for the appointment of a Committee, which would be able to inquire into the condition on which the wine duties could be properly levied, and to conduct this inquiry with the advantage of all the knowledge accumulated on the subject during the last 15 years. He begged to move for the appointment of the Committee.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD, in seconding the Motion, observed, that it was now 24 years since the last inquiry was instituted on the subject, and since then a great deal of valuable experience had been gained, which it was desirable should be placed at the disposal of those who were interested in the subject. Until within a few days ago the question might have been argued on the ground of the preferential duties; but he understood that the Portuguese Government had at that short distance of time given up the excess of preferential duty. It was all very well to introduce alcoholic tests; but as long as they charged a duty of 2s. 6d. a gallon on countries producing strong wines, and 1s. a gallon on those which produced light wines, the former would look upon the lighter duties as being in nature and in fact preferential. The great question was whether the equalization of the wine duties would seriously endanger our Revenue, especially at a time when such large demands were made on it; but there was reason to believe that such would not be the case. Before the reduction of the duty we consumed, in round numbers, 7,000,000 gallons, the revenue from which was £1,900,000; but the consumption now was 17,300,000 gallons, and the revenue from it £1,712,000, or within £188,000 of the revenue before the reduction. It was objected that the increased consumption of the stronger wines would diminish the consumption of spirits, and thus the Revenue would be injured; but experience had shown that wine and spirits were drunk by different classes of persons, and even if there was a large reduction in the quantity of spirits drunk it would not be without its advantages. Then it was said that the effect would be to benefit the Cape Colonies; but it should be gratifying to us that the trade of the Cape should be benefited as well as that of a foreign country. The equalization of the duties would also enable us to abolish bonding, and in that way a great saving might be effected in the pay of our Customs House officers. For these and other reasons he hoped a Committee would be granted, and that the Government would show a disposition to meet in a fair spirit those countries which thought themselves unfairly treated.

Mr. W. Cartwright

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present system of levying the Customs Duties on Wine."—(Mr. William Cartwright.)

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, he did not know what course the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to take; but he was very much disposed to join his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire and the hon. Gentleman opposite in urging upon the right hon. Gentleman the wisdom of consenting to the inquiry now sought. The proposition which it was hoped the Committee would agree to, and that the evidence would lead them to was, on the whole, rather a simple one—namely, that the point at which a higher duty than 1s. was levied on foreign wines should not be fixed, as at present, at 26 degrees of alcoholic strength, but should be fixed at some higher degree, or should range from 36 to 40 degrees. Both sides of the House would admit, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer also would admit, that if such a change could be made, it would have the effect of extending our trade with other countries—in some degree with France, but notably with Spain, and probably to some extent with Portugal. The objection to such a proposal was one rather of fear than of fact. It was said that if they had a higher degree—that was, if they admitted stronger wines at the low duty of 1s., those wines would be made use of in this country for the purpose of making spirit, and that people could make a profit by doing that, and that the result would be that a fraud would be committed on the Revenue, and the Revenue would suffer. Now, if that were true, the objection was formidable, and one which the House could not, without great mischief, overlook. But it had been disputed; and he thought the evidence of opinion, on the whole, so far as he had been able to gather it, was stronger against that view than the contrary. His hon. Friend had quoted the opinions of the Revenue Department, the Customs Department, and the Board of Trade. Those opinions were conflicting, and giving each of them equal weight they were still left in the dark. He had been for some short time at the Board of Trade, and he recollected that this question was at that time very fully considered, and especially by one officer whose opinion was very valuable—he referred to Sir Louis Malet. The opinion of the Board of Trade was distinctly that it was perfectly safe to make the change proposed, and that it would be greatly advantageous to the country if that change were made. He took the trouble at that time to make some inquiry on his own account, and he had an interview with eminent authorities connected with the other Departments, and his conclusion was this:—that their opinion was not based upon facts clearly ascertained, but was based rather upon tradition and a kind of apprehension—a fear of allowing anything to be done that would in any way endanger the income which the Chancellor of the Exchequer received from those duties. He was not at all satisfied, from the conversation he had with those authorities, that the view they took was sound, or sustained by facts in such a manner as to justify the Government in adhering to the higher rate of duty. If those authorities were at variance, who should decide? The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked some one connected with the Inland Revenue, and he received one opinion; he made a similar inquiry of the Board of Customs, and he received a different opinion; he therefore made further inquiry at the Board of Trade, and he could only say if the officers of the Board of Trade were now what they were when he was there, they were persons on whom the greatest reliance might be placed. But if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was still in the dark, he would be left in the dark and be obliged to form his own opinion, or come to some other tribunal. But what tribunal was there so good as a Committee of that House for ascertaining the facts and opinions of all kinds of persons with respect to such questions? He did not say that men might not sit upon a Commission who had strong opinions in respect to the matter that came before them; but still he said a Committee of that House was an admirable tribunal for obtaining facts and evidence upon which Government and Parliament might form an opinion on a question of this nature. He asked the House, was not the question one of some importance? They had an enormous trade with other countries, almost all over the world. The great barriers to our trade over half the world were barriers of tariffs. There was scarcely any country in which trade was more restrictive, in which monopolies were more universal than in Spain. He recollected about six or seven years ago, just before he was withdrawn from the House for three or four years, he had a long conversation with the then Spanish Minister, who told him he felt certain that, if the English Government would make a change in the wine duties, and treat Spain as they treated France practically, so that their wines might be admitted at a low duty, he had no doubt whatever it would be possible to negotiate a Commercial Treaty with Spain, as they had already done with France, that would be highly advantageous to both countries. That, he thought, was a matter of great consequence. No doubt, of late years there had been a great demand for labour, wages had been high, and money had been plentiful; but that state of things did not last, and we were constantly interfered with by competition with other countries, and by the tariffs that existed in them. If they could, by Commercial Treaties or by making any concessions, introduce themselves to new customers, and bring their people into some closer communication with some other people, that was a great advantage—so great that it was not wise that an opinion founded on traditions, and on the fears of any of the Revenue Departments of the country, should be interposed against an inquiry of this nature, and against a great advantage which the country would gain, provided the view of his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire was correct. He believed it was correct, and therefore it would be greatly to the advantage of our export trade, and our trade generally, if the change to which his hon. Friend pointed could be made; and with that opinion he would urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consent to this Committee. There was no doubt great force in what had been said by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. S. Lloyd), that there had been no Commission of Inquiry into these duties for 20 or 25 years. Circumstances had greatly changed in that time. They appointed many Committees every Session, some of them for objects in which not much could be done. But here was a distinct proposition of great importance. If the views entertained by himself and by the hon. Gentleman opposite were correct, the country would suffer if the inquiry was not made, and the change which they hoped to be brought about might not be made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that in making these observations he had not the slightest wish to take any course of opposition to the Government, or to act in connection with any Party difference. The right hon. Gentleman was a free trader as much as he (Mr. Bright) was, and made a great speech the other day in a great hall dedicated to free trade. He was glad that, having withdrawn himself from that platform oratory, the right hon. Gentleman succeeded to it, and talked the doctrine he (Mr. Bright) had talked there 30 years ago. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would deal liberally in this matter, and allow this Committee to be appointed; and he believed that great good might and would result from it.

Mr. M. T. BASS observed, that it had been asserted that we had differential duties on wine. Now, he disputed that point. The duties on wine were uniform, and the additional duty was on the spirits that were added to the wine; and if strong wines were admitted into this country at 1s. per gallon it would be impossible to maintain a duty of 10s. per gallon on British spirits. He did not consider it necessary to refer the subject to a Committee, and he had it on the highest authority that 99 men out of 100 engaged in the wine trade were opposed to the proposed change in the wine duties. It had been said there was no prospect of illicit distillation. A great deal was said about Hamburg sherry. That was a very queer compound. It was distilled originally from potatoes, mangel wurzel, and other vegetables of that character. He should like to know what his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire had to complain of? He (Mr. Bass) did not think that Spain or Portugal had any reason to complain of the consumption of their wines in this country. In 1859, before the wine duties were altered, the consumption of Spanish wines in Great Britain was 2,780,000 gallons, while last year it reached 6,770,000 gallons. The consumption of Portuguese wines had been in the former year 2,200,000 gallons, and in the last year 3,887,000 gallons. He was not surprised that Portuguese wine did not increase at the same rate, for port was almost extinct. ["No, no!"] He could only say he was in the habit of entertaining his friends occasionally, and he only knew one friend who drank port wine. The wine, no doubt, bore a high character; but it was virtually extinct. During the last year the importation of Spanish and Portuguese wine was 10,657,000 gallons, while from all the rest of the world, including France, from which the importation had very greatly increased since the reduction of the duty, we had only imported 6,685,000 gallons. The brands that were most distinguished when he was in the wine trade, and which still remained so, had increased nearly 50 per cent in price; and if we reduced the duties on those highly-branded wines again, the Spanish and Portuguese would put the money into their pockets, and the English consumer would not be benefited. At the Vienna International Exhibition there were 284 samples of natural Spanish wine and 381 samples of Portuguese wine; one of the former, fortified, contained 57 per cent of spirit. He was persuaded that a man might drink two bottles of one of those natural wines with far less injury to his constitution than if he drank a pint of those brandied wines. Now, if wines with 57 per cent of spirit were allowed to be imported into this country at a duty of only 1s. a gallon, how would it be possible to maintain the 10s. duty on British spirits? As an illustration of the manner in which Spain and Portugal treated this country with regard to import duty, he might mention that on the article of bitter ale a duty of no less than 125 per cent was levied by Portugal. Our wine duties now yielded £1,700,000 per annum; whereas the duties on foreign and domestic spirits produced more than £20,000,000. They ought not, therefore, to allow that large revenue to be interfered with by the introduction of bad brandy in the form of wine at 1s. per gallon while the spirit duties were still kept at 10s. per gallon. The appointment of a Committee would, he thought, do a great deal of mischief and excite expectations which never could be realized.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that they had had a very interesting discussion, and also that they were indebted to the hon. Member (Mr. Cartwright) for the manner in which he had brought that question forward. He hoped the hon. Member would not consider him wanting in respect if he did not follow him into all the points which he had raised. He approached the subject with no feeling of prejudice against the cause advocated by the hon. Member. He appreciated highly the importance of cultivating good relations with Spain and Portugal, and developing, as far as possible, our trade with those countries. In 1866, as President of the Board of Trade, he had joined in fighting the battle to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, against what he then thought, and was still inclined to think, were the exaggerated fears of the Revenue Departments. He might also inform his hon. Friend who spoke last that he was very fond of a glass of the excellent wine he had described. But the question immediately before them was, not so much what was the proper scale of wine duties, as whether it was expedient to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into that subject, and he would confine himself to that point. A few days ago the hon. Member for Oxfordshire and some gentlemen connected with the London wine trade waited on him at Downing Street on that subject, and a leading member of the deputation said he hoped if the Committee were granted the Government would lose no time in acting on its recommendations; because nothing could be so mischievous to the trade as keeping it for a long time in suspense, expecting that alterations would be made, and then not to make those alterations. That was a statement so perfectly obvious that it was echoed by another gentleman, who, though inclined to favour the proposal of a Committee, yet intimated that if its Report was not to be acted upon he would prefer that it should not be appointed, because he did not wish the trade to be disturbed by a discussion which would render it impossible for them to carry on their business satisfactorily. Well, he could not but feel that there was very great justice in that; because the importers imported their wine a considerable time before it was brought into consumption, and had to consider what would be the price for which they would be able to sell it. It was very inconvenient for them to have large stocks in hand, which might not be entirely run out before any great alteration was made in the duty. He had been struck with a curious suggestion of the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. S. Lloyd) in regard to the drawback. That hon. Gentleman said that, taking into account what the quantity of wine imported in the year was and what the consumption was, they had nothing to do but to put off the reduction of the duty if they decided on it, and run out all the stock of wine in hand, and then there would be no trouble about the drawback. That might be a very pleasant doctrine for the hon. Member to enunciate; but it was not at all pleasant for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it would lead to their having no wine imported, and no wine revenue for a whole year. If the merchants were to hold back from importing because they expected some material change in the duty, the inconvenience to the trade would be great, and the loss to the Revenue very considerable. Well, what was the position of the question? They were told that they ought to have an inquiry into it now, because they had not had a Parliamentary Committee sitting upon it for some 25 years. The Committee, however, which sat in 1852 was a most influential one, and elicited a considerable amount of most valuable evidence. Since that time that evidence had received equally valuable additions from departmental inquiries, Commissions, and the various means which were always at the command of the Government of the day. But what was it that the advocates for this Committee were aiming at? He understood the hon. Member for Plymouth to say that what they were going for was an uniform duty on all kinds of wine. But the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) did not ask for a uniform duty at all; he said that we ought to raise the duty on the higher scale with which we had to deal, and that instead of 26 we ought to take 32, or something of that kind. Those were two very different proposals. If a Committee was appointed there would be all sorts of opinions among the Members; evidence would be given this way or that way as suited the different views of its Members; and there would be such a diversity of opinions that the conclusions arrived at would be of little value. After all, the responsibility must rest with the Government of the day, which had to consider not only these points, but fiscal questions generally, the condition of the Revenue, and the proper time for making proposals for alterations of taxation; and he could not but think that a Committee would be rather a hindrance than an assistance. To the deputation he had the honour of receiving the other day he pointed out that these were difficult questions, and asked how they could be solved before a Committee. The reply he received was that a Committee, largely acquainted with the subject, would be sure to arrive at valuable conclusions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham seemed also to think a Committee was a good instrument for arriving at the truth on questions like this; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had great doubts whether a Committee would be composed exclusively of Gentlemen acquainted with the subject. The House knew that in striking Committees a great many considerations came into play. It was necessary, for example, to strike a balance between one side of the House and the other, and to introduce Gentlemen connected with different parts of the United Kingdom. But the Committee would hardly be dealing with wine duties alone; for dealing with them affected, more or less, directly or indirectly, all kinds of alcoholic liquors, and this fact alone would lead to great conflict of opinion amongst the Members of which the Committee was composed. He was bound to say that, although he recognized the importance of the question, and agreed in the propriety of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire bringing it forward, and found no fault with the spirit in which it had been discussed, he felt that the disadvantages, which were inevitable, must far outweigh any good that might be derived from the appointment of a Committee. As the House would see, it would be very unfortunate if the Committee made recommendations which the Government, for fiscal reasons, could not carry out, or which might lead to embarrassment in our dealings with foreign countries. A good deal had been said of our Commercial Treaties with Spain and Portugal; but it should be recollected that any changes in them might affect our trading relations with France. With regard to foreign tariffs, he desired to see the system of free trade maintained and carried further; but he felt that we were approaching a critical point—the termination of our present Commercial Treaties. It was therefore important and necessary that every step we took should be guarded with great care. He hoped the success which had attended the liberal commercial policy emanating from this country, and which the right hon. Member for Birmingham had so large a share in initiating, would have its effect on foreign countries, which now felt its advantages without fully appreciating the principles from which those advantages were derived. For himself, he should like to see a large and comprehensive understanding come to by the Powers of Europe as to some common bases for tariffs. Some such international bases would be of inestimable advantage; but it was inconvenient just now to discuss large questions like these. As to the immediate question under discussion, he did not think the cause they all had at heart would be promoted by the appointment of the Committee, and, therefore, he hoped the Motion would not be agreed to.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he was as much in favour of the principle of free trade as the right hon. Member for Birmingham or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he was opposed to the Motion for the reasons he would shortly offer. In the first place, he would point out that while the spirit duties amounted to about £20,400,000, the wine duties did not in the aggregate reach £2,000,000. Yet enormous concessions had been made to the trade of those countries which were wine producers, and revenue was sacrificed in their favour, concurrently with an enormous increase in the duties levied upon home manufactured spirits. He would not say the only, but he might fairly say almost the only, home manufacture which remained to Ireland was that of spirits. The duty within the last 20 years on the spirits manufactured in Ireland and consumed there had been raised from £964,000 to about £3,460,000, although the consumption had not increased one gallon. England had practically the power of regulating the principles of free trade to the prejudice of Ireland and Scotland. It was impossible that those countries could take any measures to protect themselves, and therefore their duties had been raised to the highest point capable of endurance. He objected to granting any relief whatever to wine producers or wine consumers, whilst such an enormous amount of spirit duties was placed upon Ireland. As he believed the attention of the Committee was solely to be directed towards effecting a reduction of the duty on wine, and not on spirits, he should oppose the Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

TRALEE SAVINGS BANK.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE O'DONOGHUE, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed "to inquire into the case of the depositors in the late Tralee Savings Bank," said, it might appear at once that the subject was purely of a local character; but inseparable from it there was an Imperial principle upon which he relied. Although the failure of the bank occurred so long back as the month of April, 1847, the recollection of it was as fresh as ever in Tralee, and such of the depositors who were still living and their descendants had never for one moment abandoned the claim which they considered they had upon the Government for the money of which they had been defrauded. It was true that the subject had already been investigated by a Committee of the House of Commons; but he met that by saying that since the holding of that investigation circumstances had occurred which had greatly strengthened the claims of the depositors. When the failure occurred Mr. Tidd Pratt, a Government officer, proceeded to Tralee, investigated the circumstances, and made an award that a sum of £16,000 was due to certain depositors who had deposited their money previous to the passing of 7 & 8 Vict., and he awarded these sums against the managers and trustees of the bank. The Committee evidently thought that the awards of Mr. Tidd Pratt were good and binding, and that the £16,000 would have been recovered from the trustees and managers. However, that was not the case, for a verdict which had been obtained against the trustees in an action for £100, brought by a depositor, was after argument in the Court of Queen's Bench set aside, Chief Justice Blackburn, who delivered the unanimous judgment of the Court in favour of the defendant, observing that no action could be maintained on the awards, which were bad in form and in substance, and he added that he thought the depositors who had been deprived of their legal right by the insufficiency of the awards of a public officer had a moral and equitable claim to be recouped the amount of their awards. He believed that had the Committee been aware of these facts they would have dealt with this case as they had done with that of the Cuffe Street Savings Bank, and recommended the Government to compensate the depositors. A second class of depositors consisted of those who had lodged their money subsequent to the year 1844, and who by the change in the law made that year were deprived of the security which the other class of depositors had in the personal liability of the trustees and managers. The claim of the second class of depositors was founded on the facts that they were unaware of the change in the law, and that the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt had systematically violated the provisions of the Act 7 & 8 Vict., for the management of savings banks. These allegations were substantiated by the Report of a Committee of that House which some years ago sat to investigate the Tralee case. The Act required that bonds should be given by the officers of the bank and lodged with the clerk of the peace for the county and the National Debt Commissioners, but it was not enforced with regard to the actuary, nor was that fact made known to the depositors, by the neglect of which the actuary was able to carry on unchecked his system of fraud. The complaint was that the National Debt Commissioners, by their neglect, had contributed to the loss, and they being Government officers, the Government was liable for their acts of negligence. There was a striking difference between the Cuffe Street Bank and the Tralee Bank. The trustees of the former had actual notice of what was going on. There the Government called on the bank to have their accounts investigated, but the bank refused; but in the Tralee Bank, owing to the bungling and incompetence of the Government officer, the depositors were prevented from recovering £16,000 of their money, and therefore he was justified in expecting that the Government would not disclaim responsibility in the case of the Tralee Bank. There was still, he might add, a very small sum in the hands of the Commissioners, and he hoped the Committee for which he now begged to move would be able to suggest some course by which that amount might be made available for the depositors.

MR. HERBERT seconded the Motion, and said it would be a great boon to those poor people if they got back the money which they had deposited in ignorance of the fact that the trustees were no longer liable to them for their deposits.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of the depositors in the late Tralee Savings Bank."—(The O'Donoghue.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that he sympathized very much with those poor people in the loss which they had sustained; but the Government were in no sense responsible for the failure which occurred in 1847, owing to the defalcations of the actuary of the bank, which had, he believed, been going on for a considerable time. After the failure Mr. Tidd Pratt had gone over to Ireland, and, having inquired into the matter, had made some kind of award, by which the trustees of the bank were adjudged by him to be liable for a certain class of deposits. It appeared, however, that when an attempt was made to put the award into force it was found to be illegal, and that Mr. Tidd Pratt had not executed his duties in a proper manner. The consequence was that a Committee of the House of Commons had been appointed, which sat during one Session and a portion of two others, to investigate the claims of the depositors.

THE O'DONOGHUE: The invalidity of Mr. Tidd Pratt's awards was not discovered until after the Committee reported.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that would be important if it were the fact; but he found in a draft report which had been drawn up by the late Mr. Henry Herbert, a member of the Committee, that there was special reference made to the decision of Chief Justice Blackburn as to the invalidity of Mr. Tidd Pratt's award. The Committee, therefore, had the facts fully before them, and they reported that the cases of the Killarney and Tralee Savings Banks had no peculiar features differing from those of other banks that had suffered from the dishonesty of the directors. It was not desirable, therefore, that 25 years after another Committee should be appointed to review the proceedings of the previous Committee, and when many of the witnesses who were examined at that time, including Mr. Tidd Pratt, were dead. It would be a waste of time to do so, and it would be a hardship and a delusion towards those poor people, who no doubt treasured a sense of the wrong inflicted so long ago, that they should for a moment suppose that the House of Commons was likely now to do something for them. It was impossible that any Committee could take a different view from that appointed 25 years ago; and if they did it would be admitting a principle that would apply to every savings bank that failed in the United Kingdom. The Cuffe Street Savings Bank was a wholly different case; because there it was the action of the Government officers which more or less conduced to the loss, since Mr. Tidd Pratt, instead of recommending the winding up the bank, recommended that it should be continued, because he was afraid that by winding it up there would be a run on the other savings banks, and that great mischief would result therefrom; and then Parliament recognized the claim of the depositors by making a Vote of money in their favour. There still was, however, in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners a small sum of about £2,000, which undoubtedly belonged to the depositors in the savings banks if they could be got at. The Commissioners had always desired to give the money back to the trustees, if they would only undertake the responsibility of distributing it, but the trustees had always shrunk from assuming this responsibility. A short Act might be passed authorizing some person in whom confidence could be reposed to distribute the money among those who could make out their claims as depositors. Of course, the individual employed would be put to a great deal of trouble, and he must not be held responsible in regard to any claim which might be made upon him after the distribution.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 133: Majority 79.

RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS rose to call the attention of the House to the manner in which the Railway Passenger Duty injuriously affected the interests of the Railways and the public, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the Railway Passenger Duty ought to be reduced at an early date, with a view to its ultimate repeal.”

Having traced the history of the Railway Passenger Duty, and pointed out how the Stage-coach Duty had been repealed in 1869, and the Horse Duty in 1874, the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to argue that railways and stage-coaches had been placed in a false position towards each other, and that railway companies were subjected to a great injustice. It was often said, in justification of the continuance of this tax, that railways were a monopoly; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), in his Budget speech in 1870, had spoken of them as a somewhat qualified monopoly. The monopoly was certainly qualified, for it was difficult to point out in what it consisted. All the great centres of industry—Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow—had not only two but three railways competing with one another; and if in any case the injurious effects of monopoly were produced, there would be no difficulty in getting the House of Commons to bring the monopolists to their senses by wholesome competition. Besides stage-coaches, tramways, omnibuses, and canals competed with railways much more than hon. Gentlemen supposed. The average railway fare for all classes of passengers was 10½d. a journey. It followed, therefore, that a very large proportion of railway traffic must be at rates considerably less than 10½d. The average of passenger fares of all classes on the London and North-Western, with its great length, was 1s. 5½d., and of the third class 1s. 1d. The average fare of all classes on the London, Chatham, and Dover was 7d., and of the third class 5½d.; and on the Sheffield line it was very nearly the same. Omnibuses and tramways competed materially with the Metropolitan Railway, which carried passengers at an average of 2½d. per journey, and the Metropolitan District and the North London and South London lines were in much the same position as the Metropolitan. But it was not London only, but every great city of the Empire had its system of suburban railways, carrying an enormous number of people short distances at exceedingly low fares. It was argued that the railway companies were rich and could afford to pay this tax. That, however, was an argument which appeared to him to be the first step towards Communism, tending to dangerous results. The way in which he dealt with that argument was to deny that it was true. The railway companies, as a body, were not rich. In 1874 £38,000,000 of railway property paid no dividend whatever, and he did not believe that that figure had since been much lessened, and the average dividend of all the railway companies only amounted to £4 8s. per cent. There might be some sense if you were taxing companies which were really rich, but where was the propriety of taxing a company like the Great Eastern, which, after a great struggle, had paid a half per cent upon its ordinary stock; or the Cornwall Railway, which could only pay its preference shares by borrowing; or the Torbay Railway, which paid nothing even on its debentures? He supposed the tax would be exacted even if a company were unable to pay its working expenses. In the Report of the South Devon Railway Company for 1872 reference was made to the "undue and exceptional taxation to which this description of property is subjected," and at that time the Chancellor of the Exchequer and another Member of the Government were directors of the company. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, did not frame the Report, but it must have received his sanction, and railway shareholders might hope that he was still of the same opinion. The tax was not only an exceptional one; it restricted locomotion, and thus materially interfered with the commercial prosperity of the country. The late Sir Robert Peel, when stating his celebrated Budget in 1842, said that—

"Nothing but a hard necessity would induce him to derive revenue from locomotion;" and again, that "he should contemplate with great reluctance and regret the necessity of increased taxation upon railroads."—[3 Hansard, lxi. 435-6.]

This was an authority always listened to in that House with respect. There were other reasons why it was inexpedient at this time to impose these burdens on railways. New scientific appliances were costing the companies large sums. The block system cost the North-Western Company £250,000 a-year; and at the late inquiry into the Great Northern accident it was said by the officials that that company paid £80,000 a-year for the purpose of the block system. The price of labour, too, was largely increasing. In the Report of the North-Eastern Company for the last half-year the increased expenditure from this cause was set down at £46,000 a-year, and the Chairman of the Midland Railway Company indicated a somewhat similar sum. Nor was the tax itself small in amount, as was sometimes said. The London and North-Western paid in 1875 on this account £143,000; the Great Western, £92,000; the Great Eastern, £43,500, being rather more than they distributed in dividend; and the Great Northern, £36,400. The tax tended to become a perpetual annuity upon railways; and if capitalized at 4 per cent, at which sum the leading companies could borrow money, the tax would represent to the London and North-Western a capital sum of £3,600,000; to the Great Western, £2,300,000; to the Great Eastern, £1,100,000; and to the Great Northern, £920,000. If the companies raised these sums at 4 per cent, they would have to pay the interest, but would be able to expend the capital in improving their means of communication and increasing accommodation. The Great Northern Company were told, after the recent accident, that they should construct a new line. Such a line would cost more than £1,000,000, and the whole sum would be furnished if the duty were remitted, and the capital which it represented were raised by the company at the rate of 4 per cent. A recent judicial decision with reference to the Cheap Trains Act had brought the railway world and also the public to the conclusion that the time had come when the matter should be taken into consideration and finally and satisfactorily disposed of. The provision that in order to be exempt from that duty trains containing third class passengers must stop at every station on the line operated in the most absurd and oppressive manner, especially at a period when the railway companies had abandoned their formerly somewhat narrow and exacting spirit, and were now pursuing a more liberal policy towards the public, offering to the working classes, in particular, increased facilities for cheap and expeditious travelling, whereby their time, their only capital, was economized, their expenses on their journeys were reduced, and their personal comfort and convenience much increased. The short observation made by a man extremely well versed in railway affairs on the effect of that tax was that it greatly hampered managers in framing their time-tables. It also hindered their attempts to reduce fares and give increased accommodation, and its abolition would be as much for the interest of the public as for that of the shareholders. He hoped, therefore, that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer would be enabled to inaugurate a more sagacious policy, which would incite railway directors to a generous rivalry in the career of reduction and concession; and he confidently predicted that any immediate sacrifice which might thus be entailed on the Revenue would be recouped over and over again through the stimulus that would be imparted to the general trade and commerce of the country. It had been suggested that if the tax were reduced the railway companies ought to bind themselves to make some concessions to the public; but in bringing forward the question on behalf of the railway companies, and of the public, he assured the House that they asked, not for any favour, but only for justice, which in any country ought not even in appearance to be either bought or sold; and he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adhere to the constitutional declaration—"We will deny justice to no man, neither will we sell it." The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. Serjeant Spinks

COLONEL MAKINS, in seconding the Motion, expressed a hope that the Government would see their way to accept it, or, at least, to agree to the proposal which was to be made by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Rodwell) for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Railway Passenger Duty ought to be reduced at an early date, with a view to its ultimate repeal."—(Mr. Serjeant Spinks.)

MR. RODWELL rose to move, as an Amendment—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of the cheap trains."

The Amendment was by no means antagonistic to the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend, for he fully agreed with him in the views which he entertained and he prayed in aid of the facts which had been laid before the House; but he thought that the plan which he suggested was the proper way to deal with the question, as it would pave the way for future legislation. Injustice at present was inflicted in three ways—injustice on the railways in general, on the railways in particular, and on the public at large. The operation of the law was perfectly at variance with the spirit on which the Cheap Trains Act was framed—namely, to enable the working classes to have greater advantages in railway travelling. They were now in this position—they must either travel by stopping trains or pay something extra for their fare, for many lines had added 5 per cent to the third-class fares. The persons for whom cheap trains were originally intended had to suffer either in time or in money. This was not a matter which could be dealt with by an abstract Resolution. If there was a grievance it would be redressed, and the feeling had now grown up, not simply on the part of the railway shareholders, but on the part of the public, that the time had arrived when something should be done. He trusted that the Government would agree to the appointment of the Committee for which he asked.

MR. LEEMAN seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of cheap trains,"—(Mr. Rodwell,)
—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think the House would desire him at that moment to enter at large upon the question of the railway passenger duty. It was a large and difficult subject; and if he had only to deal with the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Sergeant Spinks), it would, of course, be necessary to enter at some length into it. But they had the alternative proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), and it seemed to him that the course which would be most convenient would be that he should accept the Amendment and agree to the appointment of a Select Committee for the purpose of—

"Inquiring into and reporting upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of the cheap trains."

The question of the railway passenger duty had been several times brought under his notice, and he had carefully considered whether the claims advanced by those who pleaded for the abolition of that duty were claims which he could recognize; but on looking closely into the matter, with a view to practical action, he found it by no means easy for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with it. One of the difficulties which he had always felt was this—that a question had been raised whether the tax ought to be taken off in the interests of the companies or of the travelling public. So far as the interests of the shareholders were concerned, the question, no doubt, was one which would deserve consideration; but if they were to be relieved of the burden which had been borne since railways began, and which had been voluntarily undertaken, it was reasonable and fair to ask on behalf of the public what advantage the public were to derive in return from the abolition of the tax. Besides that question, there was the further one, which was more directly pointed at in the Amendment. When first the railway system was brought under the serious notice of Parliament, a desire was felt on the part of the Legislature to promote travelling, and it was at that time supposed that railway travelling must necessarily be expensive, and that, therefore, it would never be worth the while of the companies to run trains at low rates to suit the working classes. It was thought desirable to introduce clauses into the Act of Parliament requiring the railway companies to run trains likely to be useful to the working classes; and in order to make that obligation less unpalatable to the companies it was accompanied in the case of those particular trains by the remission of the railway passenger duty. It now became a question with regard to the working classes themselves whether the particular stipulations made for the benefit of those classes really conduced to their benefit or not, and whether it might not be actually to the advantage of the travelling public that the companies should be set free to make the best provision they could, untrammelled by any legislation on the subject. He felt that, under the circumstances of the present day, it was exceedingly probable that the obligations laid upon the directors and managers of railway companies, especially as they had now been interpreted by Courts of Law, might interfere with their making the best possible arrangements for the convenience of the working classes, and they might also lead to unnecessary inconvenience to the railway companies themselves. That was a point they would have to consider. They had also to bear in mind that since railways were introduced a great change had occurred in the circumstances under which the working classes used the railways. It was impossible in dealing with the question to leave out of sight the cognate question of the dwellings of the working classes. The House must see that legislation and the efforts of the Government were now directed towards removing to a great extent the working classes from the centres of industry and sending them, very much for the benefit of their health, to some little distance from the place of their employment; but unless they could have the advantage of cheap, rapid, and frequent locomotion that benefit would be considerably diminished and neutralized. The difficulty was to devise some means by which to mitigate and meet this inconvenience; and on one occasion when a deputation connected with the metropolitan railways discussed this question he asked them whether they could propose any plan by which passengers by third class trains should receive a greater benefit than they did. He was, however, afraid that they were not at that time able to make any practical suggestion for the attainment of the object which they had in view; but he was prepared to have the question fully sifted, to see whether some practical solution of it could not be found. Nothing would give him greater pleasure than that the Government should be able so to re-arrange the system of passenger duty as to give encouragement to workmen's trains and greater facilities to those by whom they were used. Leaving, then, the large question open, he had great satisfaction in supporting the Amendment.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he did not propose to oppose the Amendment, because to do so would be useless, as it was to have the support of the Government; but if the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) took a division on the Main Question he should certainly vote with him, because he looked upon a tax on locomotion as next to one on food—as almost the worst that could be imposed; and he should like to have it plainly seen whether the Government were in favour of such an imposition or not, while if a Committee were appointed, the House and the country would remain in happy ignorance of their views on the subject.

MR. FAWCETT also expressed a hope that the hon. and learned Member for Oldham would press his motion to a division—not for the same reason assigned by the hon. Member who had just sat down, but in order to afford Her Majesty's Government an opportunity of meeting the proposal not by a side wind but by a direct negative, so that the country might ascertain the opinion of the House on the subject. He protested against the Select Committee policy of a Government which called itself strong, but which did not appear to be capable of making up its mind on a single subject. Representing as he did a constituency (Hackney) in which there were a great number of working men, he had not received a single application asking him to support the repeal of the passenger duty, while he could not go into the Lobby of the House without being pestered with solicitations from railway directors and others interested in railways to lend his assistance to get rid of the tax. Now, let him suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced it that evening to be his intention to repeal it; what would be the result? Would there be the smallest security that the public would receive one bit better railway accommodation? No; but the evening papers to-morrow would certainly contain statements to the effect that the railway market was remarkably firm, and that there was a rise of 3 or 4 per cent in Metropolitan, South Eastern, and London and Brighton stock. He did not, he might add, know what the Report of the proposed Committee would be, or how many railway directors would be upon it; but in order to give the public fair warning not to speculate in railway shares because of its appointment, he thought that, as a matter of common honesty, it could not be too explicitly stated that there were some hon. Members in the House who would resist as strenuously as they could the remission of an important branch of revenue in order to benefit those who happened to have invested in a particular kind of property. This was a question in which railway directors and shareholders were much more interested than the public. He was filled with the utmost astonishment that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose finance was generally sound, did not meet this proposition in a bolder spirit. What was the argument for it? It was said that the railways were unjustly treated and exceptionally taxed, because they had to pay a certain duty from which omnibus and cab proprietors and other owners of locomotion were exempt. But that was an obvious fallacy. The railways were a monopoly. That House gave them a locus standi to oppose any Bill for the purpose of making a competing line. Suppose the London and Brighton Railway was paying 10 per cent and a new line were projected, the House had given the company the right to step in and oppose it—a right which had been frequently exercised under such circumstances by the existing companies. But if the General Omnibus Company were paying 10 per cent there was nothing to prevent anybody from starting fresh omnibuses and participating in that profitable trade. The one was a monopoly and the other was perfectly open, and that distinction made all the difference as to burdens placed upon locomotion. This duty produced £700,000, which, capitalized at 30 years' purchase, would produce £20,000,000; and the proposal meant simply to transfer that sum to the pockets of the shareholders, for not a penny of it would ever reach the public. The Government did not like to meet the proposition with a direct negative, and the Amendment afforded them a convenient means of escape. The plea of injustice was utterly untenable. When the proprietors of the Metropolitan, which was always put forward as the strongest case, came to that House and asked permission to make a railway, they knew perfectly well that their line would not carry goods, but chiefly passengers, and they knew also that this duty would be charged upon them. They said nothing then of injustice or harsh treatment—or of being subject to special taxation—it was not till they had made their railway that they spoke in that tone. No injustice, therefore, was done either to investors or constructors, unless some new conditions or burdens had been imposed since they obtained their line. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) was drawn in such elastic language that it would permit the whole subject to be opened by the Committee, which might—so far as the terms of the reference went—report that they had taken evidence, and upon that recommend the total abolition of the passenger tax. They might add, “especially having view to the working classes,” but that would only be a bit of empty ornamentation. What would be the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or of his possible successor, when he had not got a shilling of Revenue to spare—when the expenditure was increasing, and the Revenue not particularly prosperous—when he would be at his wits' end for money to carry out his grandiloquent scheme for getting rid of the National Debt—if this Committee came down and recommended the immediate repeal of this tax, which produced £700,000 a-year? The Chancellor of the Exchequer would then be convinced he had been guilty of a dangerous abnega-

tion of power in referring this question to a Select Committee instead of at once deciding against it for himself. Now, at railway meetings directors occasionally indulged in tall language, threatening to abolish workmen's trains and do other things to diminish the accommodation of travellers. He thought, however, that the working men and the public might be quite comfortable, for the more inconvenient and costly travelling was made, the worse it was for the railway companies themselves. If this condition did not apply, the monopoly of railway companies could not continue for a week. It was said that an additional 5 per cent had been charged by some railway companies upon a portion of their traffic, and that this was the price which the working classes must pay as long as the tax continued. But what security was there that, if the tax were repealed, fares would be reduced? It would be as reasonable to expect a tailor or a bootmaker to work from philanthropic motives as it was to expect a railway company to charge under any circumstances any other fares than those which would pay the best. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on behalf of the public, should exact some definite equivalent from the railway companies in lower fares or better accommodation before surrendering this £700,000; but he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman did not, in answer to this Motion for a Select Committee, adopt the unanswerable arguments which he had urged earlier in the evening against the appointment of a Select Committee upon the Wine Duties.

Mr. HERMON said, that he knew from experience that the working classes were well able to take care of themselves, and did not value the patronage of hon. Members in that House. He thought the better course to adopt would be for the House to leave altogether out of consideration the reference to a Select Committee, and vote on the direct Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks). Railway companies had gone into business of late years with their eyes open, and they could not complain of injustice by the continuance of the duty. Many trades had to pay duty for the privilege of their being carried on, and the railway companies having taken upon themselves the carrying monopoly they must submit to the terms that had been imposed and the public must put up with the inconvenience. If a Committee was appointed it should be entrusted to inquire not merely as to the reduction or repeal of the tax, but as to the benefits which the public were to have in return for the surrender of so much annual Revenue.

Mr. LAING said, he would advise the hon. and learned Member for Oldham to withdraw his Motion, and let a division be taken on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge-shire for a Select Committee. If ever there was a question proper for a Select Committee, it was this question of the passenger duty. The speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) afforded the strongest argument for reference to a Select Committee, for a speech more full of fallacies and mis-statements he had never heard. If a Select Committee was agreed to, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would be a Member of that Committee, and he (Mr. Laing) would undertake to produce evidence that would refute every one of the assumptions which pervaded his speech. The hon. Gentleman contended that the travelling public had no interest in the remission of the duty. But the fact was the travelling public would be benefited immediately by its abolition to the extent of one-third, though the chief advantage would be that it would cease to hamper the time table. In the Brighton Railway, with which he (Mr. Laing) was more immediately connected, they had not waited for the action of Parliament or of the Government, though the burden was felt; but out of the 22,000,000 of passengers annually carried 20,000,000 were third-class passengers, and the average fare of each passenger was only 10½d. Was it to be supposed that they would not be benefited? The hon. Gentleman had himself admitted that it would be a hardship on railway proprietors if they found themselves in a different position from what they were in when they applied to Parliament for permission to make their lines. But what railway proprietors complained of was that they were in a different position, because until lately there was a duty on all other kinds of locomotion, and the railway tax had been fixed in relation to that duty, and imposed exactly as an equivalent. But while the taxes on locomotion generally had been abolished the railway passenger duty remained. In his judgment, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not have acted fairly, either to the railway interest or to the public, if he refused a Select Committee to investigate all the circumstances, and see whether it was not possible to devise some modification of the laws relating to cheap trains which would enable the companies to give larger accommodation to the public without seriously trenching on the revenue.

Mr. GREGORY, though seldom agreeing in the views of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), confessed that he concurred in a great deal of what had fallen from him on this subject. The question simply involved one main point. It was whether £700,000 a-year which was now paid by the railway companies should be taken off their shoulders and shifted on to the shoulders of somebody else. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could certainly not afford such a reduction, and if there was any change it must be of the nature he had suggested. But why should railway companies be excepted from special taxation? There were many other classes in this country who had to pay special taxes. Brewers, auctioneers, publicans, and others had to do so. The profession to which he belonged had to pay special taxes, both while students were preparing to enter it and after they had entered it. The common notion was that there was a monopoly in these cases which justified the special tax, but in fact in the legal profession the road was open to all; in the railways it was only open to those who could comply with the conditions laid down by the companies, and they were therefore close and practical monopolies. He could not help thinking that if the railway companies had avoided their internecine quarrels and contests they would have been under no necessity of asking for a remission of taxation to make up their dividends. He quite agreed that if any inquiry was made by a Select Committee it should distinctly include what the public were to receive in return for the surrender of the £700,000 a-year to the railway companies.

Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN would not have taken part in the debate but for the speeches of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) and the hon. Member for West Sussex (Mr. Gregory).

The latter hon. gentleman had found fault with the South Eastern Railway Company; but speaking as a director of that Company he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would say that it had no desire to avoid but would rather court investigation into its affairs and management. The hon. Member for Hackney, giving his opinions with great confidence and as if they were such as could not be controverted, was very vehement in his condemnation of railway shareholders and directors. But the principle of a tax upon locomotion was either right or wrong, and if wrong, why should it be retained in one particular instance, merely because, whilst the public would be benefited by its abolition railway shareholders would also be incidentally benefited at the same time. But he begged to ask, if the hon. Member for Hackney was in favour of a tax on locomotion, where was that hon. Gentleman when the duty was taken off omnibuses and stage coaches? Was his voice equally raised against the repeal of the latter tax as it was raised that night in favour of the retention of the railway passenger duty? On the other hand, if taxes on locomotion were objectionable in principle, on what just ground were railway companies to remain subject to them while their competitors had been relieved from them? The hon. Member for Hackney might feel a particular aversion to railway directors and shareholders, but they were persons who stood in the van of a great public improvement, for the execution of which they had risked their capital; and it could not be denied that they had secured to the country enormous national benefits. Moreover, it should be recollected that whilst the omnibuses and stage-coaches paid nothing towards the maintenance and repair of the roads upon which they travelled, and which they cut up considerably, the contrary was the case with the railway companies. They not only bore the whole expense of repairing and maintaining the roads on which their trains ran, but those very roads were rated to the poor rates to a very large amount. This rating was based upon no principle such as regulated general rating, but a railroad which so far from injuring a rural parish, brought to it wealth and prosperity, afforded employment to its inhabitants and added largely to its rateable value, was itself in many instances exceedingly highly rated in proportion to other property, and in every case contributed very largely to local taxation. The passenger duty was placed on them at a time when it was deemed desirable to equalize the taxes on locomotion, and now that their rivals had been freed from those imposts the railway companies only expected to be treated with fair play. As, moreover, the effect of a recent judicial decision had been greatly to increase their burdens, they were surely entitled to ask the House whether it really intended them to labour under that aggravated disadvantage. On a great question of policy it might not be right for the Government to have recourse to a Select Committee; but this was a matter of a social nature, and one well fitted to be referred to such a body. The hon. Member for Hackney, when he contended that the money would go into the pockets of the shareholders, was probably judging from what occurred on the repeal of the omnibus and stage coach duty, which he did not oppose. For his own part, he could not help thinking that this burden on railways was unjust, considering the great amount of wealth and prosperity which they had spread throughout the country—and he would recommend the House to agree to the appointment of the Committee.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, the General Omnibus Company had reduced their fares 50, nay in some instances, 100 per cent when the stage carriage duty was abolished, and he wished to know if the railway companies would, if they got rid of the passenger duty, act with the same amount of liberality?

MR. MACDONALD believed that the movement had been set on foot by railway directors, railway managers, and railway shareholders, to increase their profits or dividends, and expressed his regret that the Government had consented to the appointment of a Committee, for the Motion did not afford the slightest hope that the case of the working classes would receive proper consideration. The tax every railway company knew of when they got their Bills—in fact, they bought them with those conditions. It was no answer that some of them did not pay; all trades might as well come under the Government and ask to be relieved of their legal obligations because they did not pay as railway companies.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MAJOR DICKSON said, that if railways were to be taxed because they were a monopoly, he did not see why tramways should not be taxed also. He approved the appointment of a Committee.

MR. M'LAREN would vote against both the Motion and the Amendment. It would be a most improper and ill-judged thing to reduce the tax. He quite agreed with those hon. Members who had complained that the working classes had been put forward as a sort of stalking-horse. He did not believe, if the duty were reduced, that it would materially affect the working classes. He could not understand why there should be this patronizing of the work-classes. The working classes were, in his opinion, the most independent class in the country. There was no class better able to take care of itself. The working classes did not need to be patronized—they did not want to be patronized. They did not want any favour—nothing but equal justice, and if that was given them they would ask for nothing more. If the Amendment did not indicate a reduction of the duty and a desire to abolish it, then it was altogether meaningless and a mockery. Why should there be a Committee at all? The question had been so well argued, and his views had been so well expressed by the hon. Member for Preston, that he felt he should be wearying the House if he proceeded further; but, in conclusion, he wished to say that he should vote both against the original Motion and against the Amendment.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS said, he was willing to withdraw his Resolution in favour of the Amendment. ["No!"]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of cheap trains,' be added, instead thereof."

MR. FAWCETT, in order to render the appointment of a Select Committee as little injurious as possible, moved to add the following words—

"And further to inquire what additional accommodation for the public may fairly be demanded from the Railway Companies as an equivalent for the reduction or the abolition of the Duty."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add, at the end thereof, the words

"and further to inquire what additional accommodation for the public may fairly be demanded from the Railway Companies as an equivalent for a reduction or the abolition of the Duty."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had heard the speech of the hon. Member with surprise, but he had heard his Amendment with astonishment. He had declared his object was to restrict the inquiries for the Committee, but his Amendment would greatly enlarge them. If they were to get into the question of what railway companies should give in return for the reduction of the tax, they would be dealing with that which he was anxious the Committee should avoid. He should certainly oppose the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be added at the end of the proposed Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 113: Majority 72.

Question put,

"That the words 'a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effects upon the working of cheap trains,' be added to the word 'That' in the Original Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 23: Majority 144.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of the present Law relating to the Railway Passenger Duty, and especially as to its effect upon the working of cheap trains.

And, on March 23, Committee nominated as follows:—Lord CLAUD HAMILTON, Sir HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, Earl PERCY, Mr. ARTHUR PERL, Mr. BRUCE, Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGGESSEN, Mr. JAMES CORRY, Mr. ASHLEY, Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, Mr. SAMUDA, Mr. Serjeant SPINKS, Mr. SULLIVAN, Sir JOHN KENNAWAY, Mr. M'LAGAN, and Mr. RODWELL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

And, on March 29, Sir JOHN KENNAWAY disch., Mr. MACDONALD, Viscount CRICHTON, and Mr. LEIGHTON added.

MUNICIPAL OFFICERS SUPERANNUATION BILL—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Birley, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Cawley, Mr. Kirkman-Hodgson, Mr. Torr.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. FIELDEN moved that the Bill be committed that day six months, on the ground that it imposed an additional burden on the ratepayers of the country.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," — (Mr. Fielden,) — instead thereof.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON strongly opposed the Bill, on the ground that it was most unfair to impose such a measure on the whole country simply because the corporation of Liverpool wished to deal generously with some of its old servants.

MR. ANDERSON supported the Amendment, and observed that if it were true that the Bill was introduced in consequence of certain municipal arrangements intended at Liverpool, it was a vicious precedent, which the House would do well to avoid.

MR. RYLANDS stated that he had received a letter from Liverpool informing him that the Bill was only supported in the corporation by a majority of 25 to 24, against an amendment proposing that the municipal employes should form a superannuation fund from which they might receive annuities on their retirement either from old age or infirmities. He believed the principle of the Bill to be most vicious.

MR. HERMON said, he had been requested by the Mayor and Corporation of Preston to give every opposition to this measure.

MR. RATHBONE said, it would be found by a reference to the Petitions that the Bill was generally desired by the boroughs. The superannuation it proposed was more limited than was possessed by any other public bodies. He had found, in taking out the calculations for Liverpool in order to ascertain how much would be the extreme amount of superannuation that could be given under the Bill, that if the Town Council were to superannuate every man who could be so dealt with at the highest rate the Bill would allow, the result would be that on a total of salaries amounting to £45,770 they could only superannuate 12 persons, and the total cost would be £1,100, for which they would get 12 active young men in place of 12 men over 65 years of age, or who were incapacitated by illness. He maintained that nothing was more expensive than to retain inefficient servants, especially in borough corporations, where there was much work to do and where there were large sums of money to be disposed of. He appealed to the spirit, fair play, and justice of the county Members, who had such large powers in their own hands, and who could superannuate their servants to a much greater extent than was proposed in the Bill, not to oppose a measure that would only tend to give municipal bodies powers to secure efficient administration which they themselves possessed, and constantly found it desirable to use. He trusted the House would agree to go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had received a telegram from the corporation of Sheffield asking him to support the Bill. He believed that it would be a measure of economy; because it would enable the municipal corporations to appoint young and efficient officers, instead of retaining old servants who had become unfit for their duties, and whom they did not like to discharge because they could not give them a retiring allowance.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, he was astonished to hear such a statement from the hon. Member for Sheffield. Why did not corporations do as the counties did with the police, who paid a certain amount in order to get retiring pensions? He should vote for the Amendment.

MR. WILSON supported the Bill.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the objection to the Bill appeared to be based on the assumption that the municipal corporations of the country could not be trusted to grant pensions to their servants when they were incapable of serving them longer. If the corporations were corrupt, the Government ought to bring in a Bill for their reform; but efficient service could not be obtained without means of superannuation.

MR. E. J. REED said, he could not support the Bill, as he had not heard any intimation that corporations would be discouraged from giving pensions to persons who had all their lives been paid full salaries on the assumption that they would not receive pensions.

MR. COLMAN believed that the Bill would increase local taxation, but would lead to promote efficiency.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON argued that the Bill simply met a demand of humanity.

MR. HEYGATE said, he could not vote for conferring a power of this kind on corporations until they were cleared from suspicion of political jobbery.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 88: Majority 20.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Committee put off for six months.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to the administration of justice in Civil Causes in the ordinary Sheriff Courts in Scotland; and for other purposes relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary Cross, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

House adjourned at a quarter before Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 8th March, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — East India (Chief Justices of High Courts)* [98]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)* [99].

First Reading—Sheriff Courts (Scotland)* [96].

Second Reading—Game Laws (Scotland) [3]; Homicide Law Amendment [75], debate adjourned.

Committee—Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies) (re-comm.)* [93]—R.F.

Committee — Report — Partition Act (1868) Amendment* [73-97].

Third Reading—Epping Forest* [66], and passed.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 3.]

(Mr. McLagan, Sir William Stirling Maxwell, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Mr. John Maitland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'LAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Mr. Speaker, I trust that it will not be considered out of place if I give in a few sentences a short history of the game legislation of recent years. In 1845, on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws. This Committee, which sat for two years, recommended certain modifications of the Game Laws, some of which have been since carried out. These changes, however, did not diminish the preservation of game, or allay the dissatisfaction which was due to it. On the contrary, the slaughtering of hand-fed pheasants had become such a fashionable pastime, and dignified by the name of sport, that every exertion and precaution were used to produce them in as great numbers as possible for the battues; and the evils of this excessive preservation of both winged and ground game were thus greatly increased. The dissatisfaction caused by this state of things among the population in certain parts of the country was so great that the game question was again forced upon the attention of the Legislature. Session after Session in the Parliaments of 1865 and 1868, Bills were introduced with the object of remedying these evils, and in 1871 and 1872 the zeal of Game Law reformers reached its height, if we may judge from the number of Bills introduced—namely, nine. We had the Bill of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham Martin), which gave the tenant an inalienable right to the rabbits; while the hon. Member for Leicester's (Mr. P. A. Taylor's) provided for the withdrawal of all protection from game. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Hardcastle) made game, and even rooks and wood pigeons, property. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and the Lord Advocate of the day, Lord Young, proposed to base all legislation in game on contracts; while the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Loch) prohibited contracts in hares and rabbits. The hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown) proposed to repeal the Poaching Act of 1862. The hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) declared that no contract in game would be valid if inserted in an agricultural lease or agreement: and I proposed to exclude hares and rabbits from the game list. It was no wonder that when such a covey rose the House was bewildered and felt at a loss at which bird to aim, and the consequence was that all escaped and died a natural death in some neighbouring preserve. But, Sir, the House, dreading a repetition of such an infliction, assented to the proposal to refer the question to a Select Committee, that refuge for the destitute, or a Royal Commission, that extinguisher of a disagreeable question. The former was chosen, and the game legislators were sent up stairs to inquire further into the subject, to fight out their battles, and try to agree upon some proposal which would also satisfy the House. Two years were spent by this Committee in its investigation. It was generally reported that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Hunt), who presided over that Committee with such ability and fairness, had prepared a Bill embodying the views of the majority of the Committee to be introduced in the Session of 1874. That unfortunate Dissolution, however, which caused the opposing parties to change sides in this House, propelled the right hon. Gentleman from the front Opposition bench to the Treasury bench, and invested him with the responsibilities of office, deprived the House and the country of his attempts to settle the question. Those of the Committee who were in the minority considered themselves justified, from the number who voted on one of the principal propositions in the Committee—namely, that hares and rabbits should be excluded from the Game list—in also embodying their views in a Bill. It was intended at first to apply this Bill to the United Kingdom, but being deprived of the aid of some friends representing English constituencies on the other side, and who were unwilling to embarrass their Leaders in their new and unexpected position, I introduced the Bill as extending only to Scotland. That Bill differed in certain particulars from those I had previously brought in but agreed with them in the main provisions. In my first attempt at amending the Game Laws, I adopted the programme of the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, which consisted of four provisions, namely—1st, That hares and rabbits should be struck out of the game list; 2nd, that cumulative punishments should be abolished; 3rd, that the jurisdiction in prosecutions under the Game Laws should be transferred from the Justices of the Peace to the Sheriffs; and that there should be a cheap and easy mode of obtaining compensation for damages done by game. The Bill of 1874, in addition to these provisions, contained others recommended by the Committee, and was, upon the whole, more ambitious in its scope and character, for it attempted not merely to amend, but to consolidate all the existing Game Acts of Scotland. The Bill which I have now the honour to ask the House to read a second time is only a part of the last one. It contains three of the provisions of my first Bill—namely, the abolition of cumulative punishments, the transference of the jurisdiction from the justices of the peace to the sheriff, and a cheap and easy mode of obtaining compensation for game damages; and a modification of the fourth—namely, the striking of hares and rabbits out of the Game list only as regards the tenant, and not as regards the public as in my former Bill. In dealing with this question, I have attempted to find some common ground on which all Game Law reformers could meet. We all agree in three of the provisions mentioned above, and also that the tenant should have the full control of the ground game, or, at all events, that some means should be adopted for keeping them in reasonable numbers. The two principal proposals made for accomplishing this object are that hares and rabbits should be struck out of the Game list. The second is that they should be made the joint property of the landlord and the tenant, and that the tenant shall not be allowed to part with that right. The objection made to the first proposal is, that if you strike hares and rabbits out of the Game list, you throw open the fields of the tenant and the woods of the landlord to poachers. In other words, you invoke the aid of the poacher to keep down the number of those animals. The answer to this objection is, that if they are kept in reasonable numbers by the landlord, as they should be, there will be no temptation to the poacher to trespass on his lands in pursuit of game. There can be no doubt that this proposed plan would be effectual in keeping down the number of hares and rabbits. The objections against the other proposal—namely, to give a joint and inalienable right in hares and rabbits to the tenant—are, first, you will either have two game preservers instead of one, or you will do away with all game. It is said that a tenant exercising his right of killing the hares by the gun, frightens the winged game from the farm and thus destroys the sport of the landlord. Second, this proposal would prove quite ineffectual, for those who make it do not conceal that they are of opinion that it can be easily evaded; for a landlord has only to say in the beginning of the lease, if this were the law, that the rent of the farm would be, say, £400 so long as the tenant did not interfere with the ground game, but it would be in his option to make it £450 if he did interfere with them, or pressure would be put upon the tenant in some other way, which would be worse than any damage he might receive from the hares and rabbits. A third objection made to the proposal is that the passing of a law which can be so easily and flagrantly evaded tends to the demoralization of the people. Parliament has expressed its opinion upon this mode of dealing with the question in no unequivocal way. In 1870, when the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham Martin) introduced his Bill, giving the tenant an inalienable right to the rabbits, the feeling of the House was so strong against it that he was obliged to withdraw his Bill. In the following year 85 voted for the hon. Member for Wick's (Mr. Loch's) Bill, containing a similar provision, and 154 against it; and last Session the hon. Member for Forfar's (Mr. Barclay's)

Bill, giving a joint and inalienable right to the tenant of all wild animals but the feathered game, was thrown out, only 66 voting for it, and 178 against. If the House will allow me, I shall read the opinion of one of the most distinguished tenant-farmers in Scotland on this provision. He says:—

"I cannot see how this proposal is to benefit the honest farmer. I should not like to suppose there is a single person in this room whose word is not as good as his bond, so that if on becoming a tenant he gives his word of honour that he will protect hares or rabbits, what good will Mr. Loch's Bill do him? On taking a farm we should have to pass our word to protect both hares and rabbits. I deny that Mr. Loch's Bill can give these animals to the honest tenant, while it may have the effect of preventing honest tenants getting leases, in case they should afterwards turn dishonest."

Again, in reference to this proposal to interfere with contracts in Mr. Loch's Bill, the same gentleman said—

"The tenants were not so imbecile as to require to go hat in hand to the Legislature, and ask them to protect them from their own acts."

These are the words of Mr. George Hope when he was tenant of Fentonbarns; and, however many in this House may differ from him in some of his opinions, all must admit that he is a man of strong common sense, of great shrewdness, of undoubted ability, of great practical knowledge, and is generally considered at the same time a good exponent of the views of the tenant-farmers of Scotland. In the Bill under consideration I propose to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England in giving to the tenant the right to the game, unless reserved by the landlord, as recommended by the Committee in 1873. To make such reservation effectual the amount of damage agreed upon to be done annually to the crops of the tenant must be mentioned in the lease, and if the damage does not exceed the sum mentioned the tenant shall not be entitled to compensation, but if it does exceed the sum he will be entitled to compensation. The landlord will be assessed upon this sum for rates and taxes. One objection made to this provision is that it is not practicable—that it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the landlord and tenant to agree upon the amount of damage likely to be done to the crops annually for 19 or 21 years. Now, my answer to this is the general public. The clause for recovery of damages is very simple. A tenant feeling himself aggrieved that the damage done to his crops has exceeded the sum mentioned in the lease, intimates the same to the landlord. If the landlord agrees with the tenant to appoint arbiters to value the damages, the question may be said to be settled; but if he does not, an application is made to the sheriff, who forthwith appoints arbiters. The report of the arbiters being approved of by the sheriff, the sheriff delivers his judgment, which shall be final. In the event of its being found that the damage done to any one crop is less than the sum in the lease, and that there is no probability of damage being done to any other crop in the same year, the sheriff shall refuse the claim, and find the lessee liable in expenses; but if there is the probability of damage to other crops of that year, the sheriff shall postpone his judgment till all the crop is raised or reaped. If the whole damage exceeds the sum stated in the case, the sheriff shall certify the amount of such excess, and find the lessor liable in expenses. In proposing that the jurisdiction should be transferred from the justices to the sheriffs, I mean no reflection on the former, but merely that there should be greater confidence in the administration of justice. It cannot be denied that the man accused of being in pursuit of game, when brought before a bench of justices, is suspicious that the judgment of those who are to try him will be biased against him, and that he will not have fair play, as they are all more or less game preservers; and it may be that at some time he was charged with trespassing in pursuit of game on the land of one or more of the gentlemen who are to try him. The Legislature has always been most careful that the administration of justice shall not suffer in the opinion of the people from the slightest suspicion of self-interest in any of the judges influencing his judgment. Hence it is that a baker is not allowed to act as a justice under the Bread Act, or a brewer or distiller or retailer of exciseable liquors under the Licensing Act, or an occupier, or father, son, or brother of an occupier under the Factory Act, or a coal master or tenant of coal works under the Mine Acts, or a master in any particular trade or manufacture under the Combination

Act. The last provision of the Bill to which I shall call direct attention is, that no person shall be prosecuted more than once under the Game Acts for the same offence. At present a person being in pursuit or unlawfully in possession of game may be prosecuted for being in pursuit of game during the day or night, as the case may be. If the trespass is in close time he may be prosecuted by 13 Geo. III. c. 54, and then he may be prosecuted under the Poaching Prevention Act for unlawfully having game in his possession. He is at the same time also open to prosecution under the Game Qualification Acts, 1621, and he may also be prosecuted for killing game without having a game certificate; so that he may be prosecuted four times for the same offence. I am not going to mention the Gun Licensing Act, but it is a fact that they also prosecute a man for killing game without a gun licence. These are the main provisions of the Bill, and I trust I have explained them to the full satisfaction of the House. I think I have done so, and in moving the second reading I do entreat the House not to allow all their labours to go for nothing, but I ask them to assist Scotch Members in the passing of such a measure as will be creditable to them, and will be a reality and not a shadow. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL, in seconding the Motion, said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire had addressed the House with more than his usual ability, and he hoped that the Bill which was drawn with his hon. Friend's usual skill and moderation, would commend itself to the approval of the majority of the House. For himself, he thought it perhaps the best Bill that had been introduced on the subject since he had had the honour of a seat in that House. It was fair to the landlord, and to the tenant; and also to the ratepayer, whose interests had not hitherto been sufficiently considered on this question. There were some provisions in the Bill to which he thought exception might be taken, but there were none that could not be easily met in Committee. He hoped that the closing words of his hon. Friend's speech would produce the effect they ought to produce upon the House, for each and everyone could not expect to have his own way in that it is actually done now in many cases. For instance, some landlords on letting their farms now, wishing to do justice with their tenants, and not to be annoyed afterwards with complaints, insist upon an offerer for a farm naming a sum which he may consider as value for the damage that may be done to his crops during the lease, and no difficulty is felt in doing this. Again, in many leases a clause is often inserted that a tenant shall get no compensation for any reasonable head of game, or damage done to his crops. When a dispute arises between landlords and tenants, the arbiters are at a loss to know what is meant by a reasonable head of game, or reasonable amount of damage. Instead of this indefinite term "reasonable amount," I propose that a sum should be stated which shall be considered as the starting point for any valuations that may afterwards take place. Another objection made to this proposal is the assessing of the landlord on the sum mentioned in the lease for rates and taxes. But there is nothing unreasonable in this. It is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Valuation Act. At present, when the game is let, rates and taxes are paid on the rent given for the game; but if it is reserved, even though that reservation may be the cause of a lower rent, no valuation is put upon the game, and consequently no rates are paid. This is manifestly unjust to the other ratepayers, for they have to pay more on account of this reduced rent. It is the principle of the Valuation Act that anything that adds to, or detracts from, the value of the land should be assessed. For instance, when a landlord and tenant agree by lease that the tenant shall lay out a certain sum on drainage, when that sum is expended both landlord and tenant are assessed on the annual value added to the land by such expenditure, even though the landlord reap no benefit from it during the lease. Surely, then, there is nothing unreasonable in the landlord being assessed on that sum by which the rent of the land is depreciated. Having disposed of the objections to the proposal, I may ask—What are the advantages of it? It is often said that the game clauses in leases are so much alike that tenants sign the leases without reading these clauses, the true character of which is not known till some dispute arises between the landlord and tenant about the game, and they are then found to be most unjust and oppressive. Now, if this provision were to become law, the tenant's attention would be drawn to the game clauses, as he would have to agree with the landlord as to the amount to be stated in the lease for damage to his crops. Another advantage would be, that if during the lease there were a change of the proprietor of the lands, or if the game were let and there were a large increase in the head of game, and the tenant felt himself aggrieved by such increase and consequent damage to his crops, he would only have to apply for arbiters to be put on to value the damage done, who would decide whether that damage was more or less than that represented by the sum stipulated in the lease. It may be said that this provision could easily be evaded by the sum mentioned in the lease being small or large; but if the sum mentioned were too small, the landlord would run the risk of having to pay afterwards a much larger sum for damages to the tenant. If a large sum were mentioned in the lease he would have to pay more rates and taxes, and thus there would be a check put upon him in either case. I come now to speak of that provision in which the present Bill differs from those I have previously introduced. In previous Bills I struck hares and rabbits out of the Game list—in short, I proposed that they should be regarded as no better than vermin. This was often represented to me as the weak point of the Bill, and it was alleged that it would encourage poaching and lead to the extermination of the game, both ground and feathered. In the Committee not a few of the witnesses bore evidence to this effect, and many who did me the honour to vote for the second reading of the Bill in 1874 gave me to understand that they did not approve of that clause of the Bill. I found that with the present state of public opinion it would not be possible to pass such a clause. Having respect, then, to these opinions, and without any change in my own, I have modified the clause thus far—giving the tenant the full right to kill hares and rabbits on his farm, and removing all legal obstructions to his exercising this right, but maintaining the laws of trespass in pursuit of these animals against the general public. The clause for recovery of damages is very simple. A tenant feeling himself aggrieved that the damage done to his crops has exceeded the sum mentioned in the lease, intimates the same to the landlord. If the landlord agrees with the tenant to appoint arbiters to value the damages, the question may be said to be settled; but if he does not, an application is made to the sheriff, who forthwith appoints arbiters. The report of the arbiters being approved of by the sheriff, the sheriff delivers his judgment, which shall be final. In the event of its being found that the damage done to any one crop is less than the sum in the lease, and that there is no probability of damage being done to any other crop in the same year, the sheriff shall refuse the claim, and find the lessee liable in expenses; but if there is the probability of damage to other crops of that year, the sheriff shall postpone his judgment till all the crop is raised or reaped. If the whole damage exceeds the sum stated in the case, the sheriff shall certify the amount of such excess, and find the lessor liable in expenses. In proposing that the jurisdiction should be transferred from the justices to the sheriffs, I mean no reflection on the former, but merely that there should be greater confidence in the administration of justice. It cannot be denied that the man accused of being in pursuit of game, when brought before a bench of justices, is suspicious that the judgment of those who are to try him will be biased against him, and that he will not have fair play, as they are all more or less game preservers; and it may be that at some time he was charged with trespassing in pursuit of game on the land of one or more of the gentlemen who are to try him. The Legislature has always been most careful that the administration of justice shall not suffer in the opinion of the people from the slightest suspicion of self-interest in any of the judges influencing his judgment. Hence it is that a baker is not allowed to act as a justice under the Bread Act, or a brewer or distiller or retailer of exciseable liquors under the Licensing Act, or an occupier, or father, son, or brother of an occupier under the Factory Act, or a coal master or tenant of coal works under the Mine Acts, or a master in any particular trade or manufacture under the Combination

Act. The last provision of the Bill to which I shall call direct attention is, that no person shall be prosecuted more than once under the Game Acts for the same offence. At present a person being in pursuit or unlawfully in possession of game may be prosecuted for being in pursuit of game during the day or night, as the case may be. If the trespass is in close time he may be prosecuted by 13 Geo. III. c. 54, and then he may be prosecuted under the Poaching Prevention Act for unlawfully having game in his possession. He is at the same time also open to prosecution under the Game Qualification Acts, 1621, and he may also be prosecuted for killing game without having a game certificate; so that he may be prosecuted four times for the same offence. I am not going to mention the Gun Licensing Act, but it is a fact that they also prosecute a man for killing game without a gun licence. These are the main provisions of the Bill, and I trust I have explained them to the full satisfaction of the House. I think I have done so, and in moving the second reading I do entreat the House not to allow all their labours to go for nothing, but I ask them to assist Scotch Members in the passing of such a measure as will be creditable to them, and will be a reality and not a shadow. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL, in seconding the Motion, said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire had addressed the House with more than his usual ability, and he hoped that the Bill which was drawn with his hon. Friend's usual skill and moderation, would commend itself to the approval of the majority of the House. For himself, he thought it perhaps the best Bill that had been introduced on the subject since he had had the honour of a seat in that House. It was fair to the landlord, and to the tenant; and also to the ratepayer, whose interests had not hitherto been sufficiently considered on this question. There were some provisions in the Bill to which he thought exception might be taken, but there were none that could not be easily met in Committee. He hoped that the closing words of his hon. Friend's speech would produce the effect they ought to produce upon the House, for each and everyone could not expect to have his own way in this matter. There could be no doubt there was a growing feeling in Parliament and the country that it was wrong and intolerable that the serious and costly business of one class should be injuriously affected by the mere amusement of another. That was a feeling in which most men would agree; and that a grievance did exist in Scotland, owing to the over-preservation of game, no one would deny. It was now upwards of a quarter of a century since the question first came prominently before the House. In all the General Elections in which he had taken part, and before he had a seat in the House, this question had engaged the attention of their constituents. The electors had generally demanded that the question should be dealt with. Candidates had always admitted the grievances, and always said they desired to redress them. The existence of a grievance had not only been proved before a Committee of that House, but it was not denied by any organ of public opinion, or by any public man whose opinion had any weight in the country. Still, in spite of this concurrence of opinion, Session after Session passed and nothing had been done. Sometimes, as the hon. Member had said, Game Bills rose in coveys: sometimes there had been only a solitary Bill; but in no case had any Bill become an Act. That was a very unsatisfactory state of things: and he could assure the House that when he appeared before his constituents and had to make that confession, he did so with feelings akin to shame. He begged, therefore, to call the attention of the Government to the subject—for he was quite certain it was a subject which, to be effectually dealt with, must either be dealt with by the Government itself, or by an hon. Member who was assured of the support of the Government. He hoped, however, that this Bill would receive the Government support. There was one fact, however, which told unfavourably for the success of the measure—that Petitions on the subject had for some reason or another almost ceased. Last year there was only one Petition, and so far as he knew, no Petition had yet been presented this Session in favour of the Bill. It was therefore open to any hon. Member to say that was sufficient to excuse the Government and the House for doing nothing, since it was evident that their constituents were contented that nothing should be done. No doubt that might be said; but he appealed to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House whether such a statement would fairly represent the feeling in Scotland. The best of the farmers in Scotland were not a petitioning class; they did not care to move and agitate; and that might be in part the reason why they did not petition. But he feared that the main cause of their silence was that they had ceased to hope for justice at the hands of the present House of Commons. He drew attention to the subject, not so much for the sake of hon. Members as in the hope that the farmers themselves might observe the natural effect which their silence would produce, and that they would, if they were satisfied with the Bill, petition in favour of it, or at all events take some means which would enable the House to know their opinions and their wishes. The Government had only once since they came into power expressed an opinion on the subject—namely in the year 1874; and he regretted to say that opinion was not in favour of legislation. He hoped that they had since been able to re-consider the question, and now saw their way to take another view. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was unfortunately not present—detained, no doubt, by the pressure of other public duties. Hon. Members who supported the Government side had observed with great pleasure the growing confidence of the country in the right hon. Gentleman. He had treated many public questions with great success; and he was sure he would add to the esteem with which he was regarded in Scotland, if he would take up this grievance of the farmers and settle it in a satisfactory manner. In his right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate the right hon. Gentleman would find a most judicious adviser, and one who well knew how great the grievance was, and how deep, in certain counties, the consequent discontent. He would beg most respectfully to press on the Government the importance of taking up this question with a view to its settlement. There were two points in particular with which that Bill dealt, and with which any Bill, to be satisfactory, must deal. The first was the giving some cheap and easy remedy for gaining damages before the Sheriff; and the second was the transfer to the paid Justices of the power of dealing with poaching cases. Although other provisions of the Bill were highly valuable, and he should be sorry to part with them, yet if they could agree to pass only so much of it as dealt with those two important points, it would give great satisfaction to the country.

Sir William Stirling-Maxwell

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

VISCOUNT MACDUFF said, that the subject before the House was one which had created a good deal of discussion and interest in Scotland, and he thought that the names on the back of the Bill were a proof that, as far as Scotland was concerned, some alteration was necessary, and that a case had been made out for legislation. This miserable hare and rabbit controversy had assumed undue proportions in Scotland, and he must say he was most anxious to see it settled or some compromise effected. English Members ought not to look at propositions like the present as offshoots of those extreme views which were supposed to find a home in the hearts of the Scotch farmers; for the opinions of Scotchmen on both sides of the House were almost identical upon this question—at least so far as ground game were concerned—that even that curious compound the Scotch Conservative had not failed to call these interesting little animals to his aid. During most of their Scotch county elections the unedifying spectacle was to be seen of the would-be legislator appealing to the tenants' well-known view of game—just as if the first and foremost question in their political horizon was the existence of hares and rabbits. If only to get rid of such a humiliating spectacle, all should agree that the question should be settled once for all. Nor did he (Viscount Macduff) see that the difficulties were insurmountable. The preservation of ground game in large quantities was plainly incompatible with a high state of cultivation. Whatever might be the case in England, in the northern part of the island neither the climate nor the soil was favourable to the farmer; and if by ceaseless toil and unstinted application of capital he had managed to win over to agriculture tracts of land which, after all, were not so long ago barren, it was a perfect mockery to suppose that he could look on unmoved while his choicest crops were being devoured, or to suppose that he could be compensated by a few pounds for the havoc which had been created. He thought, then, that on every ground this was a question which ought to be settled as soon as possible. But did the Bill before the House settle it? If he could see within its four corners a solution of the problem, he should hail it with satisfaction; but he confessed he had his misgivings as to its efficiency. His hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire had always associated himself with the question, and his opinion upon it—and indeed upon all agricultural questions—commanded that respect which, if he might be allowed to say so, it so eminently deserved. But he feared that in the present Bill his hon. Friend would hardly attain the object he had in view. At a later stage, perhaps, it might be sufficiently amended; but he felt bound to say that he did not think it altogether a measure which met the occasion. He had been told that there was a sacred principle which must on no account be violated, and that this Bill went at least as far as it was safe to go without invading the well-guarded territory of freedom of contract. He believed that he (Viscount Macduff) was as jealous as most people of any unnecessary interference with freedom of contract, or any other freedom; but he utterly and entirely failed to see how any legislation was possible on the subject of the Game Laws in the interest of the tenant without in some slight way interfering with freedom of contract. He could quite understand the views of those hon. Gentlemen who thought that the Game Laws should be quite swept away; he could also perfectly understand the views of those who preferred to treat this matter by leaving it alone; but what he could not understand was the argument of those who admitted the necessity of legislation and yet thought that a Bill such as this was all that the case required. He gathered from his hon. Friend's (Mr. M'Lagan's) remarks that he thought to attain his object without interference with freedom of contract. But what did the Bill say? Clause 4 said that a landlord was not to be at liberty to contract with the tenant for a reservation of the game to himself unless he, at the same time, agreed to limit the amount of game damage which the tenant was to submit to without compensation, and unless he stated it positively in the lease. Indeed, he was to be assessed upon the sum which he thus named. This, he ventured to say, was a most distinct interference with freedom of contract. It must be clear that if a landlord was unable to reserve a single head of game unless he put a price upon it, his power of making an agreement with his tenant was no longer unfettered, his freedom of contract no longer complete. His object, however, was not to find fault with his hon. Friend for interfering with so sacred a principle, but to point out that his Bill, while it did not avoid interfering with freedom of contract, was not likely to attain the great object of settling this question, which alone could make any such interference justifiable. For his own part, he feared this was not a question to be settled by nicely-adjusted scales of compensation for damages done to crops beyond certain stipulated sums. He believed firmly that legislation, to be effectual, must rest on broader lines. He believed that no legislation could be effectual which did not separate clearly and treat differently the two essentially different kinds of game; securing to the occupier by statute a joint right with the owner to the ground game, and leaving the winged game to the discretion of the contracting parties. He failed to see any object in legislation which failed to do that. He was not without some practical experience of an arrangement of the sort, and he had always found that while it gave satisfaction to every fair claim, both of landlord and tenant, it gave to the tenant that incentive to high cultivation which had produced such admirable results in Scotland. This Bill sought to attain its object by a scheme of compensation. He (Viscount Macduff) did not think the idea of compensation was one which would commend itself to the farmer. The very idea of recovering compensation, with its necessary following of notices in writing, references to arbiters, reports of valuers, and judgments of Sheriffs, seemed to him to open the door to endless litigation—which, after all, was not a very cheery prospect for the landlord—and was it to be supposed that the tenant who, after all this trouble, succeeded in wringing a few pounds of compensation from his landlord, would be satisfied for his devastated crops and encouraged to sow them again? He quite agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Lagan) that a valuable stipulation was introduced into the Bill by transferring, in Clause 12, the jurisdiction in game cases from the justices of the peace to the sheriff; and he was quite sure no one would hail the change with greater satisfaction than the justices themselves, who would be only too glad to be relieved from those disagreeable and invidious duties. He would not take up the time of the House by going into details. He should certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill, however insufficient he might deem it as a final measure, because he sincerely desired that some change should take place. He deplored the prominence the question had assumed in a great many parts of Scotland. It was one which had been played with on both sides, and general expressions had been used with regard to it which might mean nothing or a great deal; and these general expressions had worked upon the mind of the farmer, and led him to expect what hon. Members in this House did not intend to propose. He hoped, however, that that discussion might pave the way for some settlement or compromise which would rid them permanently of that vexed question. When that should have been done, higher questions than hares and rabbits would take their place in Scotch county elections, and that miserable bone of contention would be forever buried.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he had listened with great regret to the speech which had just been delivered by the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Macduff), for he thought speeches of the kind had prevented the question from being settled before that time. Such speeches held out to the tenant-farmers of Scotland a false hope of an extreme measure such as had been indicated by the noble Lord, but which he himself must know perfectly well was not likely to be passed by that House in the present or any other Parliament. Freedom of contract was so sacred a matter that it ought not to be interfered with unless there was a far stronger argument against it than could be shown in any grievance attaching to the Game Laws of Scotland. He would like to ask the noble Lord whether, even if they had a Bill on the lines which he had indicated, they could prevent landlords and tenants from entering into agreements that would be as complete as agreements were at present? It was impossible for Parliament to tie the hands of the parties, because they could make penalties or conditions by contract which no law could possibly interfere with. Whether the noble Lord intended his speech to be of use at future elections he did not say, but it was a pity that a noble Lord holding so high a position should have made a speech injurious to the settlement of the question. It was a pity that the noble Lord should have imported into the discussion of a temperate Bill that bitterness which he certainly did not expect from him. The noble Lord spoke as if hon. Members sitting on his side of the House were the only parties who desired to settle the question. That he begged entirely to deny. Some of the greatest game preservers in Scotland belonged to that side of the House, and they on this side were as anxious as hon. Members opposite to have the question set at rest. More than that, if the noble Lord's Party were so desirous to relieve the tenants from this grievance, to change the existing law and to give the ground game to the tenants, why did not the late Government settle the question when it could command a majority of 120, and when consequently it had the power to settle any question which it might have chosen to bring before the country? The present Bill was an attempt on the part of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, with the support of the great majority of hon. Members from Scotland, to remedy a grievance which the tenant-farmers of Scotland had long felt. It was a grievance, also, which had been admitted by the House, and certainly by hon. Members for Scotland, for the Bill before the House, he might observe, was purely a Scotch Bill. Moreover, it was a moderate Bill. Almost every year since he came into Parliament Bills on the subject had been introduced by private Members, but all those measures were extreme in their principle, interfering almost universally with freedom of contract. Those Bills were never palatable to the House, and they were thrown out by large majorities of hon. Members on both sides of the House. He thought it was strange that notwithstanding the general admission of the grievance, no Government had ever attempted to grapple with it. He thought it was the duty of a Government when a grievance was generally admitted to bring in a measure, for it was only by a Government measure, or a measure supported by the Government—as he hoped this would be—that the question could be settled. The only objection urged against the present Bill was that it interfered with freedom of contract. Now, for his part, he could not see that it did so. There was no doubt that it indicated a form of lease in order to enable the tenant to make a claim for any damages which might accrue, but it did not state the amount of such damage. That was left to be settled by the tenant and the landlord. The present Bill did not indicate any amount of money, but only the principle. They all knew that in Scotland, when game was in the hands of the proprietor, he studied the interests of the tenants. He saw the hon. Member for Kincardineshire shake his head, but he maintained that, as a rule, when the game was in the hands of the landlord, he did study the interests of the farmer. The great grievance arose when the landlord let his game—when he received, on the one hand, a high rent for his land, and, on the other, a high rent for his game. Under the Bill, when a tenant took a lease, it was arranged between him and the landlord what was the amount of damage done by game at that moment. If the landlord afterwards let his game, and thereby increased the damage perhaps four-fold, was it not right and proper that the tenant should receive compensation? The Bill would not be of any use without that clause, and he could not see that it injured any party. The proposal contained in the Bill of last year was a far greater interference with the freedom of contract. The present Bill had been introduced for Scotland alone, and he hoped hon. Members who did not belong to Scotland would not oppose it, as was too often the case in regard to Scotch measures, because they were afraid the same principle might be applied by legislation for England at a future day. At all events, let us be allowed to make the experiment, and after a few years, if it worked well, it might be wise for English Members to adopt a similar measure. He thought it hard that Bills affecting Scotland only, and which met with the approval of almost all Scotch Members, should be rejected by English Members merely because they were afraid lest the same legislation might be applied to them. Take the Hypothec Bill as an instance. Almost all the Scotch Members were in favour of it, but Englishmen came down to oppose it, because they thought it would interfere with the law of distraint. English Members desired to throw out this Bill which the Scotch Members were unanimously in favour of. The present Bill, indeed, might not be satisfactory to all parties. The noble Lord opposite thought it did not go far enough, while other hon. Members thought it went too far. It might have some defects which could be remedied in Committee, but on behalf of the tenant-farmers of Scotland he asked them not slightly to reject the Bill on the second reading. Even if the Bill were to pass almost in its present state, it would give great relief to the tenant-farmers of Scotland. If the Bill passed every conscientious man would take good care to guard the interests of the tenant-farmer by adopting the clause of the Bill so as to prevent the tenant from being ruined by another person coming in to shoot the game.

Viscount Macduff

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the discussion, so far as it had proceeded, offered, in his opinion, the greatest encouragement to the reformers of the Game Laws they had yet received. The question of Game Law reform had ceased to be a matter of argument. No one had ventured to defend the system of Game Laws which gave annually 10,000 to 12,000 criminal convictions, besides many lawsuits which were not reported. He regretted very much that the Bill which the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had introduced into the House, although bearing to a certain extent indirectly on that aspect of the Game Laws, made no very important provision for diminishing their severity and hardship. At the same time, he was willing to admit that some of the proposals in the Bill went to a certain extent in that direction. No one defended the system whereby the landlord, after letting his land for the production of crops by which the farmer was going to pay the rent which the landlord claimed, and also to maintain himself, further inserted within the provisions of his lease a condition whereby the landlord reserved for himself the right of consuming and destroying as much of that produce as he thought right and proper. It was exceedingly gratifying to him to hear the eloquence of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing) in denouncing the practice, which unfortunately prevailed to no small extent in Scotland; and although the hon. Member was right in saying that the practice was more prevalent in those cases in which the proprietor let his shooting to strangers, yet, unfortunately, some of the gravest and most obnoxious cases of game preserving occurred where landlords held the shootings in their own hands, and after letting the land at a rack-rent, endeavoured to obtain a second rent by selling the game which was produced at the expense of the farmer. He said that was no longer a question of argument. It had become simply one of pressure; and he was glad to find that, notwithstanding what they occasionally heard with regard to the feelings of the farmers of Scotland—he spoke of the farmers of Scotland because that was a Scotch Bill—he had no doubt the English farmers would by-and-by awake and put the same pressure on their Representatives—he was glad to find that the pressure exercised by the farmers was having its effect not only on that side of the House, where it was much wanted, but also on the other side of the House. They found that the Bill was supported by Gentlemen belonging to the Conservative party, and that was certainly a great advance on the position which they held a few years ago. He congratulated the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire on the progress he was making on the question. He had heard him previously in connection with Game Bills protesting most gravely and earnestly against any interference with the freedom of contract, and he had heard hon. Members on the other side taking up the same ground. He was glad to find that familiarity seemed to have partially reconciled hon. Members to the bugbear of freedom of contract on questions affecting land, and that their experience in connection with merchant shipping and other questions had led them to view the matter with more favour. The supporters of the Bill had given up the position that there was something sacred in regard to contracts affecting land, which removed them from the principles which were applicable to all other transactions. He was rather surprised to find that any hon. Member should deny that the Bill interfered with freedom of contract. There were three clauses in it which interfered with that principle in the most direct manner. In the first place, it declared that the amount of damage should be in every contract specified, and the landlord and tenant were not to be allowed to make such a contract or arrangement as they thought proper. It was specially provided that every contract should specify the amount of damage in excess of which the tenant was to be entitled to compensation for injury done to his crops. Surely that was a specification in regard to contract which no one could have the slightest doubt interfered with freedom of contract. Some persons seemed to think that in order to interfere with freedom of contract you must specify the prices or rates at which exchange of values between members of the community were to take place. Parliament had not in any case fixed prices or rates. It had simply interfered to lay down principles or to overrule practices which were on the face of them unjust. The contention with respect to the preservation of hares and rabbits was that they formed a subject on which it was not possible to contract. No one could determine the amount of damage which could accrue to a tenant from their preservation, and therefore it was an indeterminate contract, which the law should not be called upon to enforce. He believed that principle had been determined in analogous cases in England. No doubt, the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had endeavoured to get over the difficulty by specifying the amount of damage which the landlord had caused; but, although he did not think that met the difficulty, he was not disposed on the present occasion to criticize the Bill. He had heard with great satisfaction the able and eloquent speech of the noble Lord the Member for Elgin (Viscount Macduff), and with the strictures which he had made upon the Bill he entirely and fully agreed. The 4th clause provided that, independent of any contract which the landlord might make, and notwithstanding any promises

Mr. Orr-Ewing

